For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

THE GRAVE OF A YOUNG MINISTER,

REV. W. C. BOOTH,

WHO DIED IN JACKSON, LA., SOON AFTER THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE HELD IN THE PLACE.

Mournful around the tomb
We stood—and saw the stranger laid
In his last resting place—No clouds of gloom
Were there, but sympathy let fell the tear,
Around this youthful prophet's lonely bier;
The debt to virtue paid.

Far from his home, where dwell
His dearest kindred—oerly friends—
A father, now whose stricken soul could tell,
Of blighted hopes, bending with weight of years,
While oe his furrowed cheeks are seen the tears;
Relief which mercy sends.

Well might a father mourn
For such a son, in manhood's prime,
Blooming with youth, from his embraces torn,
By thee, O! Death, whose pointed arrows fly
All human hearts, of every age to try,
Ie every land and clime.

No hand hie eyes to close,
Of kindred near: he drooping died,
Far from his loved abode. But there were those
Of tender sympathies, who deeply felt,
And by his dying pillow often knelt—
Prayed for him, wept, and sighed.

Friendship's most holy boon
To him was given, in the last hour,
And shed around his couch its sweet perfume.
In night and day, in fellowship there stood
Servant of the cross; a men of God,
Who felt its saving powers—

Saw how he bore the strife
Of sinking nature to the last,
And watched the ebbings of his spirit life,
Until death opened Heaven's bright portals wide,
And threw its dark and gloomy veil aside,
As the pure spirit past.

The church has lost a prize,
With gifts of grace and courage rare;
Its dust its victim of the cross now lies,
No more with lips of eloquence and truth
To plead its cause—so beautiful in youth,
Its pious zeal to share.

But he has gone to rest,
The conquest gained, the battle won,
And safely pillowed on the Saviour's breast,
No more on earth his gospel yoke to bear,
But now in Heaven the crown of life to wear:
His work for Christ well done!

S. B. THOMAS.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

None of the great developments of the age is more indicative of progression in the right direction, than the interest, newly-awakened and increasing, in the moral training of children. We say newly-awakened, because, this interest, in a systematic and energetic form, is of comparatively recent date. Very strange is it, that, notwithstanding the plain teachings of Scripture—and the dear-bought lessons of experience, all lovers of true human progress, especially all true Christians have not, long since, become throughly awakened to the importance of this subject.

As early impressions never die, and as these form the basis of future character, parents and teachers become responsible, in no small degree, for the position which their charges shall occupy in time and for their destiny. Yet numbers act, in total disregard of this solemn truth. More attention, by far, is bestowed on the physical and mental, than on the moral, training of children. The comely and healthful development of the body and mind receive more attention, than the education of the heart. Children learn readily to reverence the truths of science, as they appear in their demonstrated forms. The creations of genius and the beauties of art win readily and sweetly upon their appreciative minds. In there any reason why they should not reverence the truth of God's word, quite as readily; and why the unspeakable loveliness of the Son of God, as it appears therein, should not win upon their minds, quite as readily and quite as sweetly!

If their attention were directed, as often and with as much care to the latter, as to the former, such would doubtless be the result. Children learn, with little difficulty, the art of accumulating and laying up treasure on earth. With as little difficulty, may they learn the art of accumulating spiritual treasure, and laying it up in heaven. In a word, the spiritual interest, of children are far less cared for, than those, which connect themselves only with time. Is it because parents are waiting in affection: or, because having clear perceptions of duty, they fail to discharge it? We trow not. We imagine, it is because, they fail to take the immortality of their children into the account, when choosing their course in life; or, because, they are not wise in selecting proper instrumentalities, in their training.

The apathy of the church, on this subject, results from several reasons.

First, Parents too often neglect to present their children for baptism. This may often result from neglect on the part of the ministry. As pastors, we do not insist on this duty, as frequently and as strenuously, as we should; consequently, large numbers of children grow up in our congregations, unbaptized.

Thus the effect of solemn, baptismal vows and of a proper sense of the new relation to God into which they are thus introduced is lost to many parents; hence follows indifference with reference to their children's interests.

Again, too little emphasis is laid on the fact, that all baptized children are members of the church of Christ; and are therefore to be treated as such. Many parents have a vague, indefinite idea, that some such relationship exists between their children and the church; but do not seem to regard it as a matter of much importance, and consequently act, as though it had no existence.

And here, again, we may seriously ask ourselves, whether, as pastors, we exhibit this relationship and point out and enforce the duties arising therefrom, as frequently and as urgently, as we should! Are not children to be regarded as bona fide members of the church, to be treated as such, as far as their immaturity will allow! And, in their infant ignorance and weakness, are not parents to be regarded as their agents, to do for them what they are unable to do for themselves. And, are they not, therefore, to instruct them both personally and by proxy, in the way of duty and assist them to walk therein! Are they not, in some sense, their parental pastors! Would that the church were fully awake to the importance of this view of the subject! Children should be taught, that, as soon as they are old enough, they are to conduct themselves as members of the church. The good resulting from the restraints thus thrown around them would be incalculable.

Again, do not parents greatly err, in concluding, that, though children are not too young to sin, they are too young to become Christians! Ought they not, at a much earlier age than is usual, to urge them to an immediate reliance upon Christ for salvation; that they may not only be subject to the restraints of religion but may participate in its comforts! Is it not a most pernicious error, that children must in most cases, pass a novitiate of wickedness, before they are prepared for the new birth and a pious life? Are not children capable of religion, as soon as, nay, before they are capable of sinning?

It seems to us, the church must, to a considerable extent, change her tactics. Instead of looking, as heretofore; for our new recruits from among the more mature, we must raise up a membership from among our children. Amid such multiplied, and fast multiplying, gospel privileges, and when men become hardened, with such facility, what an alarming proportion of the adults of this generation live and die out of church. While we are to seek, with no less earnestness and zeal, to gather adult sinners into the church, ought we not to turn our attention more particularly to the young, and look in this direction for the chief increase to the membership of the church! It so appears to us. While the religious education of children is to be attended to chiefly, by parents, themselves, at home, both by their pious example and pious instructions, no more powerful auxiliary offers itself than the Sabbath school. Owned and blessed of God, as this instrumentality has always been, the church has come to regard it, as an indispensable part of her organization. All the prominent Christian denominations rely upon it as one of the main sources from which they are to derive strength. It opens a field for the exercise of a great deal of surplus talent, and for the employment of a great deal of surplus time. It affords opportunity, both to teachers and children, for spending the early hours of the Sabbath pleasantly and profitably; and there are persons, whose services can be made available to the church, chiefly in this department. It affords opportunity to instruct children, in the great primary truths of the gospel, to convince them of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment to come and point them to "the Son of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." It thus becomes a great co-worker with the pulpit, and though it often seem but as bread cast upon the waters, yet, in most cases, it shall "return after many days." The most of us here present are indebted, in no small degree, for our position in the church, and for what religious principle and comfort we have, to the Sabbath School instruction of our early years. Among our most precious remembrances, are those connected with these occasions. They forsook us not through the years of our forgetfulness of God, and, revived by the renewal of our natures, they will linger with us to life's latest hours, go out with us into eternity. Instead, therefore, of regarding the duties of Sabbath School, as mere drudgery,—as, we fear, is the case with too many—Pastor and Congregation should regard them as the most delightful and hopeful, which, they can be called to perform.

The more necessary is this instrumentality, because, in our secular schools, so little attention is paid to the education of the heart. Among the more enlightened heathen of ancient days, no teacher was tolerated, who gave his pupils no instruction with reference to their duties to the gods. Indeed it was considered a prominent and essential part of a teacher's duty. But, in this day of enlightment and gospel privilege, from how many of our daily schools is religious instruction almost totally banished! From a want of energy among Protestants, and a popular demagogueism in the secular press, an apostate organization, (calling itself the Church of Christ, but a handfull, compared with Protestant Christians, and they chiefly composed of the priest ridden slaves Europe is daily pouring from her sewers, her poor-houses and her prisons upon our shores,) as artful in chicanery as it is insignificant in numbers, has managed to drive the Bible from most of our common schools. One of the first principles of religious freedom is thus sacrificed to the cry for religious toleration, a cry coming from a body, notoriously and professedly, the most intolerant under the sun; and our children thus deprived of that moral aliment, which should daily be mingled with their mental food, and without which the latter is but a most deadly poison, corrupting and destroying both body and soul. And such is the infatuation of many of our members, that they send their children to institutions, popular, chiefly from their high-sounding literary pretensions and for their professed instructions in fashionable accomplishments; rather than to those, where they will be taught to fear God and work out their salvation, both by the example and daily teaching of pious instructors. Consequently, many of them return, as proficient in scepticism and wickedness, as they are in science and literature—can quote as glibly from Paine and Voltaire, as they can from Homer and Virgil. Under such circumstances, we contend, one of the greatest counteracting influences, is regular, energetic, Sabbath School operations. If the good seed be early sown in their hearts, very wily and very powerful, must the tempter be that shall take them away. We repeat, the general deficiency in our Common School education, the danger our children incur, from the godless instruction of many of our high schools and colleges, render sabbath school instruction not only extremely desirable, but absolutely essential.

It has been objected, that by attending Sabbath School, children are liable to become sectarians. Far better for them to become sectarians, than to become nothingarians; or, what is worse devilarians. Infinitely better, is a sectarian religion, than no religion at all. Hateful as bigotry even is, far more hateful is wickedness. A bigot may be a child of God; but a wicked man must be a child of the Devil.

But, sectarianism does not, necessarily, follow the teachings of Sabbath School. The great primary doctrines of Christianity should be ordinarily taught and comparatively little attention given to those minor points, which divide Christendom into parties; at least not until pupils are sufficiently mature, to understand them; and even then, must those enlightened, comprehensive views be inculcated, which lead us, while clinging to our own opinions, to remember the weakness of our own natures, and be tolerant and charitable to the opinions of others. Ignorance and bigotry usually accompany each other, so with enlightment and charity, and there is therefore, little danger of their becoming bigots, if they receive proper enlightenment. Indeed, their is no better way of teaching a comprehensive Christian charity, than by continually directing their attention, to the character and precepts of Christ and his apostles.

Your Committee very much deplore the inexcusable carelessness of many of our ministers and the criminal indifference of most of our members on this subject. If ministers would visit, and lecture, and otherwise interest themselves in our Sabbath Schools, a rapid and cheering improvement would be the result; if the members of the Church would be at more pains to send their children, to teach themselves, to procure books, etc., that improvement would be still more rapid, and still more cheering. But, so long as pastors excuse themselves from this field of labor, and members draw back from it, as from unprofitable drudgery, the cause will continue to languish and each generation will be farther and still farther from God.

There must be a general awakening on this subject, in order that, the Church may approximate to her duty in the premises, and derive from it that large benefit which is sure to follow.

Your committee take pleasure in stating, that the present indefatigible book editor is bringing out large numbers of sabbath school books and tracts, attractive, substantial and wholesome; thus placing it in our power to furnish our schools with books such as we can heartily endorse. The system of colportage, which the tract Society proposes to pursue will place these within reach of many neighborhoods, now almost entirely destitute.

It is cheering to knew, that we can now have books, purged from those calvinistic and abolition elements, which pervade so many northern, sabbath school publications.

Many of these works are indigenous;—either written by southern authors, or revised by our excellent southern editor. They are gotten up, elegantly and substantially, adorned with beautiful and appropriate wood-cuts prepared expressly for them.

With so many newly furnished advantages and with the interest of the Church increasing at the present ratio, your committee predicts for the cause of Sabbath Schools a success in future, somewhat commensurate with the failure of the past. Your Committee recommended the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1st. That, in order to the production of a deeper and wider interest among our people at large, the presiding elder of each district be directed to appoint at the First Quarterly Conference of the ensuing year, a delegate, to attend a Sabbath School Convention, to be held at Summerfield, sometime during the annual examination of Summerfield Institute, in the month of July.

Resolved, 2d. That, as pastors, we very much regret our past unfaithfulness to the lambs of the flock, and will endeavor in the future to discharge our duty towards them, more earnestly and more zealously.

THOS. H. FOSTER, CHAIRMAN.

BIBLE CAUSE.

The Committee appointed at your last session, to prepare a report, on the Bible cause, beg to submit the following:

The glory of the Bible, like the ways of its Author, is but partly known, by the human understanding. Who can write its annals, or forte its triumphs? Your committee, impressed with the surpassing greatness of the subject, forbear all emblazoned rhetorical adornments; feeling that all such attempts are in bad taste, as much so, as festoons of earthly herbage and flowers would be encircling "the great white throne." It is the Book of God! His gift to wayward rebellman. It is a faithful portraiture of earth, and the men that dwell therein. It reveals the existence of a city, "which hath foundations, whose maker and builder is God." It points to the gateway of that city, and the new and living way leading thereto,—and tells of him who opened it, and made it possible to the children of men. It accounts for the introduction and reign of sin in the world, and shews that its reign is unto death. It is the great civilizer, and so potent has been its influence in this regard, that it is wonderful that the wise men of this world, have not inscribed upon every portal of commerce and of legislation,—"Where the Gospel comes, it spreads divine light."

Such a book, like the great staff of life, is the necessary food of the millions. But whence the supply for a multitude so vast, so needy! Human enterprize and cupidity never, with all their graspings, conceived the project so vast in its design, nor, neither its glory nor profit. But it remained for those who had taken the benefits of the bounteous anointings of this holy teaching, to grasp the idea, and dare its accomplishment;—that is, to give to every destitute family a copy of the word of God. This purpose, originated, and has sustained the British and Foreign Bible Society;—also, the American Bible Society, with all kindred associations. These associations, form the keystone of Protestant Catholicism, and is the guarantee that the "Man of sin," with all kindred errorists, shall be ground into dust, under the majestic tread of pure evangelism. To the success of this great charity, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has plighted its faith, and as part of that communion, we the members of the Alabama Annual Conference, take this method of renewing our pledges to sustain with heart and hand the American Bible Society; and in doing so, feel assured that we do not go beyond or misrepresent the wishes of the people we serve. Therefore,

1. Resolved, That we continue to have undiminished confidence in the American Bible Society.

2. Resolved, That we continue to invite its authorized agents, to our fields of labor, for the sale and distribution of the Sacred book, and for the collection of funds.

3. Resolved, That we will feel it to be our duty, if from any cause the regular agent does not visit our charges, to take up collections, and contributions from our congregations and members.

The committee reports the amounts following, to them paid in cash at this conference:

AN ANXIOUS WIFE.—Some women are never happy unless when they are scrubbing, brushing, sweeping, or otherwise toiling in household affairs, although they have servants to do all they require. The Hon. Henry Erskine's first wife was one of this class, and her extreme nervous irritability and eccentric ways, it may be supposed, did not contribute greatly to her Harry's domestic happiness. One of her peculiarities consisted in not retiring to rest at the usual hours. She would frequently employ half the night in examining the wardrobe of the family, to see that nothing was missing, and that every thing was in its proper place. The following is told as a proof of her oddities:

One morning, about two or three o'clock, having been unsuccessful in a search, she awake Mr. Erskine from a sound sleep, by putting to him this important interrogatory: "Harry, love, where's your white waistcoat?"

Interesting Reminiscences of Revolutionary Times.

PLEASANT MOUNT, PA., Dec. 2, 1854.

Editors Boston Rec: Believing that you take pleasure in having your readers well posted in matters relating to our Revolutionary fathers and mothers; hence, I may be permitted to offer your readers a slight sketch of a visit to see the great souled "Greeny Benjamin," an angel of mercy and matron in Washington's army, of whom the newspapers have oft made honorable mention.

This patriotic widow is a resident of this town, and is 110 years old. When she was 100 years, I chanced to have a seat with her in a four horse stage sleigh from Honesdale, to this place, distant 16 miles, we two being the only passengers inside, during a tremendous storm. To-day, after a lapse of nearly ten years, I did myself the pleasure of calling on "Grand Mam" again. After the usual preliminaries, my next inquiry was regarding her circumstances and earthly comforts. I was answered "Favorably." But since I had seen her last her locks had become more whitened, yet her eyes seemed full of patriotic fire, and as keen as those of an eagle; with step firm, and form erect as an American liberty pole. She held in her hand a bunch of fine white fleece wool, and thus she became seated. During our conversation she continued separating, with the thumb and fingers of the right hand, and preparing said wool for carding, in her old fashioned hand-cards by her own hands, as she had done for thirty years then past. She repeated that she was glad to see me, and said she would still call me "Her Frenchman," as I often reminded her of a man of that nation who served with Washington's army at Yorktown, and against the British and the cursed Tories, and in the same trenches where Corporal Osborn, her husband, was working at the cannon.

"As I well remember the day," she continued, "that I and Caty Lambertson, my husband's sister, whom I always loved as my own sister, was one day going down from the American tents to the trenches, to carry our husbands and some friends their dinners. While the cannone were firing from both sides by spells, we were met by Gen. Washington, on horseback, all smutty with powder, smoke and sweat. He stopped his horse on recognising us, and spoke out snallingly (for he never laughed like most folke) 'Ladies, ain't you afraid of those cannon?' I told him 'No, sir, 'tis only the American hullets that are cheating the gallows about this time; so, we are going to carry our men some dinner at the trenches;' for I was always more afraid of the Tories than the bullets, since I knew to my sorrow they are but sly dogs, and rascally thieves."

She continued: "I recollect as plain as can be the last time I saw Gen. Washington. It was at Newburgh, of a drisaly, wet day. When he rode out to where Caty and I stood, and with a smile recognized us, he had a silk oil cloth cloak over his uniform, with buttons up and down over each breast to his shoulders; and I also remember where Caty and I stood, a little in the rear of the American officers at Yorktown, when the British officers and men, with black silk handkerchiefs tied to some of their drums, marched up in front of Washington and other officers, with their hats off, to surrender, and the tears ran down their faces, and one of the British officers had his sword handed back to him again, and then he looked very sorrowful." I asked if she did not feel sympathy for them, whereupon, with eyes sparkling as if full of magnetic fire, and her head erect, she replied; "No, for their sorrow had come too late."

In reply to the question of how many husbands she had had, she said: "Three—Wm. Reed, of Orange county, who died shortly after the Continental Congress had declared war. I was afterward married to Aaron Osborn, of the same county, and soon after he joined Washington's army as a corporal; but he always acted as sergeant; having the confidence of the General, was often selected sergeant of the Guard, and some times at Washington's marquee; and I went to camp with him to do what I could in any befitting capacity, often assisting in making and mending the officers' and others' clothes. And we staid in the army six long years, and until our good General disbanded his army, when we were honorably discharged.

"The officers paid me well for all I did for them, but one, who died. That one gave me an order on his brother—a rich brother in New York—but he being a Tory, and living with the British while they held New York, after the war was ended, refused to pay the order because his brother was a rebel, but I heard that after the peace, he went 'Out West,' and died a beggar. I have never complained of this loss, for the Tories got well thrashed for their sneaking after the 'red coats.'

"Well, after my faithful husband died, I again married John Benjamin, of Newburgh, and by him had five children. He died, and I became the third time a widow. Our Government has granted me a pension of ninety-six dollars a year, and on that, the carding and spinning, as well as knitting the yarn into stockings, and the kindness of many friends, I am comfortably cared for, and enjoy pretty good health to this day."

Mrs. Benjamin here brought out a skein of pure white yarn, spun on her old fashioned wheel the day before, and it would probably compare with any that I saw exhibited at the late "World's Fair" in New York. Our parting with this loving monument of patriarchal patriotism, it was with deep feelings of veneration.

While the bright visions of hope suppiant those dark days of our nation's birth, since they have passed away, I fondly trust that the first attempt with the design to destroy our constitutional union the inception may be strangled at its birth. And while our American people, whether manor or distant born, hold firmly to the words of the "Father of our Country" on a most perilous occasion: "Put none but Americans on guard to-night!" then is our Constitution and our nation safe.

The true meaning of said advice and command being thus manfully explained: On the occasion referred to, Washington had with grief discovered that there were those in the American army not truly Americanised, whose blinded hearts were still in secret union with the enemies of American liberty. They, although enlisted in the ranks of the Continental Army, whose chief commander was Washington, under the Great Jehovah; yet Washington had seen that they were not Americanised, and now his orders are positive: "Put none but Americans on guard to-night!"

On that ever memorable night did Aaron Osborn, the husband of his at present living wife, Mrs. Benjamin, faithfully assist, as sergeant of Washington's Guard, to carry those orders into full execution.

I am, gentlemen, most truly yours, P. P. R.

The largest cannon in the world is in India. It weighs forty tons, and is formed of a mixed metal. A seat in the interior accommodates five persons without crowding. It is used for throwing tax-gatherers from one town to another.

A genteelly dressed man entered a shooting gallery in New York on the 3d, and asked for a loaded pistol, stating that he desired to practice a little. Shortly after he received the weapon he placed it against his forehead and fired. The ball entered the brain, but strange as it may appear, the missile was extracted and he was still living on the following night, although it was not thought possible he could survive much longer.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1855

Route to Conference.—Preachers and visitors attending the Louisiana Conference at Franklin, 17th inst., will have choice of two routes: By steamer from New Orleans to Donaldsonville—thence by stage to the Lake House. There a light draught boat takes passengers and mails for Franklin. The boat will land Conference persons at Walker's Wharf, where Rev. N. A. Cravens informs us they will be met and conducted to lodgings.

The other route is by Opelousas railroad—a daily train—to Thibodaux, and thence by stage to Tiger ville and thence by boat to Franklin. Trip within two days.

Correspondents will wait on our columns. Conference matters must be dispatched. Several Obituary and other articles deferred till next week: among them "Young America."

Books.—J. C. Morgan, whose Book and Periodical Depot, near the Post-office, is supplied for the fullest demands of the season, has laid Cummings's "Sabbath Evening Lectures on Mathew and Mark" on our table; the notice of which, with others, must be deferred another week.

Aid for Corpus Christi.—We are pleased to have received, in aid of this mission, under Rev. H. S. Lafferty, the sum of $30, through Dr. Winans, contributed as follows:

Dr. Winans, $10; Martha Winans, $3; N. S. Dickson, $5; R. Germany, $5; Sylvania Petty, $2 50; Phillip Petty, $2 50; Malinda Petty, $2.

Female School at Baton Rouge.—Those having daughters to educate will consult Mrs. Read's Card, (4th page), to their advantage. We have seen this school in operation, and know enough of its moral, social and literary advantages to recommend it heartily. Dancing is not of the accomplishments taught.

Lake Providence Herald.—Dr. Bard, the editor, has run up Democratic colors. He sustained the neutral well. The Herald is a party acquisition.

Ocean Springs Gazette.—The last, best thing from this Newport of Southern Watering, is the Gazette—a neat and every way creditable weekly. Geo. A. Cox proprietor and J. E. K. Washington Editor. We enter the "Exchange" with pleasure.

Methodist Protestants in Ga.—The minutes of this body are published at length in the Southern Olive Tree. It met in the city of Atlanta on the second day of November The statistics show 2979 members, seventy churches, and value of church property $12,925.

German Methodists.—Dr. Nast reports that the increase of members in German Domestic Missions last year was one thousand, of which seven hundred were in the western conferences.

Religion at Home.—"Let them learn first," says Paul, "to show piety at home." Religion begins in the family. That sort only shining abroad is a very suspicious sort One of the holiest sanctuaries on earth is home. The family altar is more venerable than any altar in the cathedral. The education of the soul for eternity begins by the fireside. The principle of love, which is to be carried through the universe, is first unfolded in the family.

A HINT TO POLITICIANS.

The National Magazine remarking upon the comparative statistics of the census of 1850 says:—

"The representation of the Roman Church here is surprising, and should undeceive at once our political managers. It has but one thousand one hundred and twelve churches, which can accommodate only six hundred and twenty-one thousand hearers!—not one-eleventh of the number of churches belonging to the Methodists, scarcely more than one-eighth of the number of the Baptists, not one-fourth the number of the Presbyterians. It has not one-thirty-third of the whole number reported, while the Methodists have more than one-third, and the Baptists nearly one-fourth.

"The comparative feebleness of Popery among us, as shown in this table, accords with the statement of the government report respecting immigration. We have had quite exaggerated apprehensions on this subject. Of our twenty-four millions, only about two and a quarter millions are native of Europe.—This is less than ten per cent. About one million of these are Irish, a people who have been supposed to be more numerous than the whole foreign-born population reported by the Census."

Our Railroads.—The following exhibit of the receipts for the past month of the two great roads now in course of construction gives a very favorable foreshadowing of what we may expect when they have extended their iron arms farther from us.

Earnings of the New Orleans, Opelousas and Great Western Railroad for the month of December, 1854:

	Passg.	Freight.	Total.
December	$4,797 82	$11,642 78	$16,720 78
November	3,580 55	8,231 33	8,812 33
Increase	$1,236 97	$3,771 25	$7,908 45

The following statement exhibits the receipts upon the New Orleans, Jackson, and Great Western Railroad for the month of December, 1854:

From Passengers	$3,618 25
From Freight	7,815 70
Total	$11,433 95

Total receipts of cotton to December 31, 9,666 bales.

THE LAST MARK OF ANTICHIST.

If St. Paul and St. John, as may be supposed, spoke in prophetic vision of an adversary to be developed after their times, we may conclude the complete Antichrist near his advent.

"Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God, and this is that Spirit of Antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and lo! now already is it in the world." 1 Epistle of St. John iv. 2d, 3.

"For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver, and an Antichrist." 2 Ep. St. John, vii.

A "lay preacher" in the Southern Churchman calls attention, in connexion with the Pope's council now convened to declare the immaculate conception of Mary, to the marks or indicia of Antichrist according to the Epistles of the beloved Apostle. There is but one noted by him in the verses prefixed. It is confessing not that Jesus Christ has COME IN THE FLESH—a denial of his true humanity—an ignoring of that blessed, comforting doctrine which St. Paul calls a "great mystery."

These pertinent remarks are added: "What is the most striking event of modern times, in these latter days, which would point to that power or church, calling itself christian, which virtually, and actually denies, that our blessed Lord was, true man, as well as very God? Certainly it is that avowed purpose of the Church of Rome, at this time to settle, abridge, decide and proclaim the stupendous fact, that the Virgin Mary was not a true woman born by ordinary generation—but miraculously, as the Son of God was—and that she therefore is to be mediatrix ante mediatorem—not merely the object of worship and prayer to mediate with the Saviour, but a co-mediator, the Queen of Heaven, a Goddess, who never was a woman, though Christ himself so called her, when he wrought his first miracle, and when he finished his great work upon the Cross.

"This blasphemous dogma is now to be decreed by the dignitaries of the Roman church in Council assembled—the Pope at their head—the christian world, prepared for the last new addition to the Gospel by the Encyclical letter dated Gaeta, February 2nd, 1849, is now about to hear it decreed from the Vatican that the Virgin Mary, was born without original sin, born miraculously, born immaculate, therefore no woman, and consequently, and inevitably, as our Lord was her son, he was the Son, NOT of a woman, but of some kind of sinless, perfect, and divine being—and could not therefore have partaken of our nature. It seems to manifest, that his Holiness is thus crowning his claws, with this last symbol of Antichrist, by a denial that "Jesus Christ is come in the flesh."

LETTER FROM REV. W. LAMBUTH.

Shanghae, China, Oct. 2, 1854.

Brother McTyeire—Allow me, in the fullness of my heart, to return to my Christian brethren and friends sincere and heartfelt thanks for sending me among this benighted people. The mail leaves this evening, in consequence of which my letter will be brief, only stating some few particulars, that you and others may be informed of our arrival and position, and of the state of affairs about Shanghae. I sit here to-day on the confines of this great empire, endeavoring to learn the language. I have made but little progress as yet, but praise be to Him who hath put it in my heart to come and teach this people. Shrouded in darkness and enveloped in heathenish superstition, I have nought to complain of. I see wickedness and idolatry at every step, but not a word am I able to say in the way of admonition. My Christian friend, you can form no conception of the existing state of China—of the chain of heathenish superstition which binds the mental powers of this people in darkness—until you see it with your own eyes, excluding neither rich nor poor.

To multiply words would be needless, especially at the present time. On the 6th May last we sailed from New York and on 17th September, sabbath evening, arrived at Shanghae China; all well and safe. Found Brother Cuningham and family well and entering into the work of our Blessed Saviour with Missionary zeal. Compelled from necessity to seek shelter where we could, all save Brother Belton and family have taken lodgings in Brother Cunnyngham's house, where we receive every kindness and want for nothing.

The state of affairs about Sanghae is in much confusion, and I might say, it prevails at this time over the whole empire. The Rebels and Imperialists are still contending with each other in our very midst. On yesterday, the first day of this month, sabbath, they were battling some three hours within gunshot of the houses; but few were wounded; none, as I have heard, were killed. More about this when I write again.

The Church South has now five missionaries in China, Brother Taylor the sixth, but is now in America. One half of this number are young and inexperienced in the Ministry. But blessed be God for His inestimable blessings, as for myself I have devoted my life to this work, live long or die soon. I hope to live at the foot of the Cross of Christ and by His aid and the comforts of the Holy Ghost alone. I expect to be successful in my Mission.

I ask an interest in the prayers of the Church at home, so that under the multiplicity of cares and duties which will devolve upon me, I may be sustained, supported and grow in grace and the knowledge of Christ and be successful in my calling.

May He who presides over the Universe direct and guide us.

Your brother in Christ,

William Lambuth.

METHODIST PRESS.

The Periodical Committee of the East Texas Conference present, in their report, an opinion in which we heartily concur:

"Your Committee are under the impression that as all traveling preachers act as agents for the paper, that it be sent to them free of charge, as our other church papers. The 15 per cent plan, as lately published in the Texas Advocate, we are fearful will work more injuries than it will do good. We hope therefore, that it will meet the views of the Publishing Committees of both Conferences to discontinue the plan."

Just so. The esprit du corps of Methodist preachers is worth more than 15 per cent. Substituting one motive for the other will, we think, prove a failure. Methodist preachers know the relation of their Christian Advocate system to their labors—it is an aid and compliment to their ministry; a coworker. If the paper is what it ought to be, they will promote its circulation from high and disinterested motives. If not, no per cent. on the subscription price will induce them to put it among the families and members of their charges. On the old plan of Agency a minister felt no embarressment in asking a person to take the Advocate; he could recommend it boldly, and even urge its subscription as a duty. Now the suggestion is—"You are after the 15 per cent. There is a quarter-age motive." The difference between a hireling agency and one based on voluntary, disinterested grounds, can be appreciated by Methodist preachers. Cent-per-cent is not the way to set them to work. Make the paper worthy of their agency, and put the per cent., if there is any to spare, into the dividends for widows and orphans. By-and-by we shall hear of a proposition to give each preacher a certain per cent. on his missionary collections!!

Some, 'tis true, and pity 'tis 'tis true, will receive a church paper as agents, free, and do nothing for it. It is to be hoped they are few. But breaking up our whole system of agency, in order to reach these few, will, in the plain and forcible language of the East Texas report, "work more injuries than it will do good."

The California Christian Advocate of December 1 is before us, freighted with good news. The churches at San Jose, Springfield, Mariposa, Stockton and Sacramento were blessed with revival influences. The last especially: over forty conversions and accessions to the Church—(M. E. Church, North.) The Baptist Churches at Stockton and Sacramento were also prospering; quite a number baptised and received. Rev. Mr. Simunds, in a card, thanks the different Methodist churches in San Francisco for the valuable aid furnished the feeble society at Mission Dolores, to enable them to pay for their new church. The net receipts of the tea meetings were about ELEVEN HUNDRED dollars. On the day the church was opened for divine service, they received, through Judge Tracy, a very elegant set of plate for the communion service.

The North Western Advocate says: "The number of conferences that have recommended change of discipline on slavery, as far as is now known, have a majority of three."

Missions to Slaves in Louisiana.—Rev. Dr. Elliott, of the Western Christian Advocate, said, but a short time since, "The truth must be told though the heavens fall,—The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is doing more than any and every other agency to improve the condition of the colored race."

GERMAN SUNDAY SCHOOL.

The first Missionary Anniversary of the German Methodist Sunday Schools of New Orleans, was celebrated on the second Sunday (afternoon) in December. Four Schools united for this purpose; three of them met at the Circle of Nayades street, and marched in procession with flowing Banners up to Felicity street Church, where the Lafayette School met them. The exercises of the meeting was opened with singing and prayer, after which speeches were delivered by the Sunday School children. There were about one hundred and fifty children present. Sixteen pieces were spoken, consisting of Poetry—religious Dialogues, &c., &c. in first rate sound German. Indeed they deserve credit. After these exercises a collection was taken up, amounting to $18. Before the children dispersed, there were cakes distributed among them, and up to the last moment, the finest order prevailed. The officers and Teachers of the various Schools, enjoyed the celebration about as much as the children, as also, the congregation assembled on the occasion.

The Dryades street School in the Second District numbers about 60 children, and is conducted by three officers and 12 Teachers. Some of the children embraced religion lately, others are still seekers.

Piety street school in the Third District, numbers 40 children, is conducted by three officers and 10 Teachers. This school has been growing in interest, and is now in a very promising condition. Some of the children are seekers of religion.

Lafayette school in the Fourth District, numbers 30 children, is conducted by two officers, and eight Teachers. This school promises well for the future.

Carrollton school numbers about 30 children, is conducted by three officers and six Teachers; it has gained greatly in interest lately.

The exact amount of money collected for Missionary purposes will appear in our next report, but it will be nothing short of $125 besides what was collected for the schools.

Revival Intelligence.

An esteemed Christian friend writes good news from Clinton, La. Happy are we to Chronicle it. The young pastor, Rev. J Wheat, has had a happy initiation to the pastorate: he has struck the key-note of his ministry—may it be to the end full of the blessing of the gospel:

Clinton, La., Dec. 26, 1854.

Mr. Editor:—It will be pleasing to some of your readers to know, that, God has visited our town with a season of awakening, and revival. Christians are stirred up to "love, and good works," and are helping forward the "car of Zion," by their faith, and prayers. Some, who have, for a long time, been halting between two opinions, during our gracious revival have concluded to cast their lots in with the people of the Lord. Forty-three persons have united with the Methodist Church in this place. A goodly proportion of whom, are persons of influence and weight of character, who know, and feel what they have taken on themselves in assuming Church membership. May all, who have come in, be pillars in the temple of our divine master, which shall stand during Time, in the kingdom of grace; during Eternity, in the kingdom of glory!

Some, who were careless heretofore, have been much wrought upon by the Spirit of God, and have listened with serious attention; but in despite of their convictions have said to the Spirit "Go thy way for this time." May the same Spirit follow them to their homes, their shops and stores, and give them no rest until they seek, and find "rest in Christ."

I hope those, who have been with us in former days, and who have wept, and prayed for Clinton, will not cease to pray, that the good Lord may carry on his own work, 'till the "prince of peace" shall reign over the whole town. W.

Moreau St.—This Church, in Third District of New Orleans, under charge of Rev. J. A. Ivey is enjoying a season of refreshing. The Christmas and New Year's holidays have been spent in a protracted meeting. Services continue every night. Up to this time about thirty have been converted and added to the Church. The pastor is aided by Rev. B. Alexander, lately transfered from Tennessee Conference.

TEXAS CONFERENCE.

The Texas Annual Conference commenced its fifteenth session in Chappell Hill, Dec. 13th, and closed on the 19th.

Bishop Early was early on the ground. Although this is his first Episcopal tour he seemed perfectly at home in the chair of an Annual Conference. Prompt and energetic in the dispatch of business, his gentlemanly deportment, his affability, and kindness won the hearts of the preachers and people.

When the hour arrived each day for opening the morning session, instead of presenting the usual appearance of bustling business, the Conference Room was filled with preachers and people engaged in a prayer meeting, the Bishop taking the lead in exhorting sinners—comforting mourners, and stirring up the people of God to struggle for a deeper work of grace. These morning prayer meetings awakened a spirit of devotion throughout the community, and we had what is becoming of late entirely too uncommon, a Conference revival. On the last day the following resolution was adopted unanimously:

"Resolved, That we tender our warmest thanks to Bishop Early for the efficient, energetic, and very satisfactory manner in which he has conducted the business of our Annual Conference, and that we will pray for the special Providence of God to conduct him safely to the bosom of his family, and spare his life for many years to continue a blessing to the church and the world."

The preachers presented the Bishop a splendid Texas saddle, as a memento of their affection for him, and symbol of the Itinerancy in Texas. It is yet on horseback.

The Missionary Anniversary was an interesting occasion. Rev. W. H. Seat, and Bishop Early, were the speakers, and nobly did they plead a noble cause, but I am ashamed to confess it, (after reading your account of the Mississippi Anniversary in which you state that their collections amounted to only 700 dollars,) I am ashamed to acknowledge, ours fell a little short of five hundred dollars.

Statistics.—We report this year, 6335 whites and 1817 colored members, and 114 local preachers—an increase in our membership, of 345. We have 36 Sunday Schools—38 superintendants and 215 teachers. We have 62 churches, and our church property is estimated at $96 900.

Itinerancy.—Frederick Roedenlinen, John W. Cape, James W. Points, T. B. Buckinham, August Engel, Gustavus Elly and John C. Kopp were admitted on trial in the travelling connection.

James McLeod, Robert M. Drake, Andrew Davis and Gideon W. Cottinham were re-admitted.

Pleasant M. Yell, Wm. L. Kidd, J. W. Leadbetter and Wm. G. Foote were located at their own request.

Rev. F. A. Owen, book agent, was with us, and by his pleasing address and effective preaching made a fine impression upon the Texas Conference. He gave us the most satisfactory assurance that he would afford us every facility in his power for establishing a Book Depository in our midst for continuing the publication of the Texas Christian Advocate, and for commencing a new paper in the German language. We hope to commence the German Reformer in April or May. Could not some of your wealthy brethren aid us by making a handsome donation to purchase types, etc., to begin with. This is a work which christianity, philanthropy, and patriotism demand at our hands.

Educational.—We have five Literary Institutions, under the control of the Conference. Rutersville College, Bastrop Academy, Chappell Hill Institute, Andrew Female College at Huntsville, and Paine Female Institute at Gulied. These are all in a prosperous condition. In addition, our Conference have resolved to establish another of a high order, designed exclusively for students well advanced, who wish to take a regular Collegiate Course.

A Tract Society was organised, and Rev Allen M. Box appointed Tract Agent.

Our next session is to be held in your neighboring city of Galveston. Can you not pay us a visit! Yours etc.,

A Pointed Reply.—One of the most remarkable replies we remember ever to have heard is attributed to Mr Oulton, the barrister. Some one in his hearing used the hackneyed sarcasm that between the Churches of England and Rome there is but a paper wall. "True," said he, "but the whole Bible is printed on it."

NEW YEAR.

Eighteen hundred and fifty-four has gone to swell the long catalogue of years previous, freighted with a varied and eventful history. Many who hailed its advent with joy, and saw bright hopes and brilliant promises beckoning to them from it, have faltered and fallen along the way. Many who looked on its birth darkly and sorrowfully have seen guiding-stars spring up in their path, and now push on in the journey with strong hearts and high hopes. It is full of burials in the recollection of some—of christenings in the memories of others: crowned here with the yew and cypress—there with the olive and laurel.

In its general character the year just ended is like the years that preceded it; for the web of life has always the same warp and woof through the colors stand out more darely or brilliantly at one time than another. In its own private history, however, eighteen hundred and fifty-four must be deemed unusually eventful and important: not so much so as those that have turned the fate of the world—that have obliterated the effects of years previous and moulded those which were to succeed: not so much so as that in which Alaric conquered the Romans, or that in which Charles Martel saved Europe from a Saracen mastery: not so much so as that of Magna Charta, or of Cromwell, or of Napoleon's defeat, or of our own Declaration. These years were celebrated by the birth, the success or the defeat of great principles, and this dead one has not witnessed any thing analogous. It has, nevertheless, seen the steady advance of what was initiated before, and given its influence and labors in behalf of the right. It has taken what was given it, guarded the trust with care, and committed it with more than a common accretion to its successor.

Prominent among the principles advanced by it is the one embodied in the opening of Japan to commerce and civilization. The full effects of this measure are not now to be summed up, but when another century shall have followed the last, the briefest history will be sure to date its notice of Japan from the year when it first really entered into a national existence. The revolution in Spain and that in China are in some points analagous to the opening of Japan, and show that liberty and learning have become more strong and imperative within the twelve month past, and even able to make some inroads into hostile territory. The same fact, too, looks out from the revolutions and contests of Mexico, New Grenada, Peru, Venezuela, and most of the other South American States. Knowledge has extended itself. The people have learned that they had rights, where before they knew not of their existence, and have demanded the enjoyment of them.

It is very much to be doubted whether the morality of the world has increased in a ratio proportionate with the increase of knowledge. Some of the most terrible crimes ever committed have been during 1854, and we recollect no year when murders were more frequent or robberies and rascality more general. Villany has been grander and more colossal in its proportions also. Schuyler and Meiggs throw Swartwout and all similar financiers completely into the back ground and vindicate to themselves the highest honors of rascality. Forgery and theft have been almost epidemic. Failures, too, of honest and honorable men have been unusually numerous and severe. Banks have exploded one after another in every direction producing as wide-spread distress as any year that can be cited.

The mortality of 1854 has been immense. Cholera has surpassed any of its previous outbreaks in extent and fatality, being simultaneously at Copenhagen and Barbadoes, New York, Paris and Messina. In Naples twenty thousand fell in one week, and one-third of the entire population of some of the West India Islands have been taken off by it. The yellow fever has been epidemic in this country. The loss of life and property at sea has been unprecedented. More ocean steamships have foundered or been wrecked since the first day of last January than were in existence ten years ago. When the full maritime report of the year is made up it will astonish every one.

The war between France, England and Turkey against Russia is a prominent event in the year's record. Its result, if continued, will affect the world more lastingly than all of Napoleon's. If immediately ended it will still be remembered for the fruitless efforts of the Allies in the Baltic, and the gallant conduct of the Russians at Sebastopol.

In this country the discussion of the Nebraska Bill, and the rise and rapid growth of a new political party are perhaps, as important events as any. The crops have been generally good, notwithstanding fears to the contrary, and the business of the country has proved to be on a sound basis by standing up successfully under a severe pressure.

This is but an allusion to some of the more prominent events that have occurred during the year eighteen hundred and fifty-four, and yet it is all that our space will allow. We welcome the advent of fifty-five, trusting that it will be more prosperous and golden than its predecessor, and make compensation for past sufferings by future joys. We hope that all of our readers may enjoy a Happy New Year, and a great many of them, and that when 1856 makes his appearance they will be able to look back on a profitable and well-spent year.

IMMIGRATION.

"Twenty-three thousand immigrants from foreign countries arrived at the port of New York, in one day, last week."

The return of some few hundred emigrants to Ireland and Germany, since the present agitation on the question of citizenship had birth, has been cited by the opposers of the movement as evidence that no action could be had in the premises without stopping all foreign immigration and driving home many who have already arrived and settled down in business. It might have been argued in contradiction that the premises warranted no such conclusion; that a certain proportion of all who arrived might naturally be expected, within a few years, to return to the lands from whence they emigrated, either to see old friends, revisit old places, or, with the competency acquired here, to settle down and spend the evening of life where its morning dawned. We know that such has always been the case, and it is a natural inference that it will always remain so. The number who return will be in some ratio to those who leave, and the greater the number who come to our shores the greater will be the number who go from them.

It was proper to have said something of this sort in reply to those who have argued a fearful and dangerous depopulation of the country if the rights and privilegee of American citizenship were conferred with a less open hand upon foreigners. A more convincing argument, and one that cuts under that which is the basis and whole support of the terrorists, is deduced from the statement we have placed at the head of this article.

Their logic sprang from the fact that some hundreds of foreigners returned to their native land when the subject of an extension of the period of naturalization was first mooted. Here is the opposing fact that, notwithstanding the general publicity which has been given to the coming movement in nearly every county of every country in Europe, twenty-three thousand immigrants arrived at a single port in a single day. The fact carries argument, inference and corollary along with it. So long as land and living are cheaper here than elsewhere; so long as personal rights are unrestricted; so long as every privilege of life except this one of suffrage—which is a right not enjoyed or understood by the majority of those who arrive here—are guaranteed and maintained; so long as a man may worship as he pleases, speak as he chooses and act as he sees fit, with a constant opportunity to make to himself a competency if not a fortune, just so long the American people may legislate about naturalization until they get tired;—extending the necessary period to twenty, forty or a hundred years, and foreigners will continue to come—immigration to remain as it is and has been. The majority of immigrants who arrive here know nothing of suffrage at home, but very much of taxation, religious intolerance and actual suffering. From all these they are freed forever the moment they tread on our shores. It is only that portion that has grown fat here and been enlightened that so lustily cries for more, or that which is influenced by causes not at all commendable. Thus far citizenship has been considered a privilege and inestimable right. If shared with every one—if given away without price or respect—it is likely to lose something of its original rank and respect.

We are glad to see that immigration hither continues up to its old standard. We welcome every new comer to this pleasant land of our fathers. We welcome him to our healthful skies and verdant fields. We greet his accession to the great inheritance which we have enjoyed. We welcome him to the blessings of good government and religious liberty. We welcome him to the treasures of science and the delights of learning. We welcome him to the transcendent sweets of domestic life, to the happiness of kindred and parents and children." Our fields and plains are still broad and ample, and the efforts of every laborer crowned with a fitting reward. Let every one come, from every notice, and enjoy with us what we enjoy. Only let our rights and privileges be so guarded and surrounded that they shall not be lost by ignorance, intolerance or presumption.

AMERICAN MEDIATION.

In the present embroiled state of European affairs it has seemed desirable to some of the merchants of New York and other Northern cities that the Government of the United States should offer its services as a mediator between the contending nations, and endeavor to reconcile existing difficulties. The plan first appeared in the shape of a petition and was cordially seconded by a portion of the public press, even before matters became more complicated by the alliance of Austria with the Western powers. It is since reported to have come before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs and been favorably received. Very possibly that Committee in its report may make such a recommendation as to ensure the offer.

There is no danger that in the event of this Government's proffering its services towards an adjustment of the difficulties that induced and have continued the present war between Russia and the Allies, the offer would be received in any other than a respectful manner. If done properly we should run no risk of receiving any recommendations from either party to attend to our own business. Russia is, and always has been, friendly to the United States, and Great Britain is certainly anxious to be, for the present, on a good footing with her "transatlantic cousins." But it may be very seriously doubted whether either party would feel inclined to accept the overture, or whether, in case of the mediation being accepted on one side it would not almost certainly be rejected on the other. It is to be doubted whether any thing practical would come out of our interferences; and whether, in case there should, we should not subject ourselves to much expensive and delicate negotiation only to see our onward set aside and find ourselves taunted for partiality and incompetency by both parties. If mediation could have accomplished any thing it would, seemingly, have been done at a much earlier day by either Austria or Prussia, who were both ready and anxious to reconcile the belligerents and save themselves from the dangers and expense of protracted war. Their form of Government is more analagous to that of both parties than our own, their union is much closer, their interests are more common and their diplomacy certainly more subtle and studied than our "54:40 or fight" style of debate. Even as this moment Austria maintains a quasi neutrality, which she is endeavoring to improve to a reconciliation; and should she fail, Prussia has not been drawn into the conflict, and can continue to be the Mercury if not the Rhadamanthus of the belligerents.

But we are doubtful whether mediation or reference is now possible, let the offer come from what source it may. The questions by which the war had its origin have become of secondary importance. Both parties have gone into this contest and both have received some severe blows—enough to beget an exceeding angry spirit without sufficient reverses to render them reasonable. If either side had suffered excessively—if the Allied army had been swept from the Crimea or Sebastopol fallen—their feet—we should have far higher and more sanguine expectations of our overtures of peace being listened to. Such things have occurred. All the national pride and animosity has been aroused, and each feels confident of ultimate victory over the other. There are injuries to be redressed and avenged which do not leave a fitting frame of mind for friendly negotiation.

If, nevertheless, our legislators think themselves capable of bringing about a new era of good will, of restoring harmony and international equilibrium, there is no harm in their making the attempt. It would be a good escape pipe for much legislative rhetoric, and leave no worse off if no better. England is not particularly entitled to our good services on account of favors done us, but Russia once offered to mediate between Great Britain and this country and France actually aided us. So in the event of our offer being accepted, we should in some wise return favors for which we are still in debt.

A High Salary Refused.—The Rev. Dr. Potter, the new Episcopal Bishop of New York, has voluntarily relinquished $4000 of the $8000 voted by the Diocesan Convention as his annual salary. The Bishop says he has done this from a conviction of what is right. He thinks he can get on in New York city with $4000 per annum and rent free.

A young man named Ryan entered a Church in Cincinnati a few nights ago and stole from the pulpit a Bible and hymn book. He afterwards pawned them for thirty cents for the purpose of treating his friends, at the same time boasting of his theft. He was arrested and locked up.

Death of Gov Dorr.—Thomas Wilson Dorr, generally called "Governor" Dorr, died at his residence Providence, R. I., on the 27th ult. The life of Mr Dorr is interesting. Inasmuch as under his leadership the principle of Rhode Island made their first stand for the extension of the right of suffrage, and took up arms to defend what they considered an unattainable right denied to them by the dominant power, under the old charter of Charles the Second.

OBITUARY:

DIED.—Holmes county, Miss., Sept. 15, 1854, SARAH A. CLOWER, wife of B. R. Clower, and daughter of G. W. and Catherine Sigler. She professed religion about eight years ago, and attached herself to the Methodist Church, and maintained her Christian course to the end of her pilgrimage.

Her numerous friends and relatives mourn her sudden departure, "but mourn not as those who have no hope," as her uniform Christian course warrants the belief that she has gone to a happier and brighter world, where tears, afflictions and sorrows are unknown. A.

BLACK HAWK, Doo. 18, 1854.

JOSEPH H. PALMER—Was born in Brunswick county, Virginia, and died in October last, at Mississippi city, aged 41 years. He came to New Orleans in the fall of 1844, and continued a resident of it until his death. He had been a member of the Methodist Church for many years before and at once took an active part in sustaining the Poydras St. Church, and in the spread of Methodism throughout the city. His heart glowed with a holy enthusiasm to advance the cause of Christ, and to be instrumental in doing good. He became a prominent and very efficient member of the South Wesley Bible Society giving largely to its support and was at the time of his death one of its managers. He was a teacher in the Sabbath School, a class leader, and a church steward: in these positions he was liberal, punctual, and zealous. To no one is the Carondulet street Church more indebted for liberal plans and success during the past few years; and from no one have the ministers who have been sent to the city derived more encouragement. His hopeful and hearty interest in the cause of Methodism in New Orleans often cheered their hearts and lifted their hands.

He bequeathed a tenth of his estate ultimately to the cause of missions—indeed in the respect of giving he was in advance of most Christians. He had taken a position which must ultimately be that of all who profess Christ—that his obligation to his Saviour could not be met by inconsiderable returns but must be discharged by systematic offerings to the treasury of the Lord, to the extent of self-denial. He often said too, that as he gave the Lord blessed him—that his temporal no less than his spiritual welfare was advanced by what he did for his Master's cause.

He constantly sought after the blessing of entire sanctification—a blessing which, alas! too many of our people are regarding as unattainable, forgetting that "this kind goeth not out, but by prayer and fasting."

When he knew that he must die, and was asked if he felt ready and willing to go, he answered, O yes, yes: and looked surprised that any could suppose it to be any other way with him. While he stayed with us his faith, hope, and charity lighted up his heart, his life, and the circle of his Christian friends; but now his faith has changed to sight, his hope has vanished in the possession of its object and his love burns yet more brightly for he is present with the Lord. "Help Lord for the godly man ceaseth." K.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 25, 1854.

FAYETTE, Miss. Dec. 26, 1854.

Dear Brother—I am instructed to send the following preamble and resolutions respecting Brother McCall, passed by our last Quarterly Conference.

Whereas in the disposition of Providence, it has pleased the great head of the Church to remove from among us our beloved Brother Dugald G. McCall. It is therefore unanimously resolved by the Quarterly Conference of the Coles Creek Circuit:

1st. That in the death of Brother McCall the church has lost one of its most pious members, the Quarterly Conference one of its most efficient Stewards and Class leaders, and the community one of its best citizens, and that while we sorrow deeply at his death, his long life of Christian integrity and earnest piety prevents the sorrow which has no hope.

2nd. That we sincerly sympathize with the family of our deceased brother in this sad bereavement, and that this expression of our sympathy be communicated to the family by the Secretary, and also published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate and the Southern Watch Tower.

W. H. WATKINS, President.

B. F. JONES, Secretary.

To

TO THE CONFERENCE AGENTS OF THE TRACT SOCIETY OF THE METHODIST CHURCH, SOUTH:

Brethren—Having been elected to the Secretaryship of the Tract Society, I am desirous of hearing from each of you at your earliest convenience, at Nashville, Tenn. I wish to learn your addresses—the prospect you have severally of obtaining the requisite number of suitable persons for colporters—the point or points suitable for depots for Tracts, and Tract volumes, within the bounds of your respective conferences—and any other information you have to communicate.

Any monies you may have in hand, or that may be in the hands of the Treasurers of your Conference Tract Societies, you will please remit to me at once, at Nashville, as the successful prosecution of our great undertaking will require funds at an early day.

In the mean time, until you hear further from me, or the Parent Board, it is desirable that you employ your time in raising funds for the cause—remitting us promptly as possible—as we shall be unable to determine upon what scale to project our plan of operations, until we can form an opinion from your remittances, as to the amount of funds we may expect to realize.

SUNDAY SCHOOL VISITOR—NEW ARRANGEMENT.

The same hindrances which delay the publication of the Home Circle, will retard, for a time, the appearance of the Sunday School Visitor. We wish to employ every possible advantage of skill and experience, so as to put forth a Child's Paper that will be hailed by its readers with a hearty welcome. This we cannot do just yet. The editor, however, is all ready, and we will issue the Visitor at the earliest possible day—say, last of January, or first of February.

But we beg all officers and patrone of our Sunday Schools to consider the necessity of extending to this paper a large, prompt, and continuous patronage. We have to compete from the start, with similar publications, which are sustained by over a hundred thousand subscribers, and are thus enabled to employ the most costly materials and embellishments. Will you not, dear brethren, so rally to the support of your Sunday School Paper as to enable us to compete with those periodicals, without allowing our publishing interests to suffer?

It is believed that the size of the Visitor was much greater than necessary; it will, therefore, be reduced, tastefully embellished, and, in every way, handsomely executed.

Terms.—The Sunday School Visitor will be published monthly, at Nashville, Tenn., by Stevenson & Owen, according to the following scale:

Single copies,	40 cts. per annum
From 5 to 20 copies sent to one address,	34 " " "
From 20 to 50 " " "	25 " " "
From 50 to 100 " " "	20 " " "
100 and over,	15 " " "

When packages of five or more are sent to one address, the person to whom they are directed must be responsible for the distribution of the papers.

It will thus be seen that the terms are as low as possible, and the subscriptions must, therefore, be paid INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

All communications and exchanges must be sent to L. D. Huston, Editor. Subscriptions to STEVENSON & OWEN.

Notice.—It is our earnest desire that the Minutes of the Annual Conference should be published at as early a period as practicable after the close of their present sessions. In order to this, it will be necessary for the Conference Secretaries to forward to our address, at Louisville, Ky., with as little delay as practicable, the minutes of their respective Conferences, accurately prepared, and in due form, and written in a clear and legible hand. Of the several Conferences, whose sessions have already been held, we have received, as yet, the minutes of BUT ONE! Our worthy Superintendents will please look well to this matter. STEVENSON & OWEN, Agents.

MORTUARY.—The total interments of the city for the week ending Sunday morning were 169. This betokens an extremely healthful condition of the city.

THE CITY VS. THE PONTCHARTRAIN RAILROAD Suit for the recovery of Bonds.—A joint committee of the City Council was appointed a few weeks since to ascertain what had become of the city's subscription of $500,000—five hundred bonds of one thousand dollars each—issued to the Pontchartrain Railroad Company, in furtherance of building a railroad to Mobile, which was sanctioned by a vote of our citizens last summer. The result of that committee's investigations was made known to the Council in secret session at its last meeting; and the result of the Council's secret action thereon is now made apparent, in the institution of a suit in the Sixth District Court, by the City Attorney and Mr. Roselius, for the recovery of the bonds. The cloud of secrecy in which this egg was hatched also enveloped the incipiency of the legal proceedings, the petition of the City Attorney having been filed in the Sixth District Court on Friday, on which evening upon our usual visit there, we were informed that nothing of public interest had transpired during the day.

The petition, after recounting in detail the circumstances under which the bonds were issued, sets forth that "Petitioner charges and believes the President and Directors of said Railroad Company have not applied and appropriated the bonds of your petitioner to the construction of said railroad, but that they have illegally, and in violation of the rights of your petitioner and of the act of the Legislature, of the 15th of March, 1854, and of the 28th of June, 1854, sold, transferred or pledged said bonds, or a large portion thereof, for the purpose of paying or to secure the payment of certain debts contracted by said railroad company previous to the subscription (to the stock of the road) of your petitioner.

"Petitioner further charges that among other debts for which said bonds were sold, transferred or pledged, was a large debt illegally incurred by the President and Directors of said railroad company, to secure the passage of the Act of the Legislature of the 15th of March, 1854, and of the Ordinance of 16th of June, 1854, and to obtain the approval of the duly qualified voters of the city of New Orleans to said ordinance; your petitioner now avers that said debts, contracted as aforesaid, are not a legal and valid charge against the stockholders of said railroad company, and that said stockholders are not bound legally or equitably to pay any portion of said debts contracted as aforesaid, and that the pledge or transfer of the bonds of your petitioner to secure or pay said debts as contracted is illegal, void and of no effect, and that by said sale, pledge or transfer, the President and Directors of said railroad company have violated the conditions under which your petitioner became a stockholder.

"Your petitioner further avers and believes that said debts so aforesaid amount to the large sum of $500,000 or thereabouts."

The petition goes on to aver that as the bonds in question were used for other purposes than those for which they were issued the conditions on which the subscription was made were violated, and that the city, in law and equity, has a right to reclaim and recover possession of said bonds. It is further averred that the company has no longer the right or ability to construct the road to Mobile; first, because the road was not commenced within a period of six months as required, from the date of its charter; and secondly, because the Company has become insolvent and has no means wherewith to execute so expensive an undertaking. It is further alleged that according to the terms of the act of the Legislature authorizing the city to subscribe to the stock of the road, it is required, among other things, that stock to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars should be subscribed by other stockholders besides the city, but such is the discredit into which the railroad company has now fallen, that not a single share of said stock has been taken, though abortive attempts have been made to induce persons to make a nominal subscription for it.

Furthermore, it is alleged that the bonds are illegally withheld from petitioner by the President and Directors of the Company for their individual benefit, or for the benefit of the Company as it stood before the time that the act in relation to the extension of the road to Mobile was passed by the Legislature, as the project of extending the road to Mobile is now wholly abandoned by the defendants.

Petitioner therefore prayed that a writ of injunction issue enjoining the Company from pledging or in any manner disposing of the bonds in question; also, that a writ of sequestration issue commanding the sheriff to sequester the bonds in whose hands soever they may be found, and that after due proceedings had, petitioner's subscription to the stock of the road be cancelled and rendered void, etc.

From the exhibit of the affairs of the Pontchartrain Railroad Company, furnished by the Secretary to the Stockholders on the first Monday in December it appears that of the city bonds 83 have been sold; 309 pledged; or for payment of a debt of $171,028 16; and the remaining 108 are still "on hand." These 108 rejected as being on hand, have been taken to New York by Mr Egerton and are, probably negotiated by this time.

The present Directors of the New Orleans and Mobile Railroad Company—Messrs B Pemberton, B Rock and A H Barnes—have had nothing to do with the psychus transactions of the Pontchartrain Railroad Company, they having been elected to fill the vacancies of Messrs. De Sanilles, Helms and Mittenberger. Mr. James had not been a Director for more than six weeks, and we learn that he declines being a candidate for re-election, in the election which takes place to-day.

BALLOONING.—M. Godard, the celebrated aeronaut, made his two hundred and thirty-third ascension from Congo Square, in this city, on Monday evening last. There was a great crowd assembled to see the filling of the balloon and its ascent. Owing to the fault of some of the workmen employed, as I not on account of any negligence on the part of the Gas Company, the balloon was not ready to take its departure until 4 53 P. M., at which moment it began to leave things terrestrial for those that are celestial, and slowly but beautifully sailed off toward the northern horizon—the music playing, flags flying, and assembled thousands cheering at the top of their lungs. There was very little wind and the balloon was visible for a long time, growing smaller and smaller, until distance and darkness hid it from sight.

We have received a call from M. Godard, who informs us that the highest altitude attained was 11,500 feet, at which height it was so excessively cold as to compel a retreat to a warmer atmosphere. At 7 45 the voyageurs descended at Amite Settlement, 100 miles from New Orleans to the great terror and bewilderment of all the little folks and negroes in that section, who thought that nothing less than the devil himself could come sweeping downward in that wise. They took the cars to Clinton, and the next morning embarked at Port Hudson on the steamboat and reached here safely Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock.

THE STORM IN THE BLACK SEA.

DISASTROUS LOSSES.

The London Times of December 5 gives, in a leading article, the following statement of the losses sustained in the Black Sea by the late terrible storm there:

Of the many and great losses suffered by the Anglo-French Expedition in no one case or another, the ruin of the Fleet of Navarino of which we have at length the melancholy details may almost be regarded as the worst. It is true that the immediate loss of men is not to be compared with the numbers placed hors de combat at the battles of the Alma and Inkermann, still less with the victims of cholera. In this instance however the loss come in the form and in a time, the most unfortunate that could be desired by the worst enemy of the expedition. The total loss of men at the various stations on the coast of the Crimea on the Armstrong hulk can not be less than a thousand, besides those that have fallen into the hands of the Cossacks! The loss of transports, chiefly British and French wrecked and built as many dismasted at Balaklava, and eighteen wrecked or dismasted at the mouth of the Katcha.

Our men-of-war, thanks to the precaution of frequently trying their cables, have come off with no further damage than the loss of guns, or of sometyon of rigging; the twisting of their rudders, or the splinging some decks. The French have lost the heavy 14 a mahogany-decker, the Henri Quatre and another war steamer. This last we have ascertained no less beyond the ordinary drain of war; but the greatest calamity is that of which we scarcely now know the full. The Prince a magnificent new screw steamer of 2,700 tons, carried out the other day to Balaklava the 50th Regiment, all the winter clothing for the troops engaged in the siege, including 40,000 great-coats, flannel suits, under-clothing, socks and gloves, beef, pork and other provisions, hospital stores for scurvy, and a vast quantity of shot and shell to carry on the siege. These are wholly lost, and nothing remains of the Prince but half-a-dozen of her numerous crew, who managed to get on the rocks when she was "broken to powder" against them. The Resolute, with 900 tons of gunpowder, rose went to the bottom. Thus, it seems, all the materials for carrying on the siege and providing against the severity of the winter have been carried off at one fell swoop, and even if we think to continue the war, we are merely maintaining our position on the heights before Sebastopol. It is evident that we are not in a condition to stand our worst foe, the coming winter.

Figures are but feeble language for the description of such a catastrophe, but the value of the Prince, as she floated is put down at £150,000, and her cargo at half a million. There must have been nearly 200 souls on board.

The thirty transports utterly lost, with most of their crews, at Balaklava, are put down at £1,500,000. So far as at present can be known, of money we put to the bottom in a form of which money conveys but a faint idea. The other losses enumerated above, the French ship of line and war steamer, the transports lost on the western coast, the many vessels of all kinds disabled, make up another million to be added to the naked pecuniary estimate of the loss. But the true way of stating it is, that the army is utterly disabled for the present, and left no other protection but Heaven, and that valor which the British soldier never sure to display in the face of the greatest difficulties, the direst privations, and the most overwhelming numbers. Yet never was the ancient valor of our race put to such tremendous a trial. The tempest, which is said to have been the most terrible ever known in that part of the world, and which overthrew three of the minarets of Sultan Achmet's Mosque at Constantinople, besides driving huge vessels from their moorings before the city, did not spare the allies even on land. It blew down and grievously injured their tents, feeble protection though they were against the cold of a Crimean winter at the height of 700 feet above the neighboring surge. And to the situation in which the army finds itself suddenly deprived of the much wanted supply of clothing and coal for the winter, and the equally needful ammunition for the siege

GLOOMY CONDITION OF THE ARMY.

A letter from Constantinople, dated Nov 20, says:

The boat from the Crimea has arrived, but without any army mail. We have intelligence, however, from the Camp up to the 18th. No firing, beyond an occasional shot, had taken place for three days. In fact, all active operations were suspended. Sir De Lacy Evans has resigned his command and come down here ill.

The writer of the same letter says:

With regard to the hutting of the troops I am sorry to say that the prospect seems rather gloomy, as no foresight has been shown in the matter, and every thing remains to be done. The order for the huts which came to command this large number of buildings is dated the 12th of November, and was not received in Constantinople until the 17th. The list of articles required is of enormous length, and it is totally beyond the capabilities of this part of the world to furnish them. Orders will be sent off to Malta and other places, and with great efforts the thousands of trowels and Gammers and the hundreds of thousands of nails may be furnished within a month from the present time. The wood will not be forthcoming even at so early a date, and the line of so large a portion of these transports will still further retard operations. Then comes the period necessary for the construction, which will not be less than three or four weeks, considering the unlikelihood of bringing every thing six miles along an uncovered road. In short, I am assured that the troops will probably not be in their huts for nearly three months, and that they cannot by any means have them ready by less than two. They will therefore, have to brave the fury of the elements and the cold of the Russian hills until at least the end of March or April. Without any protection but that of their tents, already much injured by the storm of the 14th. This added to the destruction of the stock of winter clothing to the Prince, makes their position one not to be looked forward to without apprehension.

The following letter is from an Assistant Surgeon:

BALAKLAVA, Nov. 10 and 12.

Here we are, after a wet night, moving on a mud bank, inches deep in dirt, in a miserable and comfortless condition—every thing wet and cold; but we are as cheerful as ever, though the fall of Sebastopol is as far as ever from our gaze. So we are to stay here for the winter and encamp in huts! Fancy us under canvas, on a hill slope, with incessant rain, which comes over through into the tent and makes every thing wet or damp, so that any chance for the better is impossible. The camp is a mud hole, and the poor horses stand shivering in the rain and wind most pitifully. Our only chance is for peace, or else to die, as any loss of men could not supply the hearts in our Highlanders or any of the chiefs—men can be replaced; horses cost money. This weather, we are told, will continue to Christmas, and then snow sets in. Wood has been ordered for hutting the horses, and we are told to stay and get canvas until Christmas; but the wood has not yet appeared, being only ordered two days ago, just as the lines ought to have been built. Meanwhile we are surrounded by a large body of Russians; some of them occupy the houses which we have so humanely spared while under our possession. They also enjoy the forage and bullocks which we humanely paid for (or gave tickets of payment for) but which the enemy is now enjoying. Every where they have burnt what they could not remove; but we pay for every thing and destroy nothing.

At Alma we lost two days—most important days—in staying to bury their dead and see to their wounded, while they, panic-struck, were running away at the cry of "the English are coming;" and leaving all behind them. Had Cathcart and Eyre then been listened to we had pursued them into Sebastopol without opposition which the former offered to take with his division alone. As it was, they had time to recover themselves and to build immense mud batteries round the town, which will have fired at, night and day, for four weeks, without destroying. Our guns will not burn to day so warm as to admit of the question, besides sitting under wet canvas is not conducive to heat. I heard 2000 more French have just gone down to Balaklava, so the force there is over English and French, and it is safe. Medical matters are in a wretched state; those about Smith seem to consider for service come to the Crimea without reporting themselves. As it is, we have too few men and scarcely any at Scutari. Our ration of rice is stopped. It seems it had been issued to the Turks, and the Commissariat found the mistake without a supply. This is the way things are managed. Our biscuit is fortunately very good. I envy the Guards nitty with dirt and vermin; the latter infest the Highlanders more or less. These beautiful coats you admire are their daily and only dress, and the Russians call their splendid jackets gold night-dresses. Lord Cardigan still figures in the 11th uniform.

RUSSIAN AMATEUR ON THE WALLS OF SEBASTOPOL.

We extract the following from a journal of the siege of Sebastopol published by the Paris Constitutionnel. It is under the date of the 27th of November.

The best shots in the various corps provided with rifles have been collected into two volunteer companies, and the address of these marksmen puts a stop to the Russian batteries. "If never they have still to pick off as they say in Monsieur an paletot blanc. The following is the explanation of that phrase: "The person in question is an amateur, an old soldier, perhaps, who, every day at some undetermined hour advances in front of the fortifications with a piece of cannon, drawn by men; has it placed in battery by his attendants giving himself the pleasure of firing it off himself. He ordinarily plants the first shot in which in every conceivable attitude, he packed together while exposing as many thirty or forty corpses. The grave diggers stand chatting on the mounds by the sides waiting for the carriage of some better to complete the number of the dead. They speculate on the appearance of the body which is being borne towards them. "It's dressed in red," says one. "It's a Highlander, I think," says another. "No! its my tyrant back again, I assure he is red hair pitch enough." And so on. They discuss the merits of decorated dead sergeants or commanders. "Well he was a jolly good man, many's the time I was thrilled through him, but he's all-cover now." or "Poor Mick! he had fifteen years' service—a better fellow never stepped in." This scene is going on all around the hill side. Frenchmen with officers are also busy looking after their dead and wounded, and in clearing the sad labors of the day. At last the number in the trench is completed—the parapet rises as rapidly as they can be packed. Some of them have upraised arms in the attitude of taking aim; their feet stick up through the mould as it is thrown upon them; others are bent and twisted into shapes like fantoccini, but after each the earth rises upon them, and they are left alone in their glory." No need now for the hopes and fears and all emotions of hundreds of human hearts to be turned with them. For about one mile and a half in length, by half a mile in depth, the hill side is often such sights as these. Upwards of 2700 Russians have been buried by these men, few remain above ground now.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

The steamship Daniel Webster, Captain Lucas, arrived at an early hour on Saturday morning last, bringing San Francisco dates to the 9th.

The San Francisco Herald gives the following description of a tremendous lump of gold recently discovered, and which we believe, was brought to this city by the Daniel Webster:

We chronicled yesterday the finding of an immense lump of quartz gold in Calaveras county, weighing 161 pounds, or 2320 ounces avoirdupois. Estimating it to contain 20 pounds of quartz rock, which is a large allowance, in the opinion of experienced persons who examined it, the actual weight of the gold in it will be 141 pounds, or 2256 ounces avoirdupois, the value of which, at $16 25 per ounce, would be $36 915.

The length of this immense mass is about fifteen inches, and its width from one and one-half to six inches. This is the largest nugget of pure gold ever found in California or in the world.

We extract the following Items of news from the San Francisco papers:

A large nugget of gold weighing 17 lbs., was found in Sonora a week ago, at a depth of four feet; it is intermixed with quartz, and is said to contain 10 lbs of pure gold, and is worth $2,000.

In Calaveras county, near Mokelumne Hill, a beautiful lump of crystalized gold, weighing 14 oz., was picked up on a gulch by an Indian boy.

In Caldwell's Garden, near Shaw's Flat, Tuolumne county, a party of miners have been very successful, having struck a lead which yielded two ounces to the pan. In one lump they took out $1,000.

The South Carolina Company have sold their quartz claim on Carson Hill Calaveras county, to an English company, for the good round sum of $250,000.

A valuable quicksilver mine has been discovered at Bald Mountain, on the range of hills, three miles from the San Joaquin Plains. We also learn that a vein of coal is supposed to be coal has been found on Rabbit Creek, Sierra county. It is of a hard substance, burns slowly, and does not emit any very great heat.

A railroad from Los Angeles to the Colorado is in high favor with many of the leading citizens of the former city. The inhabitants of San Diego are also projecting a railroad to the Colorado.

A salt manufacturing company near Los Angeles has a capital of $250,000 invested.

The telegraph line between Columbia and Stockton will be in operation on the 1st of January.

A sample of cotton grown on the banks of the Sacramento by M. T. O. Selby, has been exhibited by that gentleman, and has demonstrated the adaptation of the soil of the Sacramento Valley for cotton growing.

With the exception of a slight excitement growing out of several indignation meetings held by the citizens of the First Ward, of which mention is made below, San Francisco has been extremely quiet during the past week. Improvements generally have been finished up, and in the wet season very little is doing in that line. A large number of brick buildings have been erected during the season just over, which furnish evidence of the continued prosperity of our growing city.

Meetings of the citizens of the First Ward, to express their sentiments respecting the frauds alleged to have been perpetrated in that ward during the last election, have been held and largely attended. A protest setting forth the grievances of the petitioners was adopted, and a committee appointed to procure signatures. Thus the matter ended.

On Saturday, the 25th, an application was made to the Judge of the Twelfth District for a writ of habeas corpus in discharge certain Russian prisoners on board the Sitka. The point insisted upon by counsel in making the application, seemed to be that the prisoners could not be retained on board the Sitka, as she was a merchant vessel, and also that she had come here from an English port. The Sitka was a Russian American vessel, captured near Petropaulowski and brought here by her rapers after repairing at Mare Island.

The fact of the application created considerable excitement here. The writ was served by a deputy sheriff on the officer second in command of the Sitka, an English naval officer, on the 25th, and the prisoners were to have been brought up on Monday, the 27th. On sunday, the 26th, however, a little after daylight, the Sitka hoisted anchor, got underweigh and left the harbor, probably for Vancouver.

Thus disposing in a very summary manner of the habeas corpus. Mr. Randolph, the attorney at whose instance the writ was served called the attention of the court to the fact of the sailing of the Sitka, and that an attachment might be issued for the officer on whom the writ was served. The object of these suggestions, was evidently to lay the basis for some future action of the Government in relation to the matter.

We learn that several ounces of platinum have been taken out by the miners on the north fork of the Trinity river, and we are informed that it is found in such abundance in that locality, that dealers in gold dust are taking much interest in the valuable metal.

It is reported that Big Lame, Calaveras county, has become the headquarters of a band of Mexican banditti from which they issue out at night and commit every kind of depredations.

A serious affray with Indians has recently taken place. A party of seven persons were traveling from Salt Lake to this State, when they were attacked on the Humboldt River by the Indians. The savages were lying in ambuscade, and were armed with rifles. They fired upon the party and killed four, the other two escaped.

The Indians are very troublesome to the whites in Shasta. They recently ran off with one hundred and ninety head of stock including a number of fine horses. At Oregon Butch, Trinity county, they entered a tent and stole $900, and a large quantity of provisions and blankets.

The Sacramento Gas works are expected to be in full operation on the 15th of January.

From Oregon we learn that gold has been discovered on the Willamette River, some seven or eight miles above Salem. It is found in particles and in quartz.

From Los Angeles we have reports of another Gillon-tering expedition having for its object the overthrow of Mazatlan in Lower California, and that men and money are being raised for the purpose.

It is stated that a new and shorter route from Salt Lake to Carson River, which avoids the Humboldt has been discovered by some intelligent travelers who came over the Plains. They say the new road is well supplied with water and grass. It is calculated at 500 miles while that by the Humboldt is 800.

Flax growing to the top promises to be the most lucrative business in that Territory, in consequence of the great productiveness of the crops.

The business accounts from Placerville are of a very favorable character.

The great ery throughout the whole state is want of room, as is universally expected by the miners, and when it comes heavy strikes of gold are looked forward to.

FROM THE ISTHMUS.

Capt Kennish and party will leave Panama at an early day for the Gulf of San Miguel, to commence their explorations of a canal route in the direction of the Atrato river.

So fast has the work in the Panama Island progressed during the past few weeks, that those who ought to know something about the matter talk confidently of seeing the cars running by the end of January.

Among the passengers who left Panama, a few days since, for Valparaiso on the steamer Santiago, are Frederick A Bevlen, Esq., Secretary of United States Legation to Chili, Capt Harland of the United States frigate Independence, and Capt. Auld, of New Orleans.

MEDIATION.—As pertinent to the movement now afoot in this country to offer the mediation of our Government between the belligerent powers of Europe, we publish the following extract from a leading article of the London Times. We have italicized half a dozen lines below for the benefit of those who particularly favor this movement:

As far as we can venture to form an opinion on so obscure a subject as the policy of the German Powers, who now boast of their union for a common object, it would appear that they entertain a hope of assuming the part of mediators in this quarrel, and of throwing the weight of the large but inert mass of the Germanic Confederation on whichever side may appear to them most favorable for the restoration of peace if such intentions are entertained at Berlin or at Vienna, they now repose on a very incorrect assumption, and on an exaggerated view of the importance we attach to the conduct of those Courts. The Western Powers readily assented to the desire of the German Courts to record in common conferences and protocols the principles which the Four Powers deemed applicable to the alarming situation of the Ottoman Empire, and to the overbearing pretensions of Russia. If the German Courts had been as firmly resolved as France or England to enforce those principles the war would, in all probability, not have broken out at all, or might have been terminated in a single campaign. But, on the contrary, while they have pretended to recognize the same right and objects as the Western Powers, Prussia and Austria have practically given to Russia that neutrality which was all she asked, and they have been apparently more engrossed by a settlement of the paltry differences of the German Confederation than by the grand struggle which has divided the Councils of Europe. The consequence is that they have to a great degree lost the influence they might have exercised over the belligerent States. The Western Powers have for some time past ceased altogether to correspond with Prussia on the affairs of the East, and have left her voluminous Notes on the subject without either answer or acknowledgment. Austria owes whatever importance is still attached to her movements to the inherent state of her army, to the occupation of the Principalities, and to the negotiations she has kept up with London and Paris. But nothing in the attitude or condition of these German States could for a moment justify the assumption on the part of the bank of mediators and arbitrators of the general peace. Whenever the time for negotiation arrives, the Three Great Powers engaged in this war will require and will admit of an intermediate agents to conduct the discussion of those momentous questions, and it can not be admitted that those who have held back in the hour of danger are to resume a leading position on the hour of counsel. The claim of Austria and Prussia to treat at all on these subjects is obviously limited by the measures they may have taken to bring them to a termination consistent with the declarations they had previously made. We have never contested, and we do not now dispute, the undoubted right of any Power to stand entirely aloof from this controversy. In the case of States like Sweden, which have thought it more prudent to preserve a strict neutrality than to join in the war, we have no charge of inconsistency or bad faith to prefer. The fact which stamps the policy of Germany as ridiculous and unworthy of a great nation is, that the German statesmen should have been so eager in tendering their advice, and the German armies so backward in enforcing their counsels.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.

On the evening of the 28th the dwelling house of Mrs M'Talk in St Martinsville, parish of St. Martin, was destroyed by fire. Loss estimated at $8,000.

The St Martinsville Gazette states that on the 27th a young son of Mr V A Fournet was accidentally shot in the arm by his brother.

A slave of Mr. A Metoyer whose plantation is on Bayou Lataunche, was recently entrusted by his master with the charge of the plantation, and while acting in that capacity he so cruelly treated a fellow-slave as to cause his death. He was tried by a jury of slave holders and sentenced to three years' imprisonment in the penitentiary.

The Bayou Sara Chronicle of the 30th states that the tiger is lower than it has ever before been known.

COMPARATIVE LOSS AT WATERLOO AND INKERMANN.—At the battle of Waterloo 24,000 (exact number 23,991) British were engaged, with the following result according to Capt Labarne:

	Officers.	Sergts.	Rank and File.	Total.
Killed	83	82	1252	1417
Wounded	333	27	4289	4529
Totals	416	354	5041	5946

At the battle of Inkermann 8000 British were engaged:

	Officers.	Sergts.	Rank and File.	Total.
Killed	43	52.	384	439 by 3...1317
Wounded	101	121	1711	1933 by 3...5799
Totals	144	173	2095	2372 by 3...7116

During the past year one hundred and ten steamers have been launched from the New York shipyards—forty-three steamers and sixty-seven sailing vessels—the total measurement of which amounts to 81,119 tons. Four steamers and eighteen sailing vessels remain on the stocks, the measurement of which will be 18,375 tons.

THE CITIZEN.—We understand, says the New York Times, that John Mitchel has withdrawn from the Citizen and from public life. One reason for this step is that his eye-sight has been injuriously affected by his labors; and another is the conviction that the extent to which he has been personally identified with the paper has been injurious to its influence and prosperity. He confesses that he has been grievously disappointed in the temper of the American people, finding them much less disposed than he had imagined to encourage the free expression of opinion upon all subjects.

The Citizen lost about ten thousand subscribers in consequence of the proclamation of his desire for an "Alabama plantation well stocked with fat negroes;" and several thousand more followed when he commenced the war upon Archbishop Hughes. Mr. Mitchel declares his intention to remain in entire obscurity for at least four years. He will still distribute, however, to the Citizen, mainly on literary topics, and always under his own signature. The paper will be conducted hereafter by Mr. McClenahan, who has been connected with its editorial department from the beginning.

MR MOLINA, Minister of the States of Costa Rica Guatemala and San Salvador has addressed to the Secretary of State an earnest remonstrance against Col. Kinney's proposed colonization of any portion of the Mosquito territory by American citizens, and further says that any attempt to take possession of any lands belonging to Costa Rica will be opposed by all the means that the government can command.

SINGULAR DEATH.—The Rockingham (Va.) Register relates a story of a man named Lough losing his life by walking some distance with a sharp axe, without a handle, in his pantaloons pocket. After reaching home it was found that the blade had cut entirely through the abdomen, and penetrated the intestines, and in spite of medical aid the man died two days afterwards.

DR BEALE PARDONED.—A telegraphic dispatch yesterday from Philadelphia to this city stated that the Governor of Pennsylvania had pardoned the dentist, Beale, convicted of rape upon the person of Miss Madge.

The Duchess of Sotherland, of the Stowe former, has lost a son in the Crimea. He met with an accidental wound, which was followed by a fever, of which he died on ship-board.

THE YOUNG BRITISH OFFICERS.—Previous to the war, says an English paper, luxury and indulgence appeared to have reached a point the most extravagant. Young men and elderly men seemed to vie with one another in providing means of inordinate self-gratification. The club-houses of the Metropolis became joint stock palaces of refined and elaborate luxuriousness. If, on the early day, or Oak's day of 1853, one had walked into St James's street about 11 o'clock in the morning, there were to be seen the young men of fashion with their admirably appointed carriages, preparing for the sports of the day, and most of them with blue veils tied around their hats intended to be used as guards for their complexion when encountering the sun and dust of the road. If one walked on to the Army and Navy Club-house, by half past 3, the most preposterously luxurious of all the palaces in that neighborhood, there were other similar groups. Among all those young men, though in the dress of civilians, were officers of the regiments generally stationed in London, the very regiments which have been performing such retould-ing feats of valor. These young men who thought it necessary to guard their faces from the sun of a British summer day, are the same who have lain in their tents upon the heights above Sebastopol, scarcely sheltered from the cold damps of a November night and have started with alacrity at the first sound of the trumpet or the drum. In the rare midst of the morning to lead their men into the most terrible conflicts that ever Soldiers were engaged in, and to face death in every terrible aspect that death can assume.

A showman's elephant, as he was being driven through a street "down east," beguiled the time journey by picking up stray wisps of hay with his proboscis; when an Irishman among the bystanders exclaimed: "An' what sort of a baste was that, shure, ateing hay with his tail?"

From the London Morning Advertiser

Causes of the Lack of American Sympathy with the Western Powers.

Every American must speak of the intrigues which for some time past have been in operation, to get up a feeling in the United States, as gradually gaining ground. The feeling of hostility thought and even remembered the ocean, evidently sang needs supplied us handsomely and from the dust of oblivion the materials for embittering alienations, and unfortunately, the pernicious result is to be measured on both sides of the water. We earnestly urge on every public and party the necessity of stopping short this ruinous quarrel. This country is engaged to no war, the end of which no one can foresee. It is a war in which the agree of a whole continent will be brought against such objections as could be enlisted with to take up new impressions in order to engender a deadly animosity between empires of common origin and principles, instead of joining in the struggle for liberty, a union of States which are the personification of self government.

Let not our advice be misunderstood. We do not mean to compromise the fundamental principles of human freedom which exhibit slavery. We do not intend to submit to the arrogance of every freebooter who boasts of "active" origin. We do not acknowledge the doctrine that the trans-Atlantic sentiment is only made for Americans. We openly express our contempt for a Douglas who at St. Petersburgh invited licks the boots of an Emperor. We never will believe that a "democratic feeling" exists in the hearts of a clique which would like to see Europe sweeping by the basilicas in order to give to the United states a chance for acquiring Cuba or Sitka. But just as little do we believe it reasonable to pull up every thing History or other question to a great international parade. Just as little do we believe the very important question must be fought out now. And most emphatically we warn this country against identifying the public opinion of the American Republic with the bawling of some miserable beach-combers, who on it would be our duty to expose, whom we ought not to clothe with an undue importance by representing them as the organs of the American people. Let us take care, lest, by inviting hostilities, we shall arrive at such a pitch of irritation as to bring about a renewal of those hostilities which, in the beginning of this century, were so prejudicial to the efforts we then made for subduing

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Oh, Mother of a Mighty Race.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT

Oh mother of a mighty race,
Yet lovely in thy youthful grace!
The elder dames, thy haughty peers,
Admire and hate thy blooming years.
With words of shame
And taunts of scorn they join thy name.

For on thy cheek the glow is spread
That tints thy morning hills with red;
Thy lips are the wild grape's reviling fleet,
Within thy woods are best more fleet;
The hopeful eye
Is bright as shine our sunny sky.

Ay, let them rail—these haughty ones—
While rolls them drudbest with thy sons.
They do not know how loved thou art,
How many a fond and fearless heart
Would rise to throw
Its life between thee and the foe.

They know not, in their hate and pride,
What virtues with thy children bide;
How true, how good, thy graceful maids
Make bright the flowers, the valley shades;
What generous men
Spring, like thine oaks, by hill and glen.

What cordial welcomes greet the guest
By the love rivers of thy breast;
How flash to keep and death revered,
And man is loved and God is feared
In woodland home,
And where the solemn ocean foams.

There's freedom at thy gates, and rest,
For Earth's down-trodden and oppressed,
A shelter for the hunted head,
For the strayed laborer toil and bread—
Power at thy bounds
Stops and calls back his baffled hounds.

Oh, fair young mother! on thy brow
Shall sit a nobler grace than now.
Deep in the brightness of thy skies
The coming years in glory rise,
And, as they fleet,
Keep strength and richness at thy feet.

Thine eye, with every coming hour,
Shall brighten, and thy form shall tower,
And when thy sisters, elder born,
Would brand thy name with words of scorn,
Before thine eye
Upon their lips the taunt shall die.

Three Gentlemen In One.

One of the frequenters of the Palais Royal, then called the Palais Cardinal, was Racan, a man of letters, and remarkable for his abscence of mind. The Cardinal used to be highly amused at the scrapes into which this quality led him, and the practical jokes of which he made him the victim. The day he was received into the Academy, all Paris was assembled to hear the address which it was usual to hear on such occasions. He mounts the tribune, and taking a paper from his pocket, all dirty and torn, "Gentlemen," he said, "I intended to read my speech to you, but unluckily my grey-hound got hold of it; here it is; you see its condition; make what use you can of it; for I didn't know it by heart, and have no copy."

There lived in Paris an ancient maiden, Marie le Jars, demoiselle de Gournay. She was born in 1565, and at the period to which the anecdote relates, was about seventy years old. In a short account of her life, written by herself, she says that at the age of nineteen, having read Montaigne's Essays, she was seized with the greatest desire to become acquainted with the author; so when Montaigne came to Paris, she sent a message to him, expressing her admiration of himself and his book. The same day he paid her a visit to thank her for her partiality, and they immediately were on such terms of affection that she called him father and he called her daughter. The demoiselle de Gournay was an author, and had published a book in the style of the time, which was thought to surpass in pathos every thing that had been written before. It was called "L'Ombre de la demoiselle de Gournay." According to the custom then in vogue, she presented her book to the distinguished literary men of Paris, and among others to Racan When the book was brought, two of his friends, De Buell and Ivrande, were with him. Racan, flattered by this attention, said he should call on the fair lady the next day at 3 o'clock. This declaration was not lost on his companions, who thought they would have some fun from it. The next day at 1 o'clock De Buell knocks at the door of the demoiselle de Gournay. Her companion, Mademoiselle Jamin, opens it. De Buell wishes to see the mistress of the house She tells Mademoiselle de Gournay, who was in her closet writing poetry, that a man had called to see her.

"What is his name?"

"He did not tell me."

"How does he look?"

"A well-looking man, thirty or thirty-five years old, and has the air of one accustomed to good company."

"Ask him up. The thought I was pursuing is a good one, but it may return and the cavalier may not."

As she finished her monologue he entered.

"Monsier, I have admitted you on Jamin's report of your appearance, without asking who you are, have the goodness to tell me your name."

"My name, Mademoiselle, is Racan."

La demoiselle de Gournay, who knew Raoan only by name, was extremely civil, and thanked him, that one so young and fashionable should trouble himself about a poor old woman like her. De Buell, who was a man of wit, made himself agreeable, and told divers diverting stories, which entertained her so much that she called to Jamin to silence her cat that was mewing in the next room. After three-quarters of an hour's conversation, which the demoiselle de Gournay declared was the most pleasant she ever had, he took his leave, overwhelming her with compliments for her courtesy, while she was enthusiastic in his praise. In a happy frame of mind was the ancient maiden to pursue the thought in which she had been interrupted, and which had been frightened away. She returned to her study, but had scarcely entered it, when Ivrande, who watched the moment, glided to her room. He opened the door of her sanctuary, and seeing her at work, said: "I have entered boldly, but the illustrious author of 'L'Ombre' ought not to be treated as a common person."

"That compliment is well turned, and I will inscribe it in my tablets; but, may I ask, what procures me the honor of this visit?"

"Mademoiselle, said Ivrande, "I came to thank you for the book you have done me the honor to present to me."

"Monsieur," she replied, "I have not sent my book to you, in which I was wrong. I ought to have done so. Here, Jamin, a 'L'Ombre' for this gentleman."

"But permit me to tell you I have one already. To prove it, in such a chapter is this passage—in that chapter this other passage."

"This is exceedingly gratifying to me; you are an author who reads all the new books as they appear."

"Certainly—and here are some of my own verses which I am happy to offer in exchange for your book."

"But these verses," said the ancient demoiselle, "are by Monsieur Racan."

"I am Monsieur Racan himself, at your service."

"Monsieur, you are laughing at me."

"I, Mademoiselle, I laugh at the daughter of the great Montaigne, at that heroine of poetry, of whom Lucrine has said, 'Videamna quid sit puritera lista virgo,' and the young Licinius 'Anne virgo cohourre rerein, seandit supra sidera.'"

"Very well! very well!" said the demoiselle de Gournay, delighted beyond expression by this avalanche of praise. He who has just gone away was making sport of me, or perhaps it is you; but it is of no consequence; the young will always be at their pranks with the old, and either way I am happy to have met with two gentlemen so elegant and witty." But it was not the intention of Ivrande to let his visit pass as a jest, and at the end of three-quarters of an hour he departed, leaving her fully persuaded that, this time, she had had an interview with the veritable author of "Bergeries." Scarcely was he out of sight, when the real Racan makes his appearance. The door was open. As he was a little troubled with the asthma, he entered out of breath, and at once threw himself into an arm chair. At the noise he made, Mademoiselle de Gournay, who was trying to catch again the thought that fled before the Chevalier de Buell, returned, and saw a coarse farmer-like looking man, who, without saying a word, was panting and wiping his face.

"Jamin," said she, "come quickly."

Jamin came to her.

"Did you ever see so ridiculous a figure?" cried Mademoiselle de Gournay, keeping her eyes fixed on Racan, and breaking out into a loud laugh.

"Mademoiselle," says Racan, who spoke in a thick tone, and could not pronounce R or C, 'dans un quait d'heille je vors delai pouiquoi je suis venuiti,' but just let me take breath."

"Then, Monsieur, at the end of this quarter of an hour you have asked for, you will at least inform me what secession brings you to my house?"

"Mademoisel'e," replies Racan, "to thaek you for your present."

"What present?"

"Your 'L'Ombie.'"

"My 'L'Ombre,'" says Mademoiselle de Gournay, who began to comprehend the language Racan spoke

"Certainly, for your 'L'Ombie.'"

"Jamie," says Mademoiselle de Gournay "undeceive this poor man I have sent my book to no one but to Monsieur de Malherbe, and he did not deserve it, for his unfair criticism on my writing, and to Monsieur Racan, who has just left me."

"Who has just left you!" cries Racan—"I am Latan."

"You are Latan! I did not say Latan—I said Racan."

The unlucky poet made infinite efforts to tell his name, which was composed of five letters two of which he could not pronounce, which he so strenuously distorted, that Mademoiselle de Gournay was unsuccessful in her attempts to comprehend it Becoming impatient—

"Do you know how to write?"

"Do I know how write? Si je saie otelle! Give me a pen, and you shall see."

"Jamin, give the gentleman a pen."

Jamin obeyed; gave a pen to the unfortunate visitor, who wrote as legibly as possible, in a large hand, Racan

"Racan!" cried Jamin.

"Racan! Racan!" repeated Mademoiselle de Gournay.

"I am he," said Raoan, enchanted at being understood, and supposing his reception would now be different.

"Look at him, Jamin; is he not a pretty fellow to take that name?" and Mademoiselle de Gournay became very furious. "The other two," said she, "were at least amiable and pleasing, but this fellow is a miserable buffoon."

"Mademoiselle, Mademoiselle, you amezeme! pray tell me what you mean"

"I mean that you are the third Monsieur Racan who has presented himself here to-day"

"I know nothing of the others, but I know I am the true Latan"

"I don't know who you are," replied Mademoiselle de Gournay; "but I know you are the greatest blockhead of the three, and I will suffer no such tricks to be played on me. Do you hear, sir?"

Saying this in an impatient tone, she rose from her seat, and with a lofty wave of the hand motioned him to depart.

In this extremity, Racan takes from his pocket one of his books, and presented it.

"Mademoiselle," said he, "I am the real Latan; and to prove it, take this book, and I will repeat the verses from beginning to end"

"Then, sir; you have stolen the verses from Monsieur Racan, as you have his name—and I declare, if you do not leave the house this instant, I will call for assistance."

"But, Mademoiselle—"

"Jamin, cry out robbers."

Racan did not wait for the result, but flying to the staircase, descended with the swiftness of an arrow. The same day, Mademoiselle de Gournay learned the whole story. Judge of her mortification, when she found she had driven from her house the only one of the three Racans who was the true one. The next morning she borrows a carriage and drives directly to M de Bellegarde's, where Racan lived. He was still in bed, and asleep, but the poor lady was in such haste to make her excuses to a man whom she esteemed so highly, that without listening to his valet de chambre, she ran hurriedly to his room, woet straight to his bed, and lifted up the curtains. Racan started out of his sleep, and seeing the face of yesterday, believed she was still pursuing him, and leaping out of bed ran into his closet. Safe there, and bolting the door, he listened to what she said, and in a few moments the whole affair was explained. Finding she had not come to renew the attack, but to make excuses, and with the kindest intentions, he left his closet, and from that day she and Monsieur Racan were the best friends in the world. The Reply of the Fairies.

Where do we hide when the year is old,
When the days are short and the nights are cold?
Where?
When the flowers have laid them down to die,
And the winds rush past with a hollow sigh,
And witches and fiends on their broomsticks ride,
Where do we delicate fairies bide?
Where?

Some of us borrow the white mouse skin
(Our gossamer dresses are far too thin.)
And get up a ball in the palace of ice,
With a hop and a skip as are there in a trice;
And we don't go home from these midnight balls
Till the sun lights up our diamond halls—
We don't go home till morning.

The queer old elves of the Northern land
Were we not beautiful fairy-band,
Praise our eyes and our curling hair,
Our nimble steps and our music rare,
Our golden crowns and the gems we wear,
And all our rich adorning

Sometimes we fly to the noon day lakes,
Where summer for ever unfading smiles,
And orange the tropical flowers for beds;
Where fairies nestle their small tired heads;
But when the stars of the south shine bright,
We chase the Reedy through the night;
When the tigers growl and the lions roar
We fly o'er their heads and laugh the more,
And pluck their heads and their tails for spite—
These are our games on a tropical night.

Sometimes we visit the children of earth,
And take up our stand at the social hearth,
We hover and sing by the couch of pain.
Till the frightened dreamer smiles again;
We polish the lash of a deep blue eye,
And brush the tremblesome baby's cry,
And make mushrooms grow on our verdant rings:
Are not we fairies good little things?

As the dormouse curled in his darkened grave,
As the mermen and maids in the ice-bound cave,
As the poor scarlet-breast when it longs for a crumb,
As the naked woods when the birds are dumb,
As the torrent pent up in its glittering sheath,
We welcome the sight of the first green leaf.

A Military Pig.

During the last war with Great Britain, a very remarkable circumstance occurred in connection with the Invasion of Canada. A company of Kentucky volunteers, destined for Shelby's army, had their rendezvous at Harrodsburg, in Kentucky, and formed a sort of rendezvous or rallying point for the military recruits of that part of the country. When they marched from Harrodsburg towards the Ohio River, having got a mile or two on their way, they noticed two pigs fighting, and delayed their march to see it out. After they had resumed their march, the pig which had been the victor in the contest was observed to follow them.

At night, when they encamped, the pig found a shelter near, and halted also. The next day the pig accompanied the troops as before; and thus it marched every day and halted every night with the soldiers, or near them. When they came opposite Cincinnati, at which place the troops were to cross the Ohio in a ferry-boat, the pig, on getting to the water's edge, plunged promptly in and swam across, and then waited on the other side till the whole cortege crossed over, and then resumed its post upon one side of the moving column. Thus the animal kept up with the troops until they crossed the State of Ohio, and reached Lake Erie.

On the journey, as the men grew familiar with their comrade, it became a pet, receiving a share of the rations issued to the soldiers, and destitute of provisions as the troops found themselves at times, no one thought of putting the knife to the throat of their fellow soldier. What they had was still shared, and if the pig fared as scantily as the rest at times, it still grunted on and manifested as much patriotism in his own line as the biped; it accompanied did in theirs. At the margin of the lake, pig embarked with the troops, and went as far as Bass Island. But when offered a passage over into Canada, pig emphatically refused to embark a second time. Some of the men attributed her conduct to constitutional scruples, and observed that she knew it was contrary to the Constitution to force a militia pig over the line. She, therefore, had leave to remain.

After the campaign had closed, the troops recrossed the lake, having lost some of their horses on the American side. As soon as the line was formed, to the great surprise of the troops, there was the pig on the right of the line, ready to resume her march with the rest. By this time, the winter frosts had set in, and the animal suffered greatly on the homeward march. She made out, however, to reach Maysville, where the troops re-crossed the Ohio River. There she gave out, and was placed in trusty hands by Governor Shelby, and finally taken to the Governor's own home, where she passed the rest of her days in ease and indolence

There are many in Kentucky who can now attest the truth of this remarkable story.

AN EASTERN APOLOGUE.

Abdallah sat at his morning meal, when there alighted on the rim of his goblet a little fly. It sipped an atom of syrup, and was gone But it came next morning, and the next, and the next again, till at last the scholar noticed it. Not quite a common fly, it seemed to know that it was beautiful, and it soon grew very bold. And lo! a great wonder: it began daily larger, and yet larger, till there could be discerned in the size as of a locust, the appearance as of a man. From a hand-breadth it reached the stature of a cubit; and still, as winning were its ways, that it found more and more favor with this son of infatuation. It frisked like a satyr, and it sang like a peri, and like a moth of the evening it danced on the ceiling, and, like the king's gift, whithersoever it turned it prospered. The eyes of the simple one were blinded, so that he could not in all this perceive the subtlety of an evil genius. Therefore, the lying spirit waxed bolder and yet bolder, and whatsoever his soul desired of dainty meat he freely took; and when the scholar waxed wroth; and said, "This ie my daily portion from the table of the multi; there is not enough for thee and me," the dog-faced deceiver played some pleasant trick, and caused the silly one to smile. Until, in process of time, the scholar perceived that, as his guest grew stronger and stronger, he himself waxed weaker and weaker

Now, also, there arose frequent strife betwixt the demon and his dupe, and at last the youth smote the fiend so sore that he departed for a season. And when he was gone, Abdallah rejoiced and said, "I have triumphed over mine enemy; and whatsoever thing it pleaseth me, I shall smite him so that he do. In he set altogether in mine own power?" But after not many days the genius came back again, and this time he was arrayed in goodly garments, and he brought a present in his hand; and lo! as the days of their first friendship, and he looked so mild and feeble, that his smooth words wrought upon this dove without a heart, and saying, "Is he not a little one?" he received him again into his chamber.

On the morrow, when Abdullah came not into the assembly of studious youth, the mufti said, "Wherefore tarrieth the son of Abdul? Perchance he sleepeth." Therefore, they repaired even to the chamber, but to their knocking he made no answer. Wherefore the mufti opened the door, and lo! there lay on the divan the dead body of his disciple. His visage was black and swollen, and on his throat was the pressure of a huger broader than the palm of a mighty man All the stuff, the gold, and the ohauges of raiment, belonging to the hapless one, were gone, and in the soft earth of the garden were seen the footsteps of a ginul. The mufti measured one of the prints, and behold! it was six cubits long.

Reader, canst thou expound the riddle? Is it the bottle or the betting book? Is it the billiard table or the theater? Is it smoking? Is it laziness? Is it novel reading! But know that an evil habit is an elf constantly expandiog. It may come in at the key hole, but it will soon grow too big for the house. Know, also, that no evil habit can take the life of your soul, unless you yourself nourish it and cherish it, and by feeding it with your vitality give it strength greater than your own. AN EPISODE IN THE PENINSULAR WAR.

THE SOLDIER'S SON.

It was a fierce and critical period of the war in the Peninsula, that Morillo, then commanding the fifth division of the Spanish army, about 6000 strong, in conjunction with Penne Villemur, passed down the Portuguese frontier by the Lower Guadiana, intending to fall on Seville as soon as Soult should advance to the succor of Badajoz In the beginning of April, while the French were disheartened by the siege and loss of the last city, Penne Villemur and Morillo, leaving out of Portugal, crossed the Lower Guadiana and seized San Lucar de Bayor This place was ten miles from Seville, was only garrisoned by a Spanish Swiss battalion in Joseph's service, aided by some boros, and by sick and convalescent men. The Spaniards soon occupied the heights in front of the Triana bridge, and attacked the French entrenchments, hoping to raise a popular commotion. Ballasteros, on the other side, had advanced with 11,000 man, intending to fall on Seville from the left of the Guadalquivir.

But the hopes entertained by the Spaniards of being speedily in possession of Seville were cut off by a piece of deceit False information adroitly given by a Spaniard in the French interest, led Ballasteros to believe Soult was close at hand, whereupon he immediately returned to the Ronda; while Penne Villemur, also warned that the French would soon return, retired to Ohrsleon.

This disappointment and failure in the execution of a favorite project, cherished for many months, irritated beyond control the naturally severe temper of Morillo it was evening, and the division of the army under him were encamped some hours' march on their retreat. Preparations might have been seen for a military execution and a couple of prisoners captured in the last skirmish were, according to the cruel practice of many chiefs in those times, to be put to death The captives were guarded by a file of soldiers and the executioners, waiting the word of command to draw up, were leaning on their weapons and talking of the events of the last two days

Just then, one of the inferior officers returning to his tent, after giving some order to the men, was interrupted by a boy apparently ten years of age, seizing his hand, and speaking in an accent slightly foreign, besought him, with piteous entreaties, to procure him admittance to the General They finer found on inquiry that he was the son of one of the prisoners, a soldier distinguished for his eminent personal bravery, who had not been taken, was when overwhelmed by numbers, without giving and receiving many severe wounds.

This soldier, wearied and wounded, but invincible in courage and spirit, for he scorned to ask clemency of his conqueror, was now to suffer death with his companion in misfortune. The terrible order had been given, for Morillo would not be impeded in his march by prisoners; and he so hated his country's enemies, that the bravest and most generous among them could have found no mercy at his hands. The prisoner's little boy, refusing to be separated from his father, had been suffered by the Spaniards to remain with him

"You shall see the General, boy, since you wish it," said the officer, in reply to the child's passionate entreaties; "but he will not grant your father's life. San Lucas! but these French dogs have given us too much trouble already to pity the prisoners."

They entered the General's tent. Morillo, by the light of a lamp burning on the table, was reading a dispatch he had just received Two of his officers stood near him; there was no one else in the tent. The brow of the chief was contracted and his eye flashed as it what he read displeased him; and he looked up with an impatient exclamation as the officer entered with the boy The child, as soon as Morillo was pointed out to him, rushed forward and knelt at his feet.

"What does this mean?" demanded the General.

"Spare him! spare my father!" sobbed the youthful applicant

The officer explained his relationship to one of the prisoners about to be executed.

"Ah, that reminds me," said the chief, looking at his watch; "Pero, time is hour. Let them be punctual, and have the business soon over."

Again, with moving entreaties, the child besought his father's life.

"Did thy father send thee hither?" asked the general, sternly.

"No senor, he did not."

"And how darest thou, then——"

"My father has done nothing to deserve death," answered the lad. "He is a prisoner of war."

"Ha! who taught thee to question my justice? Answer me"

"No one, senor; but brave generals do not always kill their prisoners."

"I kill whom I choose!" thundered Morillo; "and I hate the French. Boy, thy father shall die. I have said it—begone!"

The officer made a silent sign to the petitioner, to intimate there was no hope, and that he must begone. But the boy's countenance suddenly changed He walked up to the general, who had turned away, and placed himself directly before him with a look of calm resolution worthy of a martyr.

"Hear me, senor," said he, "my father is gray-haired; he is wounded; his strength is failing; even now, though he stands up to receive the fire of your men. I am young and strong, and well Let them shoot me in his place, and let my father go free."

It was impossible to doubt the sincerity of this offer, for the face of the devoted child was kindled with a holy enthusiasm A dark flush rushed to the brow of Morillo, and for a moment he looked on the boy in silence.

"That art willing to die," at length he said, for thy father? Then to suffer pain for him will be nothing. Wilt thou lose one of thy ears to save him?"

"I will," was the firm reply.

"Lend me thy sword, Pabla," and in an instant, at one blow, the General struck off the boy's ear. The victim wept, but resisted not, nor raised his hand to wipe away the blood.

"So far, good. Will thou lose the other ear?"

"I will, to save my father!" answered the boy convulsively

Morillo's eyes flashed. The heroism of a child compelled his admiration; but unmoved from his stern purpose, he smote off the other ear with his still reeking sword

There was a dead silence.

"And now, senor," said the boy, breathing quickly, and looking up into the General's face.

"And now," answered Morillo, "depart; the father of such a child is dangerous to Spain. He must pay the forfeit of his life."

The maimed child went from the presence of this inhuman foe. Presently the report of fire-arms announced that he had witnessed the execution of his father

Must we blame the cruelty of individuals for such enormities?—or not rather the relentless spirit of war, that builds up the glory of its heroes on a scaffolding of death, and sacrifices daily to the projects of ambition the promptings of humanity!

A man in Brownsville recently ate a yard of sausage on a wager of five dollars. After performing the feat he pocketed the money, eat three or four dozen of oysters, and then offered to bet ten dollars that he could eat another yard. The old adage of "dog eat dog" was verified by this glutton.

FROM THE RIO GRANDE.

By the steamship Nautilus, Capt. Thompson, which arrived on Saturday last from Brazos Santiago, we have news from Brownsville to the 26th The Flag, in speaking of the fact that the Nautilus had put into Tampico for repairs, says that her recent severe trials have thoroughly proved her capacity as a safe and staunch craft, and the out-tried skill and seamanship of her gentlemanly commander, Capt. Thompson, as beyond all encomium.

In reference to the revolutionary feelings and movements in Eastern Mexico, the Flag has the following paragraph:

On this frontier, for the present there is quiet, though how long it will remain time alone can tell. Gen. Carvajal arrived here, per steamer Camanche, a few days since, and rumor says he is very soon to head another movement, assisted on a new and liberal basis. But rumor is not always to be believed.

The late severe weather off Brazos Santiago had been productive of quite a critical state of affairs with respect to a supply of bread. The Flag says:

Owing to the recent rough weather, which prevented the entrance of vessels, our merchants had exhausted their supplies of flour, and quite a panic existed through fear that we were to be without this important staff of life. Flour, we are told, went up to $25, and even to $30 per barrel, and finally none was to be had at any price The bakers, or those of them who had a supply, were reaping a golden harvest by supplying the hungry mouths of two cities with loaf loaves at double prices. The opportune entrance of the steamer Nautilus, however, with large supplies, will again soon set things to rights.

The following items are from the Flag:

The good old custom of observing a day of Thanksgiving, as appointed by the Governor of the State, was not forgotten in this city, but religious services were held in the Presbyterian church on Thursday last, and an appropriate discourse delivered by Rev H Chamberlain.

A detachment of U.S troops arrived here to-day on the steamer Grampus, and left immediately for Rio Grande city.

Last evening, about 10 o'clock, the still small hours of night were rendered hideous by the ridiculous howlings and scandalous conduct of a lot of the political exiles of Mexico, now enjoying a refuge under our flag and in the hospitality of our people. The conduct of these men is in flagrant violation of law, and a reckless abuse of hospitality. A party of them, as we learn, was headed by an American, and numbered something near a hundred persons; who, having provided themselves with a drum and fife, with all the confidence of conscious security, valorously marched through several of our streets to the river bank, where they commenced yelling forth "Vivas!" for their cause and shouting insult and defiance to the guard on the other bank.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PHILADELPHIA.

The U.S mail steamship Philadelphia, Lieutenant J. F. Schenck, commanding, left New York at 2 p. m., on the 18th inst., for New Orleans, via Havana, at which place she arrived early on the morning of the 26th, and sailed at 4 p. m. of the same day for this port.

The Philadelphia brings 120 passengers, and the mails left San Francisco for New Orleans on the 1st ult. She brings also a moderate cargo and $17,000 in treasure.

The U. S. mail steamer Falcon sailed for Aspinwall at noon of the 26th.

On the night of the 23th the Philadelphia encountered a severe gale from the North-west, accompanied with heavy head sea.

Mr. Bullay, the purser, reports that there was nothing of interest occurring at Havana; the weather was delightfully mild and agreeable throughout the island.

We find the following in the Gaceta:

According to a communication that His Excellency, etc., has received from the captain of the Partido of San Marcos, the said captain, at 5 o'clock p. m. on the 22d inst., received information that, in the district of San Juan, two robbers had killed three white men and a negro; that he, the said captain, accompanied by his lieutenant and three neighbors, went in pursuit of the robbers, and met them in front of Alonso's house. Assured that they were the criminals they were in search of, the pursuers threw themselves hereupon the two to make them prisoners, and notwithstanding that they endeavored to defend themselves, pistol in hand, the captain, who also was armed with one, shot the robber to his right dead; the other escaped through the hedge, leaving his horse in the hands of the pursuers Examining the dead robber, two percussion pistols and a sword were found upon him, the latter covered with newly shed blood, also a bag of balls and percussion caps. It further appears that their view was to steal negroes, and that the cause of the murders which they committed resulted from an attempt made by the victims to retake a negro carried off by them.

On the 12th there was a slight shock of an earthquake at Santiago de Cuba.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP MEXICO.—The steamship Mexico, Captain Lawless, arrived yesterday morning from Indianola via Galveston, bringing papers of the latter place up to Saturday last, but they contain no news of interest. The Mexico's list of passengers and consignees will be found under their appropriate heads

The Brazoria Planter of the 27th ult. contains the following item:

"Mrs. S. W. Perkins died on Monday last at the residence of her husband, in this county, very suddenly. She was sitting in a chair reading, and apparently well when her children left her, who returned in a few moments and found her dead in the chair.

"The suddenness of her death has caused a suspicion of some foul play, but we forbear to comment until the whole truth is revealed by the verdict of the Coroner's Jury, which we soon expect to receive.

"Mrs Perkins is the wife of our present Chief Justice, who is now absent from the county."

THE BELLE AND THE STUDENT.—At a certain splendid evening party a haughty young beauty turned to a student who stood near her, and said: "Cousin John, I understand your eccentric friend L—— is here; I have a great curiosity to see him. Do bring him here, and introduce him to me."

The student went in search of his friend, and at length found him lounging on a sofa. "Come, L——," said he, "my beautiful cousin Catherine wishes to be introduced to you."

"Well, trot her out, John," drawled L——, with an affected yawn.

John returned to his cousin, and advised her to defer the introduction to a more favorable time, repeating the answer he had received. The beauty bit her lip; but the next moment said: "Well, never fear. I shall insist on being introduced."

After some delay, L—— was led up, and the ceremony of introduction was performed. Agreeably surprised by the beauty and commanding appearance of Catherine, L—— made a profound bow; but, instead of returning it, she stepped backward, and, raising her eyeglass, surveyed him deliberately from head to foot; then waving the back of her hand toward him, drawled out: "Trot him off, John! trot him off! that is enough!"

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL

FOR THE CURE OF
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

OF all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Arts in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the CHERRY PECTORAL, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

Read the following opinion, founded on the long experience of the eminent Physician of the Port and City of ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made use of for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

J. J. DURTON, M. D., F. R. S.

See what it has done on a wasted constitution, not only in the following cases, but a thousand more:

SCHAGHAT, Jan. 24, 1851.

DR. AYER: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness. I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage. My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my acquaintances as a victim of consumption I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed. At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to make to the afflicted, through you, that my health in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL. Yours truly,

WM. W. SMITH.

It has recently been provided with a new Philosophical and Chemical Apparatus, adequate to all the purposes of instruction; and no pains will be spared to secure the application of the best and most approved means of developing and training the mind. The President having been for twelve years in charge of the Female College, Macon, Georgia, the Trustees entertain no doubt, from his past success, of his entire ability to make this equal to any school of the same grade in the country.

A tri-weekly line of stages from Eutaula to the Montgomery and West Point Railroad, and semi-weekly line from Columbus, Ga., to Chunnynuggee, make it accessible from all points.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL.
THOS. C. BRAGG, A. M., Principal.
——, Assistant.

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell: but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended to perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

OUT-WARD BOUND.

[Rev. S. H. Cox, to whom was addressed the letter below, kindly furnished it to the Advocate. The numerous friends of the missionary families will read the sea-notes with pleasure. The prayers of all whose hearts are in their work, will follow them. "Sue" is Susan, the wife of the writer, Rev. J. S. Belton.]

PACIFIC OCEAN, Lat. 26 S., Lon. 127 E. Sept. 11th, 1854. At sea 127 days.

Dear Bro. Cox:

You remember, we set sail from New York May 6th, which is all you know of us. Since then I suppose you have been conjecturing a great many unreasonable, and as many reasonable, things as to how we are, where we are, and what we are doing, etc. Well, neither of us, are sick or dead. Now, I will tell you how we got here.

We left New York with a fair eight knot breeze, which continued with us a few days and then died away, followed by a succession of light baffling winds, mostly ahead and finally by a calm. By calms and headwinds we were forty-three days getting to the equator. "line," as sailors say, which ought, by all means to have been done in thirty.

Meantime most of us were visited by that pest of ocean life—sea-sickness. I suffered a little, as it came on occasionally only; Sue, however, did not fare so well. She was sick seventeen days without intermission, insomuch that I began to apprehend some danger, as she had already become so, that it was with the greatest difficulty she could either stand up or walk about the ship—and the more so, as I could hear of nothing which would cure it. I began the use of toasted corn-biscuit, and burnt brandy, however, which immediately checked the irritation of her stomach and she soon recovered strength. Still she has frequently suffered since, especially in rough weather. Bro. Lambuth, sister Kelley and sister Jenkins were hardly sick at all. Sister Lambuth suffered almost as much as Sue.

Having crossed the line, we sailed southward along the coast of S. America, passing two hundred miles east of Cape St. Roque having sailed out of the southeast trades, which blew all the time between the equator and tropic of Capricorn, we came into westerly winds and turned our bow eastward toward the Cape of Good Hope. We passed about ten degrees south of the Cape. While doubling the Cape we were visited by a number of severe storms from the west. As we had a good ship and plenty of sea room, there was no danger, but as for sleeping it was out of the question. If we sat down we were frequently thrown out of our seats across the cabin, and banged against the opposite wall. Our walking might more properly be called crawling. Sue generally sought refuge in bed, where she had a soft place to roll. She was not always safe here, however. One night she was unable to come to the table for supper, and I carried her a cup of tea and bit of bread—as I was standing in the door of our room and happening to turn my head from her, the ship gave a lurch and down she tumbled, head foremost, out of her bed. She was unable to move herself that night, but as the storm abated she was out in a day or two.

After passing the Cape, we made our way as well as we could toward the island of Java, where we expected to take in water and provisions, at a Dutch village called Anjer. The first land we saw, after losing sight of the New Jersey Highlands, was Christmas Island, two hundred and forty miles south of Java, on the ninety-ninth day. This is a coral island, covered by tropical trees and inhabited by wild boars. We passed one mile west of it.

Next morning early I was seated on the ship's bow, to get the first sight of Java. We first saw it about twelve o'clock. Just at dusk we entered the Straits of Sundu. Here I wrote a letter to each of our parents, dated August 14th, to be sent off from Anjer.

We went to bed with elated feelings. Next morning we were all up bright and early, to see the Malays, whose boats were alongside and who were on board with bananas, plantains, birds, cocoa-nuts, monkeys, etc., for sale. We were yet twelve miles from Anjer, and as our vessel was at anchor without a breeze to go up, bro. Kelly, bro. Jenkins, his son and myself got into a boat and, after three hours' rowing and sailing, we were landed ashore.

Just on shore, at the landing, is a large banyan tree, under which were a number of natives, with their teeth dyed black by chewing the beetle-nut leaf, mixed with slacked lime and a few other substances, which take hold of the teeth and turn them perfectly black. They use it as some persons do tobacco. They say dogs have white teeth.

Bro. Kelly, the younger Jenkins and myself made a tour of discovery, in which we saw banana, plantain and cocoa-nut trees, bearing fruits in all grades of size and maturity. Having secured a Javanese pony each, we closed the day with a ride into the country, and I returned to the ship, as she was near by, to see Sue, whom I had not seen in daylight day. Next morning Sue had an opportunity of going ashore, and I went with her and showed her what is described above. She was much interested and refreshed I bought three hundred small oranges for 75 cents, which have done good service for her health.

About twelve o'clock, Aug. 16th, we sailed for Shanghae (Shang-hi) in hopes of getting there in two or three weeks—but we were disappointed, as it will be four weeks (in two days) and we are not there yet. For eight days we have been in sight of China, and have been kept back by calms and headwinds. We are sailing now under a headwind, and I hope we will get there this week (to-day is Monday). Anyhow, when we get there I will tell you.

"Well, how do you like the seafaring life?" Bad enough, but then it is just what you might expect, with thirteen persons crowded into an eighteen feet cabin. As to eating, we do very well. But there is one thing we do not fancy—that is our plan of using fresh meat. When we left New York we had a number of live mutton, pigs and fowls in nice order, but immediately they began to lose flesh. Whenever a pig or chicken took sick, and seemed in danger of dying, it went into the pot and was put on the table, and we ate it. We thus saved a good deal.

The health of the company was good until recently. Sister Kelley has been quite sick but she is now getting well. With that exception we are all well.

SHANGHAE, Sept. 25th, 134 days from N. Y.

We are, at last, at our journey's end, and find ourselves very comfortably situated at the Episcopal Mission, in the house of Bishop Boone. Sue and myself are still very well, so of the other brethren and their families.

On the 16th inst. we entered the mouth of the Yang-tse-Kiang, and at night we anchored 18 miles from Shanghae. On Sunday, the 17th we were towed up by a steamer, and at 7, P. M., we anchored in Shaagae harbor.

We find the country in a wretched state of commotion and civil war. The city, at present occupied by the rebels, is in a state of seige, after the Chinese fashion. They are fighting, more or less, every day, without accomplishing much either way. I have witnessed one or two engagements, in which there was no harm done. At present we are in no danger, as the foreign community is protected by three or four good men of war ships. I think, so long as we do not interfere, we are in safety.

Our own mission we found in a feeble condition. The house occupied by Bro. Cunningham (formerly Dr. Taylor's), has been much injured by cannon and musket balls, and for a while it was dangerous to live in it. Dr. Jenkins' house is untenantable, and I am afraid will soon be demolished, as the Imperialists have erected a battery behind it, and it will be exposed to the fire of both parties. Dr. Jenkins, Kelley and Lambuth are all at Cunningham's. Sue and myself are out of all danger, as we are not even in sight of the field of operations, and not only that, the men-of-war are just by us. There is a house going up for Lambuth and myself in a hundred yards of Boone's, we will be safe there also.

I have room for only a few lines more. I am still as much of a missionary as ever. My heart is in the work and I hope to live and die here. I must be holy.

Give my love to Lizzie and the children, to Mu, etc., and accept the same of your brother.

J. S. BELTON.

UNDISCRIMINATING CHARITY.

A writer in the Independent shows the credulous and generous giver that there is a necessity of being judicious also:

"No mischief of undiscriminating charity is greater than that of breaking down the independence and self-respect of persons, so that they shall be willing to lean on others, and not depend upon their own exertions for a livelihood. It is a duty of benevolence to employ relief so that it shall not render the recipient immoral or careless. And this is not an easy task. Poverty may be borne with moral heroism, and with immaculate character; but few persons can receive alms and not be morally injured by it. It is a perverting influence. It goes against the grain of nature. Alms must be administered like medicine; and like medicine, they will often leave a secondary disease behind them, almost as bad as that for which they were given.

"All this, however, does not make it any less a duty to be charitable to the poor. It only enhances the responsibility of it. It requires of us that we should give more time and more painstaking; that we should relieve outward trouble with an eye to moral and social improvement. This was the true example of Christ. It is said that he fed the body, healed the sick, relieved sorrow. But such relief was the occasion of stamping some moral lesson, enforcing some deep truth. He made beneficence and auxiliary of spirituality."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE REPORTS.

TALLADEGA FEMALE SCHOOL.

The committee to whom it was referred to inquire into the expediency and practicability of establishing in Talladega a female school of high order, under the care and patronage of the Alabama Conference, ask leave to report—

That they have had the subject under consideration, and are satisfied that it is practicable and expedient to establish such a school in Talladega.

It is a fact known to the Conference that the Talladega District embraces a larger white membership than any other district in the Conference. This membership embraces a large number of individuals who are able, willing and ready to engage in the enterprise, as we believe, of establishing a literary institution within the bounds of the District, to be under the patronage and direction of the Conference.

No argument is needed to show the propriety of founding such schools where there is sufficient patronage to support them, and the wants of the people demand their establishment. Your committee are satisfied that the Methodist Church in this region ought to have such an institution, and we trust the Conference will coincide in this opinion, and act accordingly.

There is certainly an inviting field opened to us here, and one that needs but to be cultivated to yield fruits in rich abundance. This is a country strong in natural advantages, and in the energy and enterprise of its numerous population. It is a part of that mountain region of the interior from which the church has derived many able and valued ministers, and to which it must look in the future for recruits in many fields of labor, in more southern portions of the conference.

As a point of location for such a school, Talladega is believed to possess strong claims. It is central to a large scope of country, in which the Methodist church has as yet made no decided movement on the subject of education. It is a healthful country, and enjoys a peculiarly beautiful mountain scenery, and is rich in all agricultural productions, enabling the people to live abundantly, and at a small expense. The town is already of comparatively easy access, and will soon be on a great line of travel, from north and east to the south and west, by which it will be placed in direct communication with the strongholds of Methodism in the central portions of the United States, and the southern portions of the Conference.

Talladega has already displayed energy and spirit in the erection of seminaries of learning, and by that means has furnished good proof that its community are worthy guardians and efficient patrons of the great interests of education. The Baptist and Presbyterian denominations have appreciated the advantages to be derived from institutions of learning at this point, and have had flourishing schools in operation.

Your committee believe that a sufficient sum of money can be raised, and that speedily, within the bounds of this District, to insure the establishment of a school of high order in Talladega, without any pecuniary charge or liability upon the Conference, and that the school will ask nothing from it but its hearty co-operation and patronage, and an urgent to aid in the collection of funds to put the school in operation. Your committee, therefore, ask your concurrence in this report, and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That a board of trustees, consisting of nine persons, of whom four are to be members of this Conference, and the remaining five to be members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Talladega District, be appointed to establish, organize, open, and conduct a female school of high order in the town of Talladega, to be called "The Conference Institute," under the care and patronage of this Conference.

2. Resolved, That the Board of Trustees are empowered to do all things necessary to the erection of buildings—the purchase of property real or personal—for the purposes of the school; to employ teachers for the same, and to do all things necessary to establish and conduct and control said school, subject to the following restrictions, viz:

1. The Board of Trustees shall not involve the Conference in a debt or liability on this account, beyond the means provided for the school from other sources than the Conference.

2. That no teacher shall be elected for a longer term than two years, until after the meeting of the next Annual Conference.

3. The Conference shall have power at any time to dismiss the Board of Trustees, or any of them, for good cause shown, and to appoint others.

4. The term of office of the first Board of Trustees shall be two years, subject to the qualifications above expressed.

Resolved, 3d. That the Conference ask for the appointment of an agent, whose duty it shall be to labor diligently to obtain money for the carrying out of these purposes, and to pay the same over to the Board of Trustees.

Resolved, 4th. That the Board of Trustees may act when a majority of them is at any time present. They may supply vacancies in their number, resulting from deaths or resignations, during the intervals of Conference, such elections being subject to confirmation by the Conference. They shall have power to arrange their own organization and to adopt their own by-laws, having a president, secretary, and treasurer, and may appoint such committees, officers and agents, as they may deem expedient in carrying out these objects.

Resolved, 5th. That the Board of Trustees shall report the condition of the school, and their action under these resolutions, to the next Annual Conference.

ON TEMPERANCE.

The committee to whom was referred the subject of Temperance report as follows.

We find in the present state of the Temperance question no argument in favor of either supineness or discouragement. We think that we may safely assert that the public sentiment is daily becoming more favorable to our cause, and we believe that the day is not far distant when the territory embraced within the bounds of the Alabama Conference will be as free from the curse of intemperance as the most favored portions of our land. But in order to advance ourselves to this happy consummation, it is needful that we be prudent, vigilant and active; and we would adopt, with renewed ceremony and solemnity, the sentiment "that we are to do good to all men," both to their bodies and souls, as we have opportunity. And while we extend our sympathies, our prayers, and our alms to the poor inebriate, we may not excuse ourselves from the duty of reproving the dramseller, who has been mainly instrumental in making him a drunkard, and we take leave to express our astonishment that grave legislators become accessory to the fact by legalizing the diabolical transaction. We desire not to be misunderstood at this point. We heartily disclaim any fraternity with the fanatical political spirit which pervades many of our trans Potomac pulpits, and have no sympathy with that miscalled Christianity which expends its energies in propounding fanciful woman-rights and negro-wrongs; but avoiding each extreme, we would "pursue the golden mean," and meekly, yet firmly, assert our rights as citizens, while we carefully maintain the dignity of our holy vocation.

Following the course thus prescribed, we utter an earnest complaint against that system of legislation which gives a kind of respectability to the dramseller, by legalizing his profession—giving him leave to inscribe upon each new work of ruin, "done by authority of law."

Perhaps if all legal restraints were removed from the traffic in alcohol, a just public opinion would, ere long, hand down to the same profound of infamy, the stabber, the poisoner, and the dramseller. In that event, the business would soon revert solely to such wretches as would have but little power to demoralize or destroy.

But we would prefer that our legislators should divest themselves of responsibility in the premises, by giving to the citizens of each beat or township the right, by votes, either to abate this nuisance, or retain it among them. In conclusion, we ask the Conference to adopt the following resolution, to-wit:

Resolved, That, being persuaded of the great interest which Christianity has in the TEMPERANCE CAUSE, we pledge ourselves to the continued use of all lawful means for its advancement.

NATURALIZATION.

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

The very large amount of discussion and comment that the naturalization laws of this country are now undergoing has induced us to attempt a brief history of them from the time of the Constitution up to the present day.

Under the Confederation, the separate states possessed sole authority for naturalizing foreigners, and the dissimilarity of their laws proved inconvenient and threatened to become dangerous. In one State, residence for a short time conferred all the rights of citizenship; in another qualifications of greater importance were required. Thus an alien legally incapacitated for certain rights in Massachusetts might by previous or temporary residence in Rhode Island or Virginia divide those incapacities. These difficulties, and others not specified but easily apparent, were overcome by the Constitution in which the States yielded their previous authority with regard to naturalizing foreigners to the General Congress. A very common but erroneous opinion obtains, even among those who should know better, that this surrender of a certain portion of State sovereignty to the joint sovereignty of all the States was compensated by a guarantee of certain rights of citizenship to foreigners in the Constitution itself. This opinion is ungrounded—the Constitution does nothing of the sort. It contains only five clauses in any way relating to the subject of naturalization; and of these five, four are prohibitory—stating what rights a foreigner may not attain and what disabilities he must labor under—and one is permissive, stating what action Congress may take on the subject. There is not a single promissory or mandatory clause in the whole paper concerning the naturalization of foreigners. So far as the Constitution is concerned, foreigners are not guaranteed the simple liberty of landing on our shores.

Section 8, Article I, says: "Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

Section 2, Article II, says: "No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President."

Section 3, Article XII, of the Constitution says: "No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United states."

Section 3, Article I, says: "No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the age of thirty years and been nine years a citizen of these United states."

Section 2, Article I, says: "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years and been seven years a citizen."

Thus, so far as the Constitution takes any cognizance of the naturalization of foreigners, it prescribes them forever from the two first offices in the government; prescribes them for a period of nine years after having acquired citizenship from eligibility to Senatorship, and seven years from eligibility to election as Representatives. But, more than this, it does not ordain that they shall be naturalized at all. The whole matter is left discretionary with Congress, "who shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Congress is clothed with the power, but not commanded to use it. It is competent for Congress to pass a law allowing every emigrant the rights of a native-born citizen the day he lands, ipso facto; and it is equally competent for it to deny those rights altogether.

The permission contained in the Constitution was acted upon at an early day, by the special advice of Washington, who, in his first annual address, January 1790, said: "Various considerations render it expedient that the terms on which foreigners may be admitted to the rights of citizens should be speedily ascertained by a uniform rule of naturalization." The General Congress of that year, by the permission contained in the Constitution, and in accordance with the Presidential recommendation, passed an uniform naturalization law, giving the right of citizenship to foreigners after a residence of two years in this country. By the Act of 29th of January, 1795, this period was extended to five years. Another act, passed in 1798—only two years subsequent—still further increased the term of residence to fourteen years. One of the reasons adduced for the latter exclusion was, that there were, thirty thousand Frenchmen in the country, all of whom were more interested in the affairs of France than of the United Satee. Besides it was computed that there were fifty thousand who had been subjects of Great Britain. The law aside from establishing a new term of years as requisite to naturalization, authorized the President, to order aliens found conspiring against the welfare of the United States, to depart from its territories. The measure was linked to another and both—the alien and sedition laws—became highly unpopular. They entered as an ingredient in the party political questions of the time and were both declared by the legislatures of Virginia and Kentucky to be infractions of the Constitution. Thomas Jefferson succeeded Adams in the Presidency and in his first annual message—Dec. 1801—said: "I cannot omit recommending a revisal of the laws on the subject of naturalization. Considering the ordinary chances of human life, a denizen of citizenship under a residence of fourteen years, is a denial to a great proportion of those who asked it, and contrasts a policy pursued from their first settlement by many of these States, and still believed of consequence to their prosperity. And shall we refuse the unhappy fugitives from distress that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our fathers arriving in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on this globe? The constitution, indeed, has wisely provided that, for admission to certain offices of important trust, a residence shall be required sufficient to develop character and design. But might not the general character and capabilities of a citizen be safely communicated to every one manifesting a bona fide purpose of embarking his life and fortunes permanently with us? With restrictions, perhaps, to guard against the fraudulent usurpation of our flag."

In consequence of the unpopularity of the act of 1798, and in conformity with the suggestions of President Jefferson, the Seventh Congress repealed all previous laws on the subject, and established a uniform system of naturalization which required but five years residence to render one entitled to the rights of citizenship. This act of the 14th of April, 1802, declared also that "the children of persons duly naturalized under any of the laws of the United States, or who, previous to the passing of any law on that subject by the government of the United States, may have become citizens of any one of the States, under the laws thereof, being under the age of twenty-one years, at the time of their parents being so naturalized, or admitted to the rights of citizenship, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens of the United States." The provision is somewhat loose and vague as it appears to apply only to the children of persons naturalized or specially admitted to citizenship. The supplementary act of 26th of March, 1804, declares that if any alien who should have complied with the preliminary steps made requisite by the act of 1802, dies before he is actually naturalized, his widow and children shall be considered as citizens. The entire act of 1802, which is the basis of our existing laws on naturalization, is not so clear on this point as was that of January, 1795, which ordained that "the children of citizens of the United States, born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, shall be considered as citizens of the United States."

The following is the bill passed by the House of Representatives last session, and the Senate this session, to secure the right of citizenship to children of citizens of the United States born out of the limits thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That persons hereinbefore born or hereafter to be born, out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or shall be at the time of their birth citizens of the United States, shall be deemed and considered, and are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States: Provided, however, That the rights of citizenship shall not descend to persons whose fathers never resided in the United States.

The laws of 1802, on the subject of naturalization, as amended in 1804, were left almost entirely intact up to 1812. The war between this country and England then brought up new questions for consideration which were discussed in several ensuing sessions of Congress. In 1812 an act was passed requiring all British subjects within the United States to report to the Marshals of the States in which they resided, their age, the time they had been in the United States, the persons composing their families, their places of residence, their pursuits, and whether they had made application for naturalization. In the same year Madison returned a bill which had been passed by both Houses, supplementary to acts before passed on the subject of a uniform rule of naturalization, without his signature. In 1813 another act was passed for the relief of British aliens desiring to become citizens. There being a provision in the laws that no subject of any country, state or sovereign, with whom the United States was at war at the time of his application could then be admitted—and the declaration of war with Great Britain excluding altogether the subjects of that Government, Congress ordained:

"That persons resident within the United States or the Territories thereof, on the 18th day of June in the year 1812, who had before that day made a declaration, according to law, of their intentions to become citizens, etc., or who were then entitled to become citizens without making application, may be admitted, etc." Other acts on the subject of naturalization were passed March 22, 1816 and May 26, 1824, but they were altogether relative to the general law of 1802, and suggest only some slight changes in the certificate of registry and similar matters.

At various times since 1824 petitions have been presented to Congress, asking for an amendment of the naturalization laws so that foreigners should be required to reside twenty-one years in this country before obtaining citizenship. The House of Representatives of this State adopted a resolution to that effect in 1841 by a vote of 25 to 10. Mr. Buchanan presented numerous petitions from citizens of Pennsylvania in 1844. Petitions from other States making the same request, have been largely sent in and referred, but no action has been taken on them. A bill has been introduced during the present session, by Mr. Taylor, of Tennessee, extending the period of residence in this country to twenty-one years before citizenship be conferable.

The terms upon which any alien, being a free white person, can be naturalized, are prescribed in the several acts of Congress referred to above, and are, in substance, as follows:

He must declare on oath, before a State Court, if it is a court of record, or before a Circuit or District Court of the United States, two years, at least, before his admission, his intention to become a citizen, and to renounce his allegiance to his own sovereign. This declaration need not be made, however, if the alien resided here before the 8th of June, 1812, and has since continued to reside here; provided such residence be proved to the satisfaction of the court, and provided it be proved by the oath or affirmation of two witnesses, citizens of the United States, that he has resided, for at least five years immediately preceding the time of such application, within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States. And if the applicant shall have been a minor, under twenty-one years of age, and shall have resided in the United States three years next preceding his arrival to majority, he may also be admitted a citizen without such previous declaration, provided he has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and shall have resided five years within the United States, including the three years of his minority, and shall make the declaration aforesaid at the time of his admission, and shall declare on oath, and prove to the satisfaction of the court, that for three years next preceding it was his bona fide intention to become a citizen, and shall in all other respects comply with the laws in regard to naturalization.

In all other cases, the previous declaration is requisite, and at the time of his admission, the alien's country must be at peace with the United States, and he must, before one of the courts aforesaid, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and likewise, an oath to renounce and abjure his entire allegiance. He must, at the time of his admission, satisfy the court, by other proof than his own oath, that he has resided five years, at least, within the State where the court is held; and if he shall have arrived after the peace of 1815, his residence must have been continued for five years next preceding his admission, without being at any time during the five years out of the territory of the United States. He must satisfy the court, that during that time, he has behaved as a man of good moral character; attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same. He must, at the same time, renounce any title, or order of nobility, if any he hath.

The law further provides, that the children of the persons duly naturalized, being minors at that time, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be deemed citizens. It is further provided, that if any alien shall die after his declaration of intention, and before actual admission as a citizen, his widow and children, shall be deemed citizens.

A person thus duly naturalized, becomes entitled to all the privileges and immunities of a natural born subject, except that a residence of seven years is requisite to enable him to hold a seat in Congress; and no person, except a natural born citizen, is eligible to the office of Governor, in some of the States, or President of the United States.

We have contented ourselves in the present article with a brief synopsis of the history of the naturalization question in this country, leaving the expression of our opinions on to the merit of the proposed alterations to another day. It may not be improper, however, to state in this connection that the right of voting is not included in the rights of citizenship. A foreigner may become a citizen and yet not be allowed to approach the ballot-box, either on account of his religion, his want of property or for any other reason assigned by the State Legislature. Each State government can extend or curtail the elective franchise just as the General government can extend or curtail the laws regulating naturalization. In New Hampshire no Catholic can be elected to office. In Rhode Island and some other States no man who does not own a certain amount or description of property can vote. The liberality and justice of these regulations can, perhaps, best be judged of by a comparison of our own laws on the subject with the laws of other countries. We will, therefore, consider them in another article.

NUMBER TWO.—GRECIAN CITIZENSHIP.

In a previous article on the Naturalization laws of this country, tracing them from the times of the confederation to the present day, we remarked that they might, perhaps, be best judged of by comparison with similar laws and provisions of other States. A review of the enactments of all nations concerning natural and acquired citizenship, however condensed, would be beyond the possibilities of our space. A brief epitome, therefore, of the regulations of Greece, Rome and Great Britain, with a reference to those of France is all that can be attempted.

In the earlier ages of Grecian history, naturalization was granted to all who desired it. As the value of citizenship increased it was more sparingly bestowed. Particular privileges, such as the right of intermarriage, the right of holding real estate, and immunity from taxation, were more frequently granted than citizenship. In none of the Grecian states could those naturalized stand in the same rank with those native born. It was a great object to preserve purity and legitimacy of descent among citizens and to that end there was a careful registry kept. There were many ways by which citizenship might be lost, few by which it might be attained, and none whatever by which a foreigner could gain all the privileges of native born citizens. The admission into the state took place in public assembly and was attended with oaths and solemnities. Herodotus says that Sparta conferred full franchise in only two instances.

The inhabitants of Athens, in its later and more flourishing ages, were divided into three classes: free citizens; free commoners or resident aliens and sojourners, and slaves. The right of citizenship was a high privilege which was conferred only upon men of honorable descent and distinguished merit, and even upon such not without difficulty, as the agreement of six thousand citizens was first requisite. Free-born Atheneans were those whose parents were both born in Athens and they held certain rights that could not be acquired by the fullest citizenship, or shared in by those, one of whose parents was not a born citizen. The difficulty in obtaining a citizenship where six thousand assenting votes were requisite, may be judged of by the fact that under Pericles the city contained only fourteen thousand citizens, and under Demetrius the census shew but five hundred thousand, including aliens, women, children and slaves. The highest class of magistrates were the Archons, and they were chosen by lot; but before taking the oaths of office they were compelled to undergo two public examinations and prove that for three generations their ancestors had been Athenian citizens. In Lacedæmon there were two kinds of citizens; such as inherited the rights of citizenship and such as acquired those rights by personal merit. The former were termed equals—the latter Inferiors, and were not eligible to high offices, besides being deprived of many privileges belonging to those native born.

Alison in his history of Europe, says (vol. Ir 11,) "the privileged citizens"—of Greece—"evinced, on every occasion, the strongest repugnance to any extension of their rights to others."

A full history of Grecian citizenship would re-

NUMBER THREE—ROMAN CITIZENSHIP.

The means of acquiring the right of Roman citizenship and the privileges conferred by that acquisition varied very greatly in the different ages of that nation's existence. At the outset—A. U. C.—all men were received into a full and complete civil equality without regard to character, profession or origin. In the later and more prosperous periods no man could obtain full citizenship. Even under the Kings there was a broad discrimination between native born and adopted citizens, which was increased under the Consuls and Emperors by successive enactments curtailing the privileges of the latter class. As citizenship became more valuable it was more sparingly bestowed, and as it was more sparingly bestowed it grew proportionably more valuable. This Grecian history renewed itself in Rome, until at length he who was born under the shadow of the Tarpeian hill stood fearlessly in the presence of foreign Kings and potentates with no other guard than the proud boast, "I am a Roman citizen."

The rights of a Roman citizen were divided into two classes—public and private. Under the former he was entitled to the rights of being enrolled in the census, to the right of being drawn as a soldier; to the right of being taxed according to his wealth; to the much valued right of voting; to the right of holding public office and certain rights of a religious nature. The private rights were those which secured to each the control of his person; the peculiar privileges of his descent; the entire control over his children; the possession of legal property; the right to inherit or bequeath property by testament; and the right to appoint guardians for his wife and children by will. At no period when Rome had any semblance of liberty could that complete citizenship which embraced all of these rights be conferred except by a vote of the whole people. Lesser rights might be bestowed at the option of the Senate alone. Whoever once acquired Roman citizenship could not be deprived of it even by banishment; it was lost only by voluntary resignation or by taking a foreign allegiance, and this right of expatriation was considered by Cicero as the most inestimable of all belonging to citizenship itself. These above-named are the chief features, and were the prominent rights that belonged to a Roman civis.

On account of the frequent changes in the political system of the Romans—from the Kingly to the Consular, and from the Consular to the Imperial—it is impossible in any brief space to notice all the restrictions and modifications that prevailed at each separate period. In the time of the free Republic there were two classes of Roman citizens, one that had and one that had not a share in the sovereign power. That which peculiarly distinguished the higher class—the class clothed with all the rights and immunities of perfect citizenship—was the right of voting. This right was not then allowed even to a lower class of native-born citizens much less to those who came from foreign states or cities. At the time of Cicero, and probably at a very early period of the Roman State, a distinction obtained among the free persons within its territory, separating them into three classes—Roman citizens, Latins and Foreigners. The foreigner could not vote, could not marry, could not engage in commerce. The Latin might not vote or marry but was allowed the privilege of commerce. If a Roman citizen married a Latin or Foreign woman—even believing her to be a Roman likewise—the children of such marriage were not Roman citizens but either Latins or Foreigners; following the condition of the mother and not the father, as in the case of slaves here.

As Rome extended its boundaries by conquest and colonization, the inhabitants of the acquired territories were received into an imperfect citizenship, which, though raising them above their former rank, did not elevate them to the rank of Romans; the cities colonized from Rome had Roman laws and rights; the cities that were conquered, and classed as Municipia, enjoyed the right of governing themselves by their own laws if they chose, and were in some respect like the corporate cities of this country. Their inhabitants had the name and some of the rights, though not all, of Roman citizens. They enjoyed their personal rights, the right of protection from the State, the right of equal laws with full citizens, but were not allowed the right of making those laws under which they lived or voting for public officers. This state of things extended over a considerable period of time, accompanied with enlargements and restrictions, as the civitas grew or decreased in value. In the time of Hadrian a manumitted slave might become a Roman citizen. By a law enacted B. C. 89, any citizen of a State enjoying a treaty with Rome might divest himself of all his duties to and rights in his own city or country and be clothed with full Roman citizenship; provided that, within sixty days after the passage of the law, he signified his wish to the praetor. This law, it will be seen, was only temporary, and in fact was but an amendment to a previous act, known as the Julia lex, which gave to federate Italian cities Roman rights, without including those foreign-born, who were citizens in them. Before the passage of this last named law, the inhabitant of any of the cities federate with Rome could acquire citizenship only after having been a magistrate in his own city. From Augustus to the Antonines, the value of Roman citizenship constantly declined, in fact, almost ceased to exist, and was bestowed upon foreign cities and people with much more freedom. The Imperial Government first made it valueless and then common.

Lord Bacon in his essay "Of Kingdomes" has this bearing on the subject: "Never any State was so open to receive strangers into their body as were the Romans; therefore it sorted with them accordingly, for they grew to the greatest monarchy. Their manner was to grant naturalization (which they called 'jus civitatis') and to grant it in the highest degree, that is, not only 'jus commercii, jus connubii, jus hereditatis;' but also 'jus suffragii' and 'jus honorum;' and this not to singular persons alone, but likewise to whole families; yea to cities and sometimes nations."

From the building of the city, B. C. 752, to the expulsion of the kings, B. C. 509, the government of Rome was entirely monarchical and almost despotic. Even citizens had few rights in the affairs of government; and as Tarquin was engaged in besieging a foreign city but sixteen miles from Rome at the time of his downfall, it can not be supposed that the influx of foreigners into Rome was great. From 509 to 300 B. C., the government was a strict aristocracy in the hands of the Patricians. The Plebeians were not admitted to hold office. In order to obtain this right the latter class resisted, and, after much difficulty, became eligible to office. From this triumph of the Plebeians to the close of the Punic wars and the establishment of the Imperial Government—B. C. 31—was the brightest period of Roman history and the era of her greatest prosperity.

It was during this period—A. U. C. 692—B. C. 62—that Cicero delivers his oration "Pro Archia Poeta," the cause of which was that Archias, a native of Antioch, coming to Rome at an early age, enjoying full citizenship in a city in treaty with Rome, and entered as a Roman citizen by the law granting that right to whoever applied for it within sixty days after its passage, had his right of citizenship controverted under the Papian law, which ordained that all foreigners should be expelled from the city, "ut peregrini urbe pellerentur." Cicero, being engaged in his defence, after showing that eminent attainments in literature were no deserving of being honored with the boon of citizenship as eminent military services to the State, proceeded to show that Archias was actually a citizen from three other facts: from his making a will—"jus testamenti"—according to the Roman laws, which none but a Roman citizen could do; from his succeeding to inheritances left by Roman citizens—"jus hereditatis"—which none but a Roman citizen could do; and from his having obtained a recommendation to the State for good conduct. Another argument was that he was in the list of beneficiaries—et in beneficiis—an honor that could be enjoyed only by Roman citizens.

Before the time of Cicero's oration Sylla had presented the rights of citizenship to natives of Spain and Gaul, but the power by which he did so was extraordinary and an infringement on the Roman laws.

From the capture of Carthage to the reign of Constantine—a period including the Imperial Government, and from Constantine's reign to the fall of Rome before the Herull, A. D. 476—the rights of citizenship were constantly disregarded. This was the age of Rome's decay, however, and not of her growth. She flourished before the Punic wars ended and not after. Before that period citizenship was a carefully guarded right—afterwards a matter of no moment.

Alison in his History of Europe, vol. 1, pp. 12 and 13, says: "The Romans from the foundation of their Republic, admitted all the subjects of conquered States to a share of their privileges; and they received in return the empire of the world. From the first junction of the Romans and Sabines, to the final extension by the Emperor Antoninus, of the privileges of Roman citizenship to the whole civilized world, this policy was steadily pursued." In page 17 of the same volume, Alison adds: "The liberty of antiquity, cradled in single towns, was confined to the citizens who were present on the spot, and could take an active part in the public deliberations; and though the Romans, with unexampled wisdom, extended the general rights of citizenship to the conquered provinces, yet the idea of admitting them to a share of the representation never occurred to their minds; and the more important privileges of a citizen could only be exercised by actually repairing to the metropolis. The immediate cause of the overthrow of the liberties of Rome, was the admission of all the citizens of Italy to the privileges of Roman citizens, coupled with the absence of any provision for their representation."

We have enumerated a majority of the rights and duties which belonged to a Roman citizen, when Rome was in its glory, which were not the rights and duties of any one not a member of the State. We have also remarked the number of these rights that might be obtained by foreign residents and the way in which they were to be obtained. A complete history of the subject, however condensed, would require more space than could be afforded by a daily paper. [Ibid.

NUMBER FIVE.—ENGLISH CITIZENSHIP.

A recital of all the laws that have been, at different times, adopted and abolished in England with regard to the rights of resident aliens and of foreigners seeking citizenship, would not only be too long for our space, but altogether useless. The spirit of the nation, as evidenced in some of the more important enactments concerning citizenship, is all that we are able to allude to. It will be seen by these allusions that the English people have always been jealous of foreigners; always unwilling to trust those born in other countries, and at no time ready to grant the full rights of British citizenship to any but native born subjects.

The rights of citizenship in Great Britain are similar in kind, although not in extent, to the same rights in this country. There is the right of suffrage; but it is so hedged in by restrictions and qualifications that a very small moiety only of the actual population is enabled to exercise it. There is the right of religious liberty; but to this day Catholics, Jews, and even dissenting Protestants, labor under disabilities and annoyances from which members of the Established Church are wholly free. There is, moreover, a very signal difference in the degree of citizenship enjoyed by a British subject residing in England and one residing in Ireland, Scotland or Wales. The three latter States are just as much integral portions of the British Empire as Arkansas and Alabama are of the United States, but neither in Scotland nor Wales—much less in Ireland—are the privileges, rights and immunities of citizenship the same that they are in England. The disabilities are greater, the immunities immensely less.

The history of England, from the earliest times, shows the spirit of the people to have been adverse to the introduction of any foreign element into its nationality. Cedric, the Saxon, was not only a type of his own times and nation but of previous and succeeding races. Although Flemings were at one period solicited to settle in England, and Frenchmen welcomed at another, and Spaniards invited at another, they were not granted the right of citizenship; could neither elect their own magistrates nor be themselves elected. The disabilities of foreign nativity always clung to and crippled them. This is the more remarkable from the fact that the ruling race has been frequently changed in England and almost always supplanted by foreigners, who, nevertheless, after their accession to power, became as jealous of other foreigners as ever their predecessors had been. Thus the Saxons gave way to the Danes, and William the Conqueror introduced a Norman nationality over the heads of all predecessors; but on English born citizen continued through all the changes to enjoy fuller rights and a higher rank than could be attained by a foreigner.

A foreign born citizen can now become a citizen of England to a greater or less extent. He may be simply a resident alien, a denizen or a naturalized subject. By several successive acts of Edward III, Anne, George II and III, all children born abroad, whose fathers and grandfathers on the father's side were natural subjects, are deemed to be natural-born subjects themselves, unless their fathers were liable to the penalties of treason or felony. A man can thus, by English law, subject himself to a double allegiance. He may pledge himself to an allegiance to his adopted sovereign, but can not divest himself of his natural allegiance. The children of aliens, too, are the natural born subjects of the State in which they were born, and yet, ex supris, may be natural born subjects of the States from which their parents emigrated.

A denizen occupies an intermediate position between an alien and a naturalized subject. He is an alien enfranchised, ex donatione regis, by the King's letters patent; able to take land by purchase, as an alien can not, but not by inheritance, as a naturalized citizen can. By Stat 12, Will. III, no denizen can be of the Privy Council or of either House of Parliament, or hold any office of trust either civil or military, or be capable of receiving any grants of land from the Crown.

An alien can only be naturalized by special act of Parliament, and, being so naturalized, he can not sit in Parliament or the Privy Council, or receive grants from or hold offices of trust under the Crown. Under Richard III and Henry VIII, severe acts were passed to prevent the influx of foreigners into the Kingdom. Under Charles II aliens were invited to settle in England, and were offered the privileges of natural born subjects. In the time of Queen Anne an act was passed naturalizing all foreign Protestants. In the thirteenth year of George II, an act was passed "for the better supply of mariners and seamen to serve his Majesty's ships-of-war" which provided that every foreign mariner who should, from and after January, 1739, faithfully serve on his Majesty's ships-of-war, or any merchant or trading vessel, for two years, should be to all intents and purposes deemed a natural born subject of Great Britain.

We might fill many columns with the particulars of different bills passed, at different times, by the English Parliament on the subject of naturalization. We have cited enough, however, to give a general opinion of the high value placed on citizenship in Great Britain, and the almost utter impossibility of obtaining it otherwise than by birth. Full citizenship, indeed, can not be acquired; and even Irishman and Scotchmen, though native born, labor under some disadvantages not suffered by the English. Colonists, also, are not complete citizens of the mother country, and can not become such. Their privileges are less than those of Roman Municipia. Those who wish a fuller account of English citizenship and the different acts affecting it will find what they desire in Hansard's Reports, Lingard, Hume and Smollett's Histories and Mackintosh's Essays. The subject is an interesting one but very extended [Ib.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1855.

Bishop Early passed through this city Wednesday, en route for his home, Lynchburgh, Va. The Bishop is in good health and spirits after a very busy and laborious tour. He has attended, with marked punctuality the most distant and difficult-of-approach Conferences. His son, who has been a travelling companion, has also re-established his health. The Bishop has been absent from home five months. In Texas he spent three weeks, visiting and confirming the Churches. He speaks well of those Conferences, their strength and prospects for the future.

Sermons.—Two have been laid on our table, through the Post Office. One a thanksgiving sermon, defining American principles in their application to national prosperity, by Dr. N. Murray. It is printed by the Harpers, and is the neatest job in that line we have ever seen. The other, "On the creed of all men," by Rev. R. Abbey, preached in Yazoo City, Miss., about as good a sermon, but the meanest typographical job, decidedly, we ever laid eyes on. The moral we draw is—Northern and Southern minds compare better than manufactures.

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

How good they are, our readers know: how good natured, we know. Just take the following from a lady, who sends us some lines on the "New Year,"—lines that would be published, but that we have writ the old out and the new in, already in prose and in poetry.

Instead of saying "burn this, if you don't like it, put it under the table etc,"—our fair friend submits to the editorial discretion in verse! By the way, as our name is one much sinned against in pronunciation and spelling, we thank her for setting it right in both:—

Dear brother McIveire,
I very much fear,
I trouble you with a scrawl:
But never mind that,
If you find it too flat,
You need not publish at all.

A THANKSGIVING DAY.

As it is meet and proper, Gov. McRae of Mississippi has appointed a thanksgiving day for that sovereignty. Such occasions, well observed, enlarge the heart of a people, and leaven their utilitarian, earthly life with a religious element. They recognise a Providence in human affairs and blessings. They ought to be kept with gladness—open Churches—rest and generosity. Let man and beast rest, men-servants and maid-servants. These secular sabbaths, if we may so term them, interposed through the laborious year, impart a pleasing poetry to this matter-of-fact world, begrimmed with dust and sweat, bowed down with toil. They are grateful and spiritualizing. We wish they were often proclaimed and better kept. But to this proclamation:

"Now therefore, I, John J. McRae, Governor of Mississippi, do hereby appoint Thursday, the Eighteenth day of January next, as a day of Thanksgiving and praise to Almighty God, for the blessings of the past year, and of prayer for their continuance and increase through the coming year, and respectfully recommend to all good people of the State, that abstaining as far as possible from all ordinary business occupations on that day, they will observe it as a day set apart for these sacred purposes."

RELATION OF BAPTIZED INFANTS TO THE CHURCH.

The January number of the Methodist Quarterly has an able article on this subject; by the Editor, we presume. If it does not solve the problem, now being pressed on the sense and conscience of the Pedo-Baptists, it largely contributes to the solution.

The ground is stated emphatically—"That the baptised infant is a member of the visible Church of Christ in the same sense as a baptised adult convert, and is entitled to the same ecclesiastical recognition and training."

For the Organic Church, means of grace and nurture are claimed—if but developed—to secure the stability of these young members as well as old ones; so that literally they may grow up in the Lord, and that saying, "old enough to be converted" be branded as a heresy.

The article does not blink the issue—not fearing Romanism on the one hand or Bushnellism on the other. The doctrines of Methodism are favorable to a settlement of this question on a consistent basis.

"Promiscuous baptisms" are pronounced against. A child to be a proper subject for Baptism, it is claimed, must, besides its personal right and preparation, have certain relative ones in its parents. Scaling children as they may be found or brought, anywhere, and then sensing any recognition of them as differing in their relations to the Church from others, has grown out of abuse and into abuse, and given the Anabaptists their hardest gainsaying. Guards are to be thrown about the subject, and the practice so regulated by a theory of doctrine as to fall into system.

On this point somewhat could be said of private baptisms. The child is not sick, but the parents prefer a favorite administrator, and do not like his church; too proud or ashamed to stand in public consecration. Or, they want friends present, who do not wish to be seen in the congregation. Or, their own private parlors afford not only a more select assembly but finer accomodations than a poor sanctuary. Or, they want a religious soiree.

We were once called upon for private baptism. "Is the child sick?" "No." "Bring it to the Church." "Can't do that—invited several friends, &c." The point pushed close, there was a dancing party arranged to come off, in rivalry of some Lutheran neighbors, who had lately had a baptismal blow-out. Of course, we declined to initiate the ceremonies.

On a granite corner post of a Camp street Confectionary may be read, after a flourish of candies and syrups, these words:

"Suppers for christenings, marriages and soirees, at the lowest rates."

All these and other abuses that have scandalized this solemn, beautiful, and christian sacrament call for reform, not of doctrine but of careless practice and loose, undefined views of the relations of parties. The baptism of infants ought not to be done in a corner. The responsibilities and privelges involved should be appreciated. The general and right understanding of these things, will mark an era in the progress of the Church.

We shall re-publish the most of the article of the Quarterly and now call attention to it in advance.

OUR TRACT SOCIETY.

A distinct organization has been effected and an additional bureau for its management established at Nashville. As our readers are aware, Dr. Hamilton has been assigned to it, and accepted. By what authority this is done we know not. The Constitution of the Tract Society, adopted by the General Conference says in Art, 8, "The Book Editor shall be the Corresponding Secretary." Dr. Summers was by that body elected Book Editor and consequently held the office to which Dr. Hamilton succeeds. Dr. S. resigned it. It is certainly competent for an officer to resign. In such case the Constitution makes a provision for the election of his successor. But the resignation of part of an office, and the creation of two officers at Nashville, where the General Conference only contemplated and appointed one, is to us unexplained by any power or discretion granted by that body.

We presume, however, that, though unknown to us, provisions do exist covering the case. Dr. Summers' learning and wisdom make him equal to any office he accepts; and his conscientious industry and irrepressible energy will make the requirements of any office equal to him. As for Dr. Hamilton, there could not be a happier selection of a chief officer to inaugurate the Tract movement.

The character and standing of Conference Agents shows that this work is undertaken in earnest, and is going to be made something of. Surely our church and our times need the services it is to do. Ferguson of Alabama, Cox of Texas, Smith of Georgia, Townsend of South Carolina, are no supernumeraries; but whole and strong work is counted for.

A metropolitan residence will well become Dr. H., and he will become it. His vigilance and activity and business tact, will be in place. His opportunities for controlling central influences will not be lost for his cause. So, after all, he is going to N-a-s-h-ville.

Mansfield La: the Advertisement of the Trustees of the School at this place presents a flattering prospect. In engaging Dr. Thweatt's services they have been fortunate. Their plans are generous. With such a Principal and such trustees it is no experiment.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE BAPTISTS—FROM THE "BEGINNING OF THE GOSPEL" TO THE PRESENT TIME. By Rev. W. C. Duncan, A. M. New York, 1855. E. H. Fletcher. 12mo pp. 236.

This is "part first," reaching from 28 A. D., which the author assumes as the "beginning of the Gospel" to 250 A. D., where he locates the rise of infant baptism. This time is divided into four ages—The Christian, the Apostolic, the Apostolic Fathers, the Christian Fathers: Primitive Christianity is viewed from a Baptist standpoint. The Early Christian was the "Early Baptist Church." Its usages, doctrines and government were fundamentally Baptist. After 250 A. D., the Church declined and was corrupted, but under every dispensation were Baptists. They do not, as most Protestant denominations, date their origin from the Reformation of 1520. That movement helped their development only. Such is Mr. Duncan's theory.

This definition is given as a clue to the historical labyrinth.

"The doctrine that immersion alone is baptism and that believers alone are entitled to receive the rite, and the practices necessarily arising from this religious conviction, are the essential and distinctive elements of Baptist usage and belief."

For so long a journey it was well to take light baggage. This definition discards Calvinism, independency of Church Government and a good many other "elements," that Baptists of our time and us for back as we have ever been able to trace them—a good way short of A. D. 28—have claimed as "essential and distinctive." We thank Mr. D. for relieving the controversy of these troublesome "elements." The rest can be easily managed.

Some years as well as points are gained to the controversy, as here presented. Most historians of the "Early Baptist Church," emulating "Celestial" reckoning, go back of the Anno Domini. Instead of a figure so modern as A. D. 28, they begin with U. C. (in the year of Rome) 782—when John the Baptist began his ministry. Mr. Duncan who put forth an interesting volume on John the Baptist a few years since, does not claim his baptism as identical with the Christian—for which some of his brethren have not forgiven him. John the Baptist was only the forerunner of the Baptists, not their founder. Was is not a strange oversight that the disciples at Antioch Church were not called Baptists, instead of Christians!

Before the Apostolic Fathers's age is half-run, the author, yielding his honest hand and intelligent head to the facts of ecclesiastical history, gets to describing the strangest sort of Baptists. An ideal rather than historical existence is kept up. The stream is lost—and you are at liberty to suppose it flowing under ground; the author, meantime, keeping up heart by iterations of "Baptist"—"the Early Baptists," etc., walking by faith where he can't by sight. Take an instance, under the head of "The public and private life of the ancient Baptists." He sets out with the remark that "The Christians of the Baptist Church of the first three centuries exemplified in their lives the traits of the Gospel"—then holds up for modern imitation a "Baptist lady of the olden time"—Here she is—page 180:

"So the pious Monica sowed in the mind of the young Augustine, the seeds which were afterwards to spring up and bring forth abundantly to the honor and glory of God."

No doubt Augustine was well nurtured in the Lord, for he was a great Pedo Baptist. Even on p. 225, we find Mr. Duncan complaining of the spread of infant baptism. "The influence of Chrysostom in the East and of Augustine in the West, rapidly extended the enormous and unscriptural practice," Forsooth we like this Baptist lady "of the olden time." Monica would pass for a good Methodist.

Again, giving us a specimen of the benevolence and brotherly love of these good old Baptist times. page 183:—

"On one occasion, in Cyprian's time, the Church in Carthage, North Africa, sent a large sum (of more than $4,000) to certain Churches of Numidia, to aid in ransoming some of their members from captivity."

Was not Cyprian a Bishop; also zealous and indefatigable in defending and promoting infant baptism? He was all that. This Church was a Pedo-Baptist Church. We wish there were more such. The name of Methodist Episcopal would suit them about as well as Baptist.

The last forty pages of the book are devoted to "Pedo-Baptist admissions in favor of Immersion" and against infant Baptism. Extensive research and learning has produced quite a formidable array. Mr. D. speaks of this portion of his work with great confidence; and it is an argument (!) very specious and weighty, with a certain order of readers, we cannot say reasoners. The German Biblical critics are paraded in force with many American and English, as Chalmers, Campbell, Stuart and Robinson, whose learning and Pedo-Baptism are kept prominent. Now we have this to say, in general, upon this method of argument—

1st. It is unsatisfactory: The intelligent inquirer will ask if these men admitted so and so, how comes it they are Pedo Baptists still? The answer must be, that either they are not reasonable, honest and judicious, in which case their testimony is worth nothing; or they have been garbled and misrepresented as to the whole of their position.

2nd. It is illogical: An advocate of infant baptism or affusion feeling strong enough on other points waives a particular one or conceded it: his concession is good only in conducting the controversy against him and in his line of argument. If the incautious or over confident, or partial, or incapable, or dishonest advocates of a system drop each its "admission" and those admissions are strung together, out of their original connection, do they amount to a total surrender of the system? Zig-Zag approaches may do in military tactics, but not in Christian polemics. Infidels taking advantage of the "admissions" of Christian Apologists have triumphantly proclaimed Christianity a cheat. Suppose a picture complete in its anatomy, expression and colouring submitted to a number of critics. They all admire it, but each marks its least striking or its defective part, as it seems to him. Ugly and by every feature is marked over. Is it a failure therefore—an abortion—a daub? Such a verdict would do injustice to each and all of them and belie the master-piece itself.

Our Baptist friends are very fond of this negative argumentation and no people stand more in danger from its application. Space allows us to say but little of the spirit and style of authorship. They are those of the Christian and scholar. Mr. Duncan has facile access to original sources—Greek, Latin and Hebrew, and draws from them with a freshness in pleasing contrast to the second-hand quoters who have overrun this subject with second-hand learning. By citing volume and chapter and page of his authorities more fully, he would oblige those who have not (as we) the advantage of his personal acquaintance and would like to verify his accuracy. In future editions, and others there will be, this might well be done.

SKETCHES OF PLACES AND PEOPLE ABROAD: BY WELLS BROWN, BOSTON, 1855: J. P. JEWETT & CO.

Othello is author here—figuring not so well as Moorish lover. The factitious interest attaching to the book is its greatest—Brown being a Fugitive slave, sight seeing in "furiu parts." His sketches of distinguished person are about such as many smart body-servants of the South could give. His opportunities for acquaintanceship, not equal to theirs, quite. Messrs. Jewett are the Mecenases of authors of this stripe and get well paid for it. They have paid $70,000 cash to them during the three past years; of which amount $30,000 was paid to Mrs. Stowe. During the year 1854 Messrs Jewett have issued 53 new books.

For sake of the books following, we quote a sketch in the gallery of the House of Commons:

"Near by Mr. Noel you see the Rev. J. Cumming D. D. We stood more than one hour last Sunday in his Chapel, in Crown Court, to hear him preach and such a sermon we have seldom heard. Dr. Cumming does not look old. He has rather a bronzed complexion, with dark hair, eyes covered with spectacles. He is an eloquent man and seems to be on good terms with himself. He is the most ultra Protestant we have ever heard and hates Rome with a perfect vengeance. Few men are more popular in Exeter Hall. He is a most prolific writer, scarce a month passes by without something from his pen."

Sabbath Evening Readings, by J. Cumming, D. D. J. P. Jewett, Boston, 1855. 2. Vols.

Matthew and Mark are exhausted in these volumes. To read them we imagine comes near having the preacher. There is a heartiness without dogmatism about the style of this prolific man, a cordial spirit of sympathy with humanity and love to God, that makes him very readable and the reading profitable. In a family he is popular as well as in Exeter Hall and that is saying much. Dr. C. is a millenarian, out and out: has even fixed 1864, for things wonderful. He is not a teetotaller and does not enjoin fasting as a duty.

Wesleyan Sacred Harp, by Rev. W. McDonald, 12mo pp. 283. J. P. Jewett & Co., Boston, 1855.

The author is a Methodist: so much for the orthodoxy of his selections. The music is conjoined with words suitable for class, prayer, and camp-meetings and congregational singing.

Leaves from the Tree Igdrasyl, by Martha Russel. Boston, J. P. Jewett & Co.

A namby-pamby mess of love stories diluted with weakling sentiments, biographic sketches and nucleotomitudes.

All the above works may be had of J. C. Morgan, near the post-Office, through whom we have them.

Parish and other Pencillings; by Kirwan, 1854: Harper & Brothers, New York.

Dr. Murray, early in his ministry, commenced taking Notes of men and things and peculiar Providences. His faculty of seeing what is worth telling and of telling, will recommend this volume. These "Pencillings" point morals. Among the running titles we read—The danger of delay—Scene in a grave yard.—One talent sanctified. H. D. McGinnis, 36 Camp-street.

Bruno.—Another of those lively and lovely story books for lads issued by the Harpers. Bruno the dog teaches lessons of fidelity, patience and self-denial.

Mortuary.—The interments of the city, exclusive of those in the Cemetery of St Vincent de Paul, for the week ending Sunday morning, numbered 131. There was one burial in the Greenwood Cemetery, the new burial-place opened by the Free Masons on Metairie Ridge.

The Florida and New Orleans Mail.—The Wakulla (Fla.) Times of the 3d says:

Great dissatisfaction exists among those interested at the irregularity of the arrival and departure of the steamers carrying the mails between New Orleans and this port, and hence to Key West. An effort is making to have the contract taken from the present contractors and give it to a party, of which Capt. Brooks, of the steamer Gordon, is at the head. The contractors have been fined $1,700 for one failure, and it is understood that they will be fined to the full extent for the last failure. Directions have been sent to the postmasters to report all failures at once to Washington.

THE BOOK CONCERN—DRS. M'FERRIN AND LEE—FACTS AND FIGURES, ETC.

Mr. Editor—It would seem that what was feared by some, and fully believed by others, when a Book Concern was spoken of at the late General Conference, in contradistinction to an agency, is about to be realized: that is, it wont work well, if at all. Six months gone, and no books yet. Truly, we of this section will have to look to New York, or some other place.

All hands say the agents are true and faithful, doing all they can. But they can't make it rain, and if they could, and the rivers were all up, the books have not yet been printed. Now all I have to say on this head is to the Agents—Don't invest too much of your funds up there, for there may be a change of location. The same power that put it where a steamer can go once in eight months, can take it away.

Doctors McFerren and Lee write and talk gravely on this question. What is the matter. Ah! that is the rub. It won't work; I told you so too. Why, some thought when these two venerable doctors spoke and presented "facts and figures," a book-concern could be made as easily as a brick house. Sebastopol is not taken yet.

What has become of the money that was figured up at General Conference? All gone but $18,000, and no books or book concern yet. I should say if this is the way facts and figures bring us out, better hunt over that small amount to the poor suffering papers, and let Nashville march up to the tune of $70,000, as was promised for her at the General Conference. Then all would be well. Let Dr. Lee figure a little about that, and then we will think over the matter again.

But, sir, it won't work; and the next figuring I expect to see is that all the funds are gone and no books. But stop, says the venerable doctor at the head of goose navigation, "you must be united. We dread division and strife—a house divided against itself can not stand." So we thought, and therefore the Book Concern, as such, is a failure, notwithstanding the figuring of the doctors. So let the papers have all the General Conference has promised them, (for I can not see how the Agents can pay over other order of the General Conference and repudiate this one,) and then fall back upon the old agency system until they can get such a start as will secure a permanent establishment.

I am very sure that this will be as likely to secure peace and unity as any plan attempted heretofore. The idea of a great central organization, with a big gun to be firing away, is all moonshine. This is after thought. New Orleans, St. Louis, Louisville, Memphis, and though last, yet not least, Prattville, is as near the center of our work as Nashville; and had the Book Concern been located at any one of these places, and the claim been set up for the great center, no men would have opposed it more than the preachers of Tennessee, and Nashville especially. Young America.

Miss. Con.

Georgia Conference.—The Editor of the Southern Advocate, who attended, reports:

"There were added to this Conference a greater number of promising young preachers than we recollect to have been admitted for some years past. It augurs well for the Church when educated young men, who could succeed in any avocation, resign the wealth and honors of men to suffer affliction with the people of God. J. O. A. Clarke, P. Cooper, G. G. M. McDonald, J. M. Armstrong, A. J. Dean, W. S. Baker, M. Hanby, J. Nowell, W. S. Turner, R. F. Jones, J. P. Howell, E. T. McGehee, O. P. Fitzgerald, J. T. Ainsworth, J. W. Burke, P. Grover, W. H. Scott, W. P. Pledger, T. T. Christian, W. W. Tidwell, J. Patillo, F. M. Boynton and F. X. Forster were admitted on trial, and F. W. Daggerly and I. L. Potter were readmitted.

But this was not a nett gain. Others have been worn down by the toils of the itinerancy, and M. A. Clontz, A. Gordon, C. L. Hartsell, S. C. Quillian, W. J. Parks, L. G. R. Wiggins and J. P. Dickinson were superannuated; while others heretofore on the supernumerary and superannuated list were rendered effective W. D. Bussey, C. A. Crowell, T. C. Coleman, J. H. Ewing, E. L. Stephens, B. W. Clarke A. B. Smith, E. W. Reynolds and J. Scaife located.

We are sorry to announce a decrease in the numbers in society among the whites, though the increase in colored members makes the sum total yet greater than that of last year. We cannot now give the figures; nor can we account for the existence of the strange fact, after the numerous revivals of the past year, except by supposing some negligence in making the returns. There is, however, a diminution in the missionary collections. We report, this year, $16,612 66, against $17,896 08 reported last year, being a decrease of $1,219 66. Of the proceeds of the past year, and the balance on hand amounting to $24,524 88, the sum of $12,000 has been paid to meet the Bishop's drafts in favor of missions for the same period, and $4,745 16 expenditures in maintaining missionaries where they were to look to other sources than the appropriations for support. Deducting other credits, amounting to $9,000 13, there is left only $7,503 60 to meet the expenditures of the coming year. That is not sufficient appears from the fact that the Mission Committee appropriated $10,75[illegible] to missions in Georgia, and this great State must depend now upon money from other quarters to maintain her own missionary work unless there is at once an unparalleled activity upon the part of her preachers in the missionary collections. Can any Georgian read this fact, that while the missions in this State cost, the past year, $16,771 15, only $10,676 42 were collected in our Churches without feeling a blush of shame mantle the cheek at the bare announcement. May not every pocket thrill with emotion, until the sentence is reversed, and Georgia money go to sustain missionaries in other lands.

The Immaculate Conception.—The Lond[illegible] Globe, referring to the recent settlement of this [illegible] at Rome, says:

"The number of votes was 570 including proxies [illegible] about 120 bishops actually present. Of these, 546 pronounced by acclamation for the new dogma; 43 [illegible] questioned the appropriateness of such a decision [illegible] now; while only 4 votes protested against the [illegible] and against the right of the Holy See to decide [illegible] of that importance without a regular council."

A religious difficulty has arisen in [illegible] New York. It is stated that Mrs. Farnarles, the [illegible] the Mayor, visited the Alms House and distributed a variety of little books on religious subjects, among orphan children there. In the evening the fact [illegible] the knowledge of a Catholic priest, who instructed teachers to destroy the books. Four men, who had been appointed teachers by the influence of the priests, [illegible] the school, seized all the books, destroyed many of them, and it is said, punished some of the children who refused their loss. A committee of the Common Council [illegible] wards met and passed resolutions forbidding any visits from teachers of that sect until an ample apology should be made for the outrage.

The list was unanimously approved of by the Convention, and those of the gentlemen named who were present were conducted to their seats. Gen. Lewis then announced that the Convention was regularly organized, and retired.

Gen. Lamar, upon taking the chair, made the following remarks:

Gentlemen of the Convention—Having been unexpectedly called to my present position, I have no remarks to offer you adequate to the occasion. I shall have to content myself therefore with a few extemporaneous and desultory observations as they occur to my mind at the moment. The great purpose for which this Convention has assembled are familiar to you all. They are equally comprehended by the intelligent and enlightened portion of the whole American people. Any attempt, therefore, on my part, at a formal and elaborate exposition of these motives would be superfluous and a useless consumption of time. Suffice it to say that our purposes, our motives are pure, exalted, holy and just; and that we are driven to our present post from a stern necessity of self-preservation; and he who would imputo to this assembly any other motives, than those openly avowed; he who would ascribe to us any other objects than those of virtue, patriotism and improvements within the limits of the Constitution, is a debaser and a recreant to truth and deserves the reprobation of every virtuous mind. Neither do I say that it is at all necessary for me to anticipate any of the measures or actions of this assembly. There is, however, one measure that stands so prominently and pre-eminently over all, the rest, that I would hardly be excusable in passing it by in silence. I refer to the Pacific Railroad—an enterprise gigantic in its nature, but within the limits of our resources, and one, which when accomplished, will be attended with benefits not only to Neworleans, but to the whole country, fully commensurate with the magnitude of the enterprise. I do not feel myself called upon, nor does the occasion require me to say anything more than simply to acknowledge the great trust that I feel for the high confidence and honor conferred upon me—an honor the more acceptable because it was so gratuitously bestowed; but one which I fear has been formed upon too high an appreciation of my capacity to discharge the duties before me.

And I would be constrained by a sense of duty to decline the honor, were not my kindness has bestowed upon me, were it not from a first conviction that the same feelings that placed me here will also sustain me here, and that you will have the same liberality in overlooking my errors and supplying any deficiencies. So far as concerns a disposition to do what is right, I have a lack of confidence in myself. For, if there is a chord that is found responding more durably as the spring of life, it is that feeling that vibrates at the name of my country.

We are not entirely a homogeneous people. We are assembled here from a vast and widely extended country, excited to us bringing our prejudices, our individual opinions and local interests into our deliberations. One of the great purposes of this assembly is to extinguish these, and to unite in the same common action for the common weal of all. And in order to achieve this it will be necessary to discard all selfishness, prejudice, local interests and reconciling opinions. And for the purpose of achieving this end, I appeal to the spirits that are represented on the canvas around us. Let their spirits animate us on this occasion, and let us be inspired by their example. Therefore, say fellow associates in one common cause, what refers upon us. Let their spirits animate us on this occasion, and let us be inspired by their example. Therefore, say fellow associates in one common cause, what reform shall I make for the high honor which you have conferred upon me? We are here for the common weal of all. Let, then, all our discussions have an end. Let our strife cease. Let our motto be "For God and our country."

Gen. Felix Huston offered a resolution to the effect that the proceedings of the Convention be governed, as farns practicable, by the rules of the House of Representatives of the United States. The resolution was adopted.

A resolution was read and adopted, adding a marshal to the officers of the Convention; and the President appointed to that office, Mr. Campbell, of New Orleans.

The Secretary read letters from Mr. J. D. B DeBow, Esq., at Washington City; one to the Mayor of New Orleans, transmitting documents for the use of the Convention, and the other announcing the performance of the duties assigned to him as chairman of the committee appointed by the Charleston Convention, last year, to make investigations and reports upon the various subjects for the consideration of the present Convention.

Some debate ensued as to whether the proceedings of the last Convention at Charleston should be read or not. There being no copy of those proceedings present, they were not read.

The Secretary called upon the Chairmen of the sub committees appointed by the last Convention for their reports.

Mr Pike, of Arkansas, Chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, had no report to offer; for which he apologized by saying that he lived in a State where there were no internal improvements, and that he had been unable to obtain the necessary information, for which he had written to various parties. Mr. Pike stated that he had, however, discharged the trust imposed upon him in reference to the Pacific Railroad; drawing up a charter, acts for State Legislatures, and a memorial, all of which he had printed at his own expense, which he would present to the Convention to-morrow.

There were no reports from the Committees on Agriculture and Education, nor from the Committee on Manufactures and Mining. The Chairman of the last Committee, however, was reported to be on his way to the city, and hourly expected.

Gen. Huston offered a resolution, which was adopted, for the appointment of a committee, to consist of two delegates from each State represented, to whom shall be referred all reports, resolutions and unfinished business of the Convention.

The President named a Special Committee of Three to select delegates to serve upon the foregoing general Business Committee. A recess of five minutes was taken for the purpose; at the end of which, the committee reported a list of names, which was subsequently so amended as to constitute the Business Committee as follows:

Chairman, Gen. Felix Huston, of Mississippi; Messrs. Coleman and Alston, of Mississippi; Watts and Horner, of Arkansas; Leatherman and Ferguson of Tennessee; McLeod and De Cordova of Texas; Monroe and Chilton, of Louisiana; Tanner and Hewitt, of Virginia; Hayne and Elliott, of South Carolina; Howell and Weston, of Maryland, and Howard of Alabama.

The following resolutions were read and referred to the Business Committee:

By Mr. Hunt, of Texas:

Resolved, As a mark of high consideration for the distinguished services rendered by the late John S. Skinner, in the cause of commerce, and in the establishment of the first agricultural periodical in the United States, that the President of this Convention be requested to select some suitable person to deliver a discourse on the life and services of the deceased, before the next meeting of this Convention.

Mr. Stith, of Louisiana, offered the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the ladies of New Orleans be invited to attend the next meeting of this Convention, and that the gallery be set apart for their accommodation.

The Convention then adjourned till to-day at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Chilton, of Louisiana, made a tender to the Convention of twenty five copies of the Memoirs of the Pennsylvania Agricultural Society, edited by the late John S. Skinner. The books were accepted.

A letter was read from Messrs. Sherman, Wharton & Co., tendering the members of the Convention the free use of their Reading Room, at the corner of St. Charles and Gravier streets.

A motion being made to return the thanks of the Convention for these courtesies,

Rev. Mr. Marshall, of Mississippi, stated that as the hospitalities of the citizens of Neworleans had been and would be very numerous during the sittings of the Convention, it would be better to wait awhile, and return a general bill of thanks for those hospitalities. [Applause.]

Gen. Felix Huston rose to apologize for his inability to serve as Chairman of the General Business Committee. He also presented to the Convention the apologies of Gen. Quitman, of Mississippi, for his inability to be present.

The Chairmen of the Committees appointed by the last Convention being called upon for their reports,

Mr. Albert Pike, of Arkansas, made explanations in reference to his inability to report as Chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements. He however submitted copies of the documents drawn up by him as Chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and moved that they be referred to a special committee of one delegate from each State. He took occasion to say that he would, at some time during the session of the Convention, make a defense of commercial Conventions against the unworthy motives and inefficiency attributed to them by some people, as well as to express his views upon the subject of the Great Pacific Railroad.

Rev. Mr. Marshall, of Mississippi, Chairman of the Committee on Education, appointed by the last Convention, stated that he would be prepared to make his report to-morrow.

Mr. Dolbear, of Louisiana, offered the following resolutions, which were referred to the General Committee:

Mr. Simnett, of Louisiana, offered the following, which were referred to the same Committee:

Whereas, The State of Louisiana and other Southern States are heavily taxed for the support of Charitable Institutions for indigent sick, the sum appropriated being barely sufficient to defray the expenses of those who are entitled by nativity; and whereas, they have been and are still heavily taxed by the admission of steamers which, having lost or mislaid their protection papers, are thereby debarred admittance into the United States Marine Hospitals, for the support of which institutions the said steamers pay a monthly tax to the United States Government therefore be it

Resolved, That this Convention recommend to Congress the revision or modification of the Mutine laws relating to this subject, providing for the admission, of American seamen, who may have lost or mislaid their protection papers, the person should be selected by this body to open this Convention each morning with prayer.

Mr. Stith, of Louisiana, offered the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the ladies of New Orleans be invited to attend the next meeting of this Convention, and that the gallery be set apart for their accommodation.

The Convention then adjourned till to-day at 12 o'clock.

Prof Chilton, of Louisiana, offered amendments to Mr Jennings's resolutions, which were referred to the same committee.

Dr. McGimsey, of Louisiana, presented the following resolutions, with a short address to the Convention in support of them:

Resolved, That this convention strongly recommend the Chambers of Commerce in the southern cities to adopt such a system of laws and regulations as will put a stop to the dangerous practice, heretofore existing, of making a report to the planters in misrepresentation of their crops; a practice entirely at variance with every thing like safety to business transaction, and tending directly to establish the relation of master and slave between the two hand and planter, by bringing the latter into the most import and servile bondage.

Resolved, That this Convention recommend in the most urgent manner that the planters of the Southern and Southwestern States patronize exclusively our home merchants, and that our Chambers of Commerce and merchants generally exert their influence to exclude foreign agents and factors from their to position in this, and to the purchase and sale of produce in any of our Southern and Southwestern cities.

Resolved further, That this Convention recommend to the legislatures of the southern and Southwestern States to pass laws making it a penal offence for the planters to sell or the merchants to make such pecuniary advances as

Gen. Huston opposed the resolutions. He belonged, he said, to that class who believe that the less we are governed the better it is for us. He was in favor of planters patronizing the market nearest home, but opposed to any legislation that should undertake to tell them who they shall or shall not deal with.

Mr. Dolbear, of Louisiana, also opposed the resolutions with some vehemence; and moved that they be laid on the table. The motion was put to vote and lost; and then, on motion, they were referred to the General Committee.

Mr. Forshey, of Louisiana, presented the following, which was referred to the General Committee:

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

From the London Daily News.

Peace and Plenty. Saturday, Nov. 5.

The village bells were ringing
By the border of the sea;
The notes blithely stinging,
Clustered in the belfry tree;
From the dome about the hall—
From the mill beside the weir—
Underneath the churchyard wall—
Came the gathering groups to prayer.

Then they softly closed the door,
And the people all arose,
While the knights upon the floor,
Who had forgiveness for foes;
And the simple psalm was sung,
And the children turned to pray,
Where the baron's hatchment hung,
And the grim Crusader lay.

In the carved chancel stalls,
Knelt a maiden in the sun,
And the marble on the walls
Told of fields her fathers won.
She was pleading in her love,
That her lover might not die;
And the angels wept above—
For they heard his dying cry.

The sweet chimes from the steeple
Reached the palace on the waves,
The widow of the people
Whispered low among the graves;
Through the meadows and the lane—
To the lighthouse on the hill—
To their hearts they went again,
And the village green was still.

On the hillside, on the ha'ghts—
Where in spring the vessels blow—
Famine opened famous fights—
Raged the battle with the foe;
Through the dark the rifle flashed,
Sword and plume were wet with rain—
Through the bush battalions dashed.
Charged, and cheered, and charged again.

Man to man, and steel to steel—
When the muskets cease their fire—
Till the swerving columns reel,
Till the wavering ranks retire;
Guards and Chasseurs side by side
Forged themselves a glorious name,
Bravely fought and nobly died
In the brotherhood of fame.

Underneath the pollard oaks
Clustered on a grassy knoll,
Where the woodman's ringing strokes
Never clash the slender pole;
Meeting Death among his foes,
Grasping still his father's sword
Never more to charge again,
Lay the Count face on the sward.

By the ruined mill he sleeps
In the grave his comrades share,
And the maiden's gift he keeps—
One soft tress of shining hair;
She will often pass in dreams
To that grave beside the mill,
When the Winter moonlight streams,
And the snow lies on the hill.

From the True Flag.

Choosing a Profession;
OR,
THE BROKEN-DOWN MINISTER.

BY OLIVER OPTIC.

"There, John, is she done?" said Joseph Broadley, an intelligent boy of fifteen, as he pointed his friend to a very perfect model of a five-and-aft schooner which he had just completed.

The miniature vessel stood upon the work-bench in his father's shop. The finishing touches had just been given to the work, and the young artisan surveyed his handiwork with conscious delight.

"She is beautiful, isn't she, Joe?—I wish I could do that," replied John Emerson.

"Perhaps you could, if you only tried. It has taken me nearly all winter to do it. Do you know, John, that I mean to be a ship-carpenter?" and the eye of the boy kindled with an aspiration of future distinction, as he adjusted the gaff of the model.

"I should like to be one, too; but I know my mother would never consent."

"Why not?"

"She says I shall be a minister."

"You a parson, John?"

"I have no fancy for it."

"Then I certainly wouldn't do it."

"Not if your mother wanted very much to have you?"

"I don't think I would; but my mother would not want me to be any thing I dislike. I am sure I could never make a parson."

"Nor I either; but mother says I can."

"You must reason her out of it."

"How?"

"Show her what you can do. Make a boat, as I have done. I am sure you can make as good a one as this."

"I will make a ship—that would be more difficult—I am sure I could make one;" and there was something in the eye of John Emerson which showed that he had the the energy to accomplish almost any thing he should undertake.

"Good, I like your spunk. You shall work [illegible] and you need not tell any [illegible] doing, so that you get it done [illegible] and mother will be surprised."

"I'll do it, Joe!" exclaimed John, clapping his hands. "I'll show them what there is in me, at any rate."

"Bravo! and after dinner we will go down to the saw-mill and pick out a log for the hull."

The plan was agreed to, and before night the log was in the shop, and some progress made in shaping it into the required form. But the task was not an easy one, and more than once the young mechanic was obliged to leave the shop and go down to the wharf to study the build of a real ship.

Joseph Broadly encouraged his friend, and the work went on bravely. Though John had projected an enterprise which, if successfully accomplished, would eclipse his own labors, he was not envious or ill-natured, and did all he could to assist his young friend without doing any thing that would rob him of the credit of his work.

We have not space to mention all the trials and difficulties which beset the embryo ship builder; but at the expiration of six months, having devoted all his spare time from school to the work, the ship was completed. There were plenty of critics at hand, well acquainted with every timber and every rope in the ship and their judgment was decidedly favorable. Every body that knew any thing about ships pronounced the young man to be a genius, and said he would make a mark upon the world.

When every thing was ready, the model ship was placed upon a little wagon and drawn over to John's house.

His father and mother were summoned to the door to view the handiwork of their son. Mrs. Emerson was in ecstasies, and Mr. Emerson rubbed his hands with delight.

"Now, mother, what do you think of my talent for ship-building?" said John, as he pointed triumphantly to the work of his hands.

"It is very pretty, isn't it, husband?"

"Now, mother, I am going to be a ship-builder."

"A ship-builder!" exclaimed the fond mother with evident horror.

"Yes, mother; Captain Smith has offered to take me as an apprentice"

"No, but, my son, you know I want you to be a minister. You must be ready to enter college in a few years"

"Don't bother him boy, wife; let him be a ship-builder, if he wants to. You see he has a talent, as well as inclination that way," said Mr. Emerson, as he led into the house again, followed by his wife.

John bestowed the ship in the back room, and joined the family circle.

"I have set my heart on making a minister of him. It is so much more respectable than a carpenter, or any thing of that sort," continued Mrs. Emerson.

"Pooh!" interposed the husband, with a contemptuous sneer.

"You needn't 'pooh' me, Emerson. You know that a minister is better than a carpenter."

"No, I don't. I entirely dissent from your view of the subject. I think a mechanic quite as good as a parson; and I am perfectly satisfied that many mechanics are much better, more respectable, and more useful members of society than some ministers I could mention."

"There it is again! If you had your way, we should have no preaching, and the world would go back into heathenism again."

"And may yet, for all that one-half of the preachers will do to prevent it. I have not the least objection to John becoming a parson, if he chooses. But let him choose for himself."

"As though a mere boy could know his own mind! It is our duty, husband, to act for him, till he is old enough to act for himself"

"True, but we ought to consider the boy's taste, and have some regard for his fitness."

"You don't mean to say he is not fit for a minister?"

"I don't say any thing about it; but I know he has both taste and fitness for the trade of a ship carpenter."

"How unreasonable you are! As though when he has been in college, he will not have a taste for preaching! When he puts his mind to it, he will be perfectly satisfied with the calling; and if he don't make one of the smartest ministers in the country, I lose my guess"

"Ha, ha! He will make a better ship carpenter; but let the boy speak for himself. He is old enough to understand the subject"

John did speak for himself; but his mother's eloquence was too much for him, and after a deal of coaxing, he consented to abandon his inclinations, and endeavor to make a minister of himself. He was an excellent scholar, and as his mother predicted, he was prepared for college at the end of the year.

Mr. Emerson, though he was satisfied his son had been unwisely influenced in the choice of his future profession, deemed it prudent to urge no further objection to the plan. He was well off in the world, and abundantly able to give his son a liberal education.

John was ill at ease in view of his future calling. He was dispirited and gloomy; he felt how insufficient were his abilities to meet the requirements of the sacred profession. Though he labored diligently in his studies, he felt that he was laboring to please his mother, rather than to advance Christ's Kingdom upon earth

Technically speaking, he had "experienced religion;" but it was only as an indispensable qualification for his future duties. There was no religion in his heart; he knew it, and his conscience rebelled at the thought of the abominations to which he had himself open by insincerely entering the sacred inclosure.

If he tried to be religious, he realized how unworthy were his motives; he was seeking God for the sake of making a respectable appearance in his profession! More than once he determined to abandon his purpose—throw away his books of divinity, and take to the ax and anger. But his mother's influence was still potent, and in spite of himself he became a minister at last.

Twenty years in the swift flight of time had passed away, since the two boys stood together in the work-shop gazing at the model of the schooner.

In one of the maritime suburbs, near an extensive shipyard, in which are four immense clipper ships on the stocks, stands a small, dingy church, bearing the most evident signs of neglect. But it is a small society, and the few who worship there find it exceedingly difficult to pay the rent. John Emerson, the pastor, the meager salary of five hundred dollars a year. Mr. Joseph Broadley, the enterprising shipwright, who owns the yard near the church, it is said, pays considerably more than half of this sum, for the pastor is an old friend and he earnestly desires to sustain him.

The church is in a most unprosperous condition. It has been running down for several years. One by one, the society are leaving it, preferring to walk half a mile to another church

There is a reason for every thing; and there was a reason why the Rev. John Emerson succeeded no better in building up the society over which he presided. His preaching was so insupportably dull and insipid, that it was a severe penance to hear him. People said he was no more fit for a preacher than Beelzebub was for a saint; and they would not go to hear him They said he did not seem to care any thing about his profession, and was so gloomy as well as dull, that they could not tolerate him either in the pulpit or out of it; and if had not been for the fact that Mr. Broadley, with all his influence, went to meeting there, the pews would have been entirely deserted.

The Rev. John Emerson was a broken-down minister. In his better days he had been settled in the pastoral charge of an extensive and wealthy society in the city. But after the first year, he "flatted out," as folks called it, and some of his influential parishioners gave him a hint that he had better ask a dismission.

He had tried several places with no better success, and finally after years of inactivity, had been compelled to accept a call from the feeble society where he now officiated.

His father and mother were both dead, and he had already expended his inheritance in supporting his expensive family while waiting a call. He was poor; his spirits were broken down, as well as his occupation.

Harassed by financial embarrassments, there seemed to be no hope for him, but the hope beyond the grave. What wonder that, weighed down by trials and sorrows, he was unable to preach to the satisfaction of his people?

To cap the climax, his society, in spite of the influence of Mr. Broadley, voted, at last, to request him to ask a dismission. Even the poor pittance, which had been barely sufficient to support him, was to be withdrawn, and the most abject poverty stared him in the face.

In the loneliness of his study, he shed great scalding tears over his unhappy lot The world had been full of griefs to him. Misfortune upon misfortune had been his portion, and now, a helpless servant in the vineyard, he was to be cast out a beggar.

When he had sufficiently vented his anguish, he left the house, and walked down to the shipyard Joseph Broadley had ever been his constant friend, and in his extremity, he flew to him for counsel and assistance.

"It is of no use, Joseph," said he, sadly, as he wiped a tear from his sunken eye. "I never was fit for a minister."

"That is very true, John; but it can't be helped now."

"If I had gone to a trade, as you did, I—"

He paused, leaving the sentence unfinished, for it cast a reflection upon a mother who laid in a remembered grave.

Nature made him for a mechanic, gave him the taste and the fitness for a mechanical calling; she made him a minister, a profitless servant of the Great Master, because in her weakness she deemed it more respectable'

"Cheer up, John; there is hope yet," said Joseph Broadley.

"Alas! there is no hope. I can never preach again, and I am fit for nothing else now."

"Yes, you are; though I presume you do not wish to abandon your profession."

"Abandon it! With all my soul! I can serve the Lord much more acceptably in any other calling."

"If it were not for the name of the thing, I would gladly offer you a situation as bookkeeper at the yard."

"I care not for the name, Joseph; I have a family to support."

What a contrast! Ten two boys, with substantially the same abilities, had reached far different points in the pursuit of success The fame of the ship-builder was spread over the whole world. Success had crowned him in all his undertakings. The minister was broken down, poor and in despair.

"I will give you a thousand dollars a year, if you like," said Joseph, diffidently.

"God bless you!" exclaimed the minister, and a tear of gratitude stood in his hollow eye, as he grasped the hand of his friend. "I can never earn such a salary as that."

"Oh, yes you can; cheer up"

"May God ever bless you, Joseph!"

The arrangement was effected immediately, and the broken minister once more had the courage to raise his head, and hope that he might yet redeem his existence from utter uselessness. His old taste returned to him, after a while, and he proved to be quite an efficient aid to his friend, independent of his sphere as an accountant.

The moral of our story need not be pointed out. If a boy has taste and fitness for a mechanical art, let him be a mechanic. "Many a good shoemaker has been spoiled to make an indifferent, a useless minister."

To Him That Time.—Here is a good one from the Boston Post:

Rev. Mr. Foster, of New Salem, Mass., was a facetious man, and usually ready at joke and repartee. He had a parishioner, a carpenter by trade, pretty well stocked with ready wit, and withal somewhat given to boasting. One day, while at work for his minister, hewing a stick of timber, the carpenter was boasting, in his usual style, of the marvels he could perform. The pastor, to put an extinguisher upon him, said: "Governor (his nickname) do you think you could make a devil?"

"Make a devil!" responded the Governor, "why yes, oh yes! (his broad ax moving a little more rapidly) "here, put up your foot; you want the least alteration of any man I ever saw!"

It was rare that the minister came off second best in such encounters, but he did this time.

Revelations of the Telescope.

The following is from the scientific work, soon to appear, called The Universe no Desert, the Earth no Monopoly:

Such is the aspect of a clear nocturnal sky to the unaided vision. Imposing as it is, the spectacle may be expanded indefinitely. Application of that magic instrument, the telescope, displays a more magnificent scene, one bewildering in its wide extent and brighter rays. Sparklets of night are now become dense and numerous clusters; cloudy specks are spacious fields of glory, thickly sprinkled with sparkling orbs; or are a continued sheet of lambent flame wildly twisted into spiral masses; single stars are separated into double and multiple components, beautified by a variety of color and a depth of tint. Some are seen revolving in duplicate, and others in triplicate, around each other, and still farther carried to such a degree of complexity as almost to baffle the searching analysis of mathematical investigation. Nebulæ assume new shapes, and become more luminous Instead of the eight thousand stars observed by the naked eye in all directions, we now reckon our galaxy alone to contain at least eighteen million, visible through optical aid.

Instead of one solitary Milky Way, we number some four thousand Nubuiæ, unseen except by the telescopic eye, and many of them estimated equal to our own in magnitude There is also a variety in these luminous tracts, some even seeming to be diffused suns filling a large orbital area. We likewise observe variable stars, increasing and diminishing their lustre, and differing in periods of circulation. Indeed, the depths of the heavens surpass the surface in every particular of wonder.

Even the noblest members of our own system become augmented in importance. Sublimity shines through the telescope. Mercury and Venus are found to pass through all the lunar phases to our assisted vision, as we do to the outer planets; the crescent, the half moon, the gibbous phase, and the full, occur to them in regular succession Mars presents his gibbous disk, Jupiter discloses his little quaternion of satellites revolving around a spheroidal form encircled by remarkable belts. Saturn's dull leaden appearance is changed into a globe of burnished silver, tarnished only by its equatorial belts, and surrounded by several shining rings, as well as an industrious company of revolving moons. Uranus, Neptune, and over thirty asteroids—one for each State in the American Union—have been dragged from their obscure hiding places, and recognized as native members of our solar circle. Comets are followed far beyond our former terminus of visibility, as they fly off to their ethelion extremes, and are naught up on their return, long before the natural eye discerns a lucid film upon the firmament. Our radiant satellite is changed from a sharp and slender crescent into an object with notched edges, rugged inequality, and a margin glittering with beads of light; while a silver plate or circular form, soiled with dim spots, now appears a perfect globe indented with vast caverns, and variegated by lofty mountains and beetling precipices.

The dazzling sun himself is found marked with spots of various shapes, shades and sizes, sometimes dimming his very effulgence. Even the motions of the celestial bodies become distinctly perceptible, diagonal in their directions, thus portraying their relative and proper progress, and revealing the real motion of our own globe. Rest is reduced to a mere chimera of the imagination. Matter knows no such predicament. The notion of change is universally unexceptionable.

The Siege of Boone's Fort.

Boone says that when the summons was given "it was a critical point with us. We were a small number in the garrison—a large army before our walls, whose appearance proclaimed inevitable death—fearfully painted and marking their footsteps with desolation"

To Boone, who knew what the terror of Indian warfare really was, the language was but cold truth. He demanded two days in which he might consider the proposal in surrender. It was every thing for him to gain these two days. In them Col. Campbell, or his men, might make their appearance, and the enemy find the woods as much a foe as the fort.

Boone consulted his men whether any thing like a capitulation should be granted. The conference was that of desperate men. He stated that death was preferable to captivity, for he well knew that DuQuesne could not prevent the Indians from cruelty. The determination was to fight, although against such powerful odds, and Boone, who knew that he had the deepest stake in the transaction; for he had most displeased the savages, and was probably the first to insist upon holding the fortress to the last.

Standing on one of the bastions, he returned the final answer of the garrison to the captain, who translated it to the Indians. He said: "We are determined to defend our fort while a man is living."

DuQuesne, with the courtesy of his lineage, stood in attentive anditry of what Boone was saying. Boone was also courteous, and talked like a brave man. "We laugh at your formidable preparations, but thank you for giving us notice and time to provide for our defence. Your efforts will not prevail, for our gates shall for ever deny you admittance." This was a longer speech than usual with the Pioneer. The gratitude expressed for the time and opportunity to provision the fort may have impressed DuQuesne as ironical.

DuQuesne and Blackfish now began the siege in earnest. They had a force that could pour into the fort such a shower of shot that if a white man presented himself within range he must fall. The siege lasted nine days, and nights, for the invaders were in number sufficient to take alternate watches.

It is easy for us to give these details to the page, or peruse them, but the reality of that fight never could be effaced from the memory of those who participated in it. It was one of the most heroic of that series of struggles which gave to Kentucky such a bloody admission into the family of nations. A few gallant men, trained in the forest school, were shut up in a feeble fort which, had the enemy possessed artillery or scaling-laddefs, might have been knocked to pieces, or covered with men. They had around them those whose lives were dearer than their own. The balls fell like rain; there was no hour for rest. It needed such a scene to illustrate the energy of the great Pioneer's character. His conduct on this occasion shows him entitled to rank among the noblest warriors of our country. Indeed, Boone personally enacted a heroism immeasurably superior to that of many in whom history assigns the laurel. Alone, or at the head of his men, he was ever the brave man, content to do his duty under every form or circumstance of peril.

The men at the fort fired when they could hit, while the savages seemed to have fired away as it conscious of a full treasury of powder and lead on which they could rely. Boone says: "After they were gone we picked up one hundred and twenty-five pounds of bullets besides what stuck in the logs of the fort, which certainly was a great proof of their industry."

It was a great proof of the fact that the Indian knew by fatal experience that if he showed himself within range, he was destined to know the accuracy of a Kentuckian's aim. The picture of the old fort, so accurately given in Collins's "Kentucky," from a sketch by Col. Henderson shows near it a belt of woods. These probably sheltered the savages who wasted away impotently, only at rare intervals doing any injury. The defenders lost two men, and there were four wounded. Of this loss one of the killed and one of the wounded was in consequence of the desertion from the fort of a negro, who had a capital rifle, and also had been trained to do execution with it, as was the education of all in the fort. He got into a tree, and having a good aim, was soon one of the most successful assailants. Boone found this out, watched him, and when he saw his head fired. The negro was found after the battle—a ball in his head—the shot being made at a distance of one hundred and seventy yards. In his palmiest days, Leather Stocking never surpassed this. The assailants felt Boone in every hour of the siege.

One of Boone's daughters remained in the fort. Why she did not accompany her mother in the return to North Carolina is not from the records apparent; but it may be that her attachment to her father was so great that she preferred the perils of the fort rather than be separated from him. She was a noble girl—

"Of such a sire, descendant true"

She labored in the defense as zealously as her strength permitted, and was one of those who supplied the ammunition. She was wounded; and when the annals of heroic women are written, her name deserves a conspicuous place.

The Indians tried that by which they had often won horrible passage to the dwelling of the white man. They threw fire on the fort, and it caught! and for a time it seemed as if the fated hour for Boonesborough had come. There was no time for thought. At all risk the fire must be extinguished, and by the boldness and bravery of one young man, who risked the storm of balls, the impending danger was averted. All these things disheartened the Indians; for they had no resource beyond the immediate act, and when in the conflict of physical strength they were overcome, they could see no resource but flight; for, notwithstanding all that is said of their bravery, the Indian was quite ready to recognize that there is a time to run. Boone says the fire was kept up during all the siege without intermission; but this must be somewhat figurative, as, during nine days and nights, if the battle had not wavered or ceased, the physical endurance of the garrison must have failed.

Boone relates one the best tactics of the besiegers: "The enemy began to undermine our fort, which was situated fifty yards from the Kentucky River. They began at the water side, and proceeded in the bank some distance, which we understood by their making the water muddy with the clay; and we immediately proceeded to disappoint them by cutting a trench across their subterranean passage. The enemy discovering our countermine, by the clay we threw out of the fort, desisted from this stratagem."

This device was too good to have been suggested by the Indians. It was a point in civilized warfare, and was probably counseled by DuQuesne; but he forgot that the Pioneer had not been an inattentive observer of whatever of war and its incidents he had witnessed at Detroit. The digging was too hard for the Indian, and so far as he participated in it, he was no doubt quite willing to discontinue the labor.

Experience, Boone says, fully convinced them that neither their great power nor their policy could effect their purpose. On the twentieth day of August (Mr. Peck says twentieth day of September) they raised the siege and departed.

SHALL AND WILL.

To the Editor of the Washington Globe:

Sir—In your paper of Saturday's date, you say: "We will issue no paper on Monday, being Christmas Day." This mode of expressing one's self is so common in some parts of the country, and there is so much carelessness every where in the use of shall and will, that I desire to call your attention to it, and to quote a rule by which the propriety of using the one or the other word may in all cases be determined. The rule is the following:

"In the first person, simply shall foretells;
I will a threat, or else a promise dwells;
Shall in the second and the third does threat;
Will simply, then, foretells the future feat."

That is to say, in the first and second person, shall and will change offices, shall in the first person simply expresses intentions, or declares what is likely to be; while will in the first person promises or threatens; as "I shall go to church to-morrow, and shall meet you there." But will you go? Yes, I will. I shall receive a sum of money next week, and then you shall have yours; I will certainly pay you. In the second person, shall promises or threatens; as, you shall do it; you shall rue the day; if you do not pay me I will sue you.

To say I will be glad to see you is improper. I shall be glad to see you is the correct expression. I will have arrived at the age of twenty-one before the election is also incorrect. I shall have, etc., is the proper mode of speech.

The expression I will drown and nobody shall save me is a very forcible illustration of the use of will for shall, and shall for will; a very common error even among educated people.

A Seasonable Hint.—Above all things, says Culpepper, avoid sudden transitions from heat to cold; it has been the death of thousands. With the thermometer outside only about 17 degrees above zero, and stove-dried air in offices and rooms at nearly 100 degrees. The words of the warning are worth repetition.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE,

THE undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements for the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of a high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own, and the adjoining States, the adoption of a plan, which we trust will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. C. Thweatt, (well-known throughout the State as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South) has been engaged as President of the Institution The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweatt is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield having subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured, that no school can be found in the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning, as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages as far as health, society, etc., are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher Schools of the country—the particulars of which will be published hereafter. The first session of the School to commence on the 8th day of January, 1855.

Parents will please send on their daughters, as there are always advantages to be derived from an early commencement.

Board can be obtained for the present in respectable private families at moderate rates.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

OF all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the Cherry Pectoral, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

Read the following opinion, founded on the long experience of the eminent Physician of the Port and City of

ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851

Dr. J. C. Ayer: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

SUMNER, Jan. 24, 1851.

Dr. Ayer: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my acquaintances as a victim of consumption. I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to state to the afflicted, through you, that my health, in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL. Yours truly,

PREPARATORY SCHOOL.

Thos. C. Brand, A. M., Principal.
——, Assistant.

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. None of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr Mitchell: but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them

The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug6—6m26

VOL. IV...NO. 51. NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY MORNING, JANUARY 20, 1855. WHOLE NO.

Southern Commercial Convention.

FOURTH DAY.

FRIDAY, January 12, 1855.

The Convention assembled at 11½ o'clock. A. prayer was offered up by the Rev. Dr. Colton, of Mississippi.

The journal was read and approved.

Hon. John Moore, of Louisiana, Chairman of the General Committee, reported back to the Convention, as worthy of its consideration, various resolutions which had been referred to the committee.

The Rev. C. K. Marshall, of Mississippi, Chairman of the Committee on Education appointed by the Charleston Convention, rose to make his report. He read a report from the committee, stating that they had been actively engaged in collecting information and preparing facts for the consideration of the Southern people, and submitting, for re-affirmation, the series of resolutions adopted by the Charleston Convention. [These resolutions urge the parents and guardians of the South to consider the claims of the South in the education of their children, and recommend the Legislatures of the Southern States to encourage home authorship and school-book making.]

Mr. Marshall remarked, by way of introduction, that he felt the importance of being brief as the convention was drawing near to a close. He was greatly relieved to the Convention for the courtesy extended him, and proposed to proceed directly to the discussion of the subject under consideration. He said, we do not propose to legislate on this question, but we do intend to mould and put in action public opinion and a great and mighty thing. Though we do not now realize the fruits of labor, so is, to men of foresight who understand the nature of circumstances, a certain prospect of a golden future. We have already accomplished more by these Conventions—the forty Legislatures during the last half century. It is our duty and privilege to set in the current of the South—to direct—desire to be independent of the Northern States, and independent in the Union; and to mail with them. That is our position. What though you build railroads, construct lighthouses, and cut new channels in which to feed the Father of Waters; though your agricultural labors be multiplied. In what way will any of these enterprises affect the interests of education? I say, Sir, that we cannot compete successfully with the Northern States in any commercial enterprise unless we have educated merchants to conduct direct communication with Europe. I hold that it is the prime object of this country to teach her sons correctly. Who doubts the fact that education has the same effect upon the youthful mind that the sculptor's chisel has upon marble? that we can shape the flexible mind in youth as to make it what we desire!

We have not the means of education at home, our scholars are compelled to send their sons and daughters to Northern Colleges and Seminaries. This practice is most injurious to the South. What is the present position of Northern Institutions? One of the Professors of Yale has openly said he would shoulder his musket and march to the field to prevent the extension of slavery. What may be expected of other Northern Colleges, when Yale sets such an example? Sir, I do not believe a young man can be safely educated in the North at the present time! Gracious Heaven! what feelings must exist in a family when a son or daughter returns from some of the Northern institutions and earnestly beseeches his father to emancipate his slaves? These Northern fanatic professors have taught them that slavery is wrong. Their text books are full of denunciations of the institution of slavery. They have taught them that it is wrong to for Abraham and St. Paul did. I insist upon the correct training of the minds of the children of the entire nation in a proper and enlightened manner. We have proposed a plan for the establishment of institutions at home necessary for the education of our people, and we shall keep the subject constantly before the people until they shall begin to realize their deep personal interest in the matter. Then we can get the plan we propose adopted, then we can successfully maintain our independent position toward the North. But, sir, what has been the opinion of distinguished statesmen on this subject? I will read a letter from Thomas Jefferson, showing the views of the great patriot of the Revolution in regard to the practice of sending our sons and daughters to Northern institutions. [Reads the extract.] I shall say no more with regard to our institutions of learning. On the subject of slavery I propose to say a few words. I regard it as very dangerous to lay before the youthful mind any thing that will prejudice it against slavery. I believe the institution of slavery to be right—that God has established it and has civilized man through this institution. I believe that in fifty years' time slavery will occupy this as much territory as it now does. We do not ask aid from the North—we simply ask to do our own work on our own way. They are educating our sons and daughters at home. Northern teachers are coming into our land poisoning our children's minds with fanatical opinions. Would you believe that one of the public school books of this city is a work more objectionable than "Uncle Tom's Cabin" ever was conceived to be? I refer to the production of a good but misguided fanatic man, Abbott to Mr. Wayland's Moral Science. A professor is one of our Southern colleges once said to a young lady, a student of the Institution, "You must not study this work, but the chapter between pages 110 and 132 you may omit, as you will not be examined on this section."

On examination day this young lady said to the Professor, "I want you to answer one question. If that chapter is wrong, how do I know but that they are all wrong?" It is an ultra abolition book, and these books are the hands of Briarens, hurling firebrands of destruction in every direction in the midst of us. The speaker then spoke of the importance of introducing Southern school books into our schools and colleges. That we should by combining our children at home, avoid an expenditure of five millions of dollars annually. He urged the necessity of publishing an entire series of school books adapted to the wants of the South. He wished to see such books brought into general use. He wished to see their authors handsomely compensated for their labors. He then presented an elegantly bound volume before the audience and continued. This is a fine book. I would make you a present of it, Mr President, as a token of my thanks for the beautiful compliment you paid the ladies yesterday, if it were not for the ridiculous sentiments it contains. [Lieut. Maury's Compleat Guide of the World," published by D. Appleton & Co., New York. He referred then to page 151 of this work and read as follows:

"In the Southern States, where the multure of cotton and rice is so largely carried on, the field labor is for the most part performed by negro slaves—a race of beings who was ordained to be worse treated in the American states than in any other part of the world. They are very numerous, and are fully conscious of the establishment of a black government in Hayti, and the emancipation of the black population in Jamaica and the other British colonies, the severe yoke under the burden of which they have long groaned must become more and more galling every day. Nor is there any doubt that the times rapidly approaching when they will, by their own bravery, wrest their independence from their American masters, upon the very same principle and with the same patriotism that the Americans wrested their independence from the British Government. In the event of a war between Britain and America, the British would greatly ameliorate this desirable emancipation by landing a few liberal regiments from the West Indies, and establishing depots for the supply of arms at the places on the coasts of which the black troops had taken possession. There are many facilities for the supply of arms, and if war should ever threaten, the measure necessary for the success of it is pretty certain."

One would suppose from the reading of this book that all over any man was sent to hell no would only live to go from one part of this world to another. He spoke of the hypocritical pretensions of Great Britain—the real-est slaveholder in the world—at her sending regiments of soldiers to the bordering Islands that if at any time an outbreak should occur they might be ready to assist in the work of emancipation; he hoped the allies would be defeated before Sebastopol, and was loudly cheered. He thought this book came within the list of prohibition in the State of Louisiana. He read a portion of the statutes of the State of Louisiana showing conclusively that such books were prohibited from the State. The closing sentence was enthusiastically applauded during the silvery tones of his very able speech, and left on the minds of all the auditors a very high appreciation of his scholarship and oratorical attainments.

Mr. McLeod, of Texas, referring very heartily to the remarks of the speaker that had preceded him, said, that any addition to what had been said on the subject would be a work of supererogation. He said he had come as the representative of a Southern State that last entered this great confederacy, and he felt assured that her petition for aid would receive the respectful consideration of this assembly. You all know, gentlemen, that it is to free and her resources that we are to look for the construction of an important part of the Pacific Railroad. I do not desecrate these resources. I assert, as my illustrious constituent, that she has an abundance with which to pay her debts against her, and then go on with clean hands to raise the revenue necessary for the country. I am glad that I stand here, I feel, as a citizen of Texas, I have a right to speak in the name of the people and duty for them a disposition to repudiate one dollar of her liabilities. Here Mr. McLeod read a series of resolutions, which he afterwards proceeded to support. He deemed it highly important that these resolutions should be adopted by this Convention. He referred to the Pacific Railroad—the great absorbing subject, which has brought us together. Texas would probably form a part of the territory through which that road would pass. He then alluded to the fact that the Northern States had already completed several roads north of the Ohio, all tending towards the mouth of that river. He read a resolution which he thought embodied the duty of the South in regard to what route should be selected.

Mr. McLeod offered the following:

Resolved, That this Convention respectfully recommend the people of Texas to reconsider the legislation on their public debt, and pay the principal and interest thereon out of their present resources of money and land, or out of any means which may be appropriated by Congress for Indian spoliations, or other claims of Texas against the United States.

Resolved, That such a course would, in the opinion of this Convention, re-establish the credit of Texas on a par with commensurate with the vastness of the Pacific Railroad enterprise, and supply the means for its rapid construction, not only across her own fertile territory, but including the sterile region between the Rio Grande and the Pacific.

Resolved, That this Convention strongly recommends, as an essential link in the chain of the Southern Pacific Railroad, that the States of Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee organize their means for the construction of an air-line railroad from the city of Norfolk, Virginia to the mouth of the Ohio, or such point in the vicinity, within the limits of Kentucky, Tennessee or Arkansas, as may furnish a convenient site for a depot, and connect possibly with the proposed road from Cairo to the Red River, Texas and the Pacific.

Mr. McLeod was listened to very attentively, and we regret our limited space precludes our giving his speech in full.

Mr. Walker prefaced his speech by remarking that when the Convention was about to take a vote upon the resolutions reported by Genl. Pike, that by moving to lay them on the table, he had since learned that he created an expectation that he would reply to his able friend from Arkansas. He heartily concurred in the sentiments of his speech, and had no desire to be placed in antagonistic relations with the poet from Arkansas. He had found that poetry and oratory were the essential elements of all speeches acceptable to this Convention, but he had lived long enough in this city to have worked out all the poetry of his nature.

No man, however, is a greater admirer of poetry and oratory than I am—those gifts that can throw a charm and enchantment over the cares of life. The pleasure and joy with which I welcome the gentleman to a future residence in New Orleans has only been alloyed by the fear that when New Orleans receives him the West will lose its ablest poet and Arkansas a most brilliant orator. It was not his intention to detain the Convention, or to delay its friendship, but he would proceed to the violation in which New Orleans stood to this Convention.

The Capt. represented her as being lukewarm as to objects of this Convention. He then went on to state that the objects of the Convention are the improvement of the South. Consequently, he would place New Orleans in an antagonistic position and opposed to the best interests of the Southern States. This certainly arose entirely from a misconception. He desired to address a few words on that subject to this assembly.

He said, one of the great objects of the Convention assembled at Baltimore was to establish a Southern port on the seacoast, at which imports could be received from Europe and take place the South independent of the Northern cities. This Convention has grown, however, to such vast importance as to attempt to grasp every question of political economy, science and philosophy that has ever engaged the mind of man. When the Convention met at Memphis, I went there with strong conviction that the whole scheme, was to reverse the laws of nature and to create cities by artificial means.

The scheme which lay at the bottom of the whole assembly was to circumvent New Orleans; to establish, by means of railroads, other ports and cities in which the business belonging here could be transacted. I found this Convention full of chimerical schemes. Unlike my friend from Arkansas, we practical men of New Orleans have not time to investigate these claims. We have hardly time to give proper attention to the practical things of life.

The Convention designed to circumvent the Commission Merchants of New Orleans. It designed to overturn the principles of free trade, established for centuries; to regulate the whole cotton business, and to establish a line between true and false. Now, sir, to give this Convention an idea of the schemes they entertained, I need only say that a great part of the time was spent in investigating the natural history of the valleys of the Amazon and Orenoco.

Sir, one learned Bishop in the Church occupied one whole day of the precious time of the Convention in detailing the entomology, topography, and biography of the baboons, insects, reptiles—every thing animate and inanimate—connected with the valley of the Amazon. What was made upon every thing tangible, practicable or sensible in his nature. Every thing received as true by all the philosophers of the world was received and discussed with the most profound deliberation.

The Mississippi River was treated as a mere hors-depond. I was considered a very unruly member for attempting to make the deliberations of the Convention practicable. Every planter who had a dozen negroes wanted a railroad running in front of the house, and every gentleman who had fifty negroes must have a railroad by his house and another by his kitchen. They treated the significance of New Orleans as ludicrous as that of Tyre and Sydon. When I presented a resolution instructing Congress to grant appropriations for clearing the mouth of the Mississippi River, I was met by a resolution to clear out some river in Wisconsin.

This was the spirit of the Convention. But the genial sun of the South has developed their intelligence and brought out some practical suggestions of value. If the city of New Orleans acted with a lukewarm spirit it was owing to the previous hostilities of Commercial conventions towards her interests. From these reasons my friend from Arkansas will understand the feeling which has existed towards the Assembly.

He then referred to the Pacific Railroad. He was disposed to regard it as impracticable. He was willing that others might try their plans. He would not oppose them.

He spoke of the impossibility of our making ourselves independent of the North by merely encouraging home manufactures, and suggested that agriculture was as necessary here as manufacturing there. We were necessarily subject to the laws of nature and trade. He hoped to see the North assume a dignified spirit, and prove herself to possess all the nobler qualities of humanity, love of liberty and devotion to our rights, with which God has endowed us.

Judge Walker further suggested that it would be for the reputation of the Convention if it would omit something of poetry and speculation and deal more in matters of fact and statistics; it would ignore the Euphrates and devise means of constructing our railroads and practically benefiting the South.

Judge Walker was listened to with great attention, and interrupted with frequent applause. The ability of his speech is only shadowed in our imperfect sketch.

Wm. H. Garland, Esq., of New Orleans, followed Judge Walker.

Mr. President—I had talented darling the sitting of the Convention to have been a quiet listener—to have treasured the rich thoughts and bright ideas that should fall from the lips of the gifted, and in the information which they would impart, and the deductions which would flow from them, to have endeavored to correctly judge of the important questions which are claiming public attention. For neither my time nor the behindsides of my life, nor the patience of the Convention, would justify my trespassing on its patience. But when questions arise in relation to the great objects that has brought us together—when doctrines which I deem in he at war with the best interest of our country are proposed to be made a part of our proceedings, and to go forth to the world endorsed by this Convention I should be false to the high responsibilities which rest upon every member of this Convention, if I did not raise my voice, though feeble it be, and call on the gentleman who surround me to pause and consider well the resolutions which are submitted to them ere they give to them their sanction.

Well said an old country by the eloquent gentleman from Arkansas, that Legislatures make not public opinion, but the laws which they form only give the end vitality to that public opinion. It is in the broad field of social intercourse, it is in primary assemblies such as this where mind in its wildest, freest range is brought in conflict with mind, that truth is elicited and public sentiment formed. It is true, as was beautifully said on yesterday, that this Convention may be but the acorn, but it depends upon the vitality which you impart to it whether the acorn shall grow in a stately tree, stretching its broad arms to give shelter and food to the land, or whether it shall be the noxious Upas tree, withering each flower, and loading each breeze with its deadly poison. If this Convention will keep itself within its legitimate range; if it be minded—that spark which links man's spirit with the spirits of the skies, is brought with all its burning intensity to elucidate the subjects which properly belong to its deliberation, then may we hope it will give forth such thoughts and conceptions as will go bounding over the land until they will gather such power and strength that the Legislature of the land will give life and vitality to them.

It is pleasing, with folded arms, to stand and gaze at the gorgeous sunset—to mark each floating cloud as it is touched with its golden fringe, and weave fancy after fancy into a bright tissue for the future; thus to stand until the stars peep out, and then with a bound of the spark ethereal, which gives life and variety to man's thoughts, pass from star to star, peopling them with our thoughts and filling them with our fancies; but while we are pursuing these figures of the mind and nature in her closing reminiscences, by the gathering darkness and falling dew, that man's life was not to be all a dream, but that on him rested high responsibilities—that while he was thus indulging in pleasing fancies and permitting the mind to waste itself in dreams he was neglecting the development of those blessings which nature has so bounteously bestowed on him.

In this day and time, when the mind is exercising its sovereignty over matter, the truth is felt and I regulated that the gathering of the fruit and the enjoyment of the blessings of Heaven belonged not to the lucrit and slothful, but to those who by the employment of those faculties of the mind with which God has blessed them, render the things of this world subservient to the great ends of their creation, the happiness and perfection of man. Let not then this Convention waste its time on the pleasing fancies that cluster around abstract questions, but let it, like that circlet of stars, cluster around one great idea until their concentrated rays shall form one burning center, so bright that the path which leads to the power, prosperity and happiness of the South shall be so plain that none will hesitate.

What this idea should be, it is only necessary for us to look abroad to our sister States and see the rapid strides which some of them have made to greatness and wealth. But a few years since New York occupied but a secondary position in the confederation of States—now she is the Empire State in population, wealth and power. The genius of her Clinton opened her western resources and filled her forests with a teeming population. The mind of her people indulged not in pleasing dreams, but was directed to this development of those gifts with which God had blessed them. Ohio caught the bright spirit of progress and her lines of improvement by penetrating every corner have filled her rich valleys with a teeming population and made her one of the first States of the Union. Georgia, first of the Southern States, was roused to the employment of her energies and now her barren plains are the abode of productive industry, and the happy cottage marks each of her mountain passes.

From these let us gather wisdom and by the employment of the bright, noble spirit of the South develop those advantages which nature has so bounteously bestowed on us. Carry your lines of improvement to every section, and thus open to it a highway for the transfer of the productions of its industry, and you will soon bring wealth and power to the South.

Much has been said of the unequal influence of the South in the Hall of Congress, and resolution upon resolution has been offered on the subject; but this will not rectify the inequality. To do full let the mind of the South be directed to the development of the advantages which nature has so bounteously bestowed on her, and thus fill her now waste lands with a teeming population. This increased population will bring her increased representation on the floors of Congress, and to this and this alone, are we to look for an equalization of power.

It is not, Mr President, by passing resolutions—or indulging in pleasing fancies, that this is to be done; but the mind must act upon matter and give to it a practical application to the concerns of life. In the discussions of the Pacific Railroad, New Orleans, and even Louisiana, seem to have been forgot. The important position which we occupy to the trade of the Valley of the Mississippi has been overlooked. When the Atlantic shall have been linked to the Pacific by a line of improvement, New Orleans must become one of the most important cities of the world. When the trade of the Indies shall pour all its commerce along these lines, it must be in the hulk of New Orleans that this rich traffic must be first poured from its warehouses to be diffused through the broad valley of the Mississippi. Not only this, but the immense and constantly increasing productions of the North-western States will have to find a mart in some other land than Europe. Where is it to be, save in the Indies and the constantly increasing traffic of the Gulf—where the long and elderly, freighted with all of its happiness, sing and bounding until the islands of the Gulf shall echo back the glad tidings? There shall we find in those sunny lands a mart for our productions. When this shall be, and the ladies pour along our lines of improvement their wealth the United States will become what England now is, the store-house of the world. But for this is no finality here. It is only necessary to point the eye of the merchant to the map. Make these improvements and your commodities from Canton, by New Orleans and New York to London will be made in forty-five days, while now the shortest time across the Isthmus of Suez is sixty-two days—making so great a difference in time that all mercantile men will understand that it must revolutionize that commerce.

"O'er the glad waters of the dark blue way"

"With hopeful loudness and with thoughts as free,"

But what is the highway line of communication to be made? Already have lines of railroads constructed, or in the process of construction, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. These are met by lines constructing further into the West from New Orleans, Mobile and other points. Give to these lines of note our money, at least the support of your approbation. Behold and the day is not distant when the whistle that wakes on the Atlantic shall be heard on the shores of the Pacific. Let these lines be pressed forward to completion, and when they shall open in the far West in fraternal embrace, then let the general Government welcome them and carry them to completion.

Much has been said about the prejudices of the present and the holy memories of the past. If you would remove the one and perpetuate the other, extend your lines of improvements so that the different sections may be brought into closer contact, and thus by knowing each other better, learn to judge more charitably and more justly. If you would perpetuate the past, let your sons go to the plains of Lexington and there read the heroism of the men who stood on the Cliffs of Yorktown and look upon the waters that have rolled into a storm by the very finger of Heaven to protect our land. Let them gather up the holy memories of the past and let their hearts be expand and their thoughts to be elevated to emulate the deeds of their fathers; and let, then, their sons visit our warm and sunny South, and while gazing upon the fields made memorable by Southern valor and the heroism of a Jackson, feel in their hearts the enthusiasm that warms the Southern bosom for this glorious Union.

Thus let them gather up all their memories and in the high and noble resolves which they will prompt let them

"Snatch from the ashes of their sires,
The embers of their former fires,
And leave their sons a hope, a flame,
They, too, would rather die than shame."

Mr. Garland's remarks were attentively listened to, and at their close warmly applauded.

Capt. Pike, of Arkansas, said:

Sir, it is well known that there was a large delegation to the Charleston Convention from the States of Virginia, South Carolina and Georgia. We know that those delegations were adverse to the powers of the General Government being called into the same measures, and we of this section and the West were compelled to pass over resolutions requesting Congress to make appropriations for the improvement of our Western Rivers again and again. It is well known too, that the delegations from these States were opposed to the meeting of this Convention in the city of New Orleans, and with a lukewarm spirit it was owing to the previous hostilities of Commercial conventions towards her interests. From these reasons my friend from Arkansas will understand the feeling which has existed towards the Assembly.

He then referred to the Pacific Railroad. He was disposed to regard it as impracticable. He was willing that others might try their plans. He would not oppose them.

He spoke of the impossibility of our making ourselves independent of the North by merely encouraging home manufactures, and suggested that agriculture was as necessary here as manufacturing there. We were necessarily subject to the laws of nature and trade. He hoped to see the North assume a dignified spirit, and prove herself to possess all the nobler qualities of humanity, love of liberty and devotion to our rights, with which God has endowed us.

Judge Walker further suggested that it would be for the reputation of the Convention if it would omit something of poetry and speculation and deal more in matters of fact and statistics; it would ignore the Euphrates and devise means of constructing our railroads and practically benefiting the South.

Judge Walker was listened to with great attention, and interrupted with frequent applause. The ability of his speech is only shadowed in our imperfect sketch.

Wm. H. Garland, Esq., of New Orleans, followed Judge Walker.

Mr. President—I had talented darling the sitting of the Convention to have been a quiet listener—to have treasured the rich thoughts and bright ideas that should fall from the lips of the gifted, and in the information which they would impart, and the deductions which would flow from them, to have endeavored to correctly judge of the important questions which are claiming public attention. For neither my time nor the behindsides of my life, nor the patience of the Convention, would justify my trespassing on its patience. But when questions arise in relation to the great objects that has brought us together—when doctrines which I deem in he at war with the best interest of our country are proposed to be made a part of our proceedings, and to go forth to the world endorsed by this Convention I should be false to the high responsibilities which rest upon every member of this Convention, if I did not raise my voice, though feeble it be, and call on the gentleman who surround me to pause and consider well the resolutions which are submitted to them ere they give to them their sanction.

Well said an old country by the eloquent gentleman from Arkansas, that Legislatures make not public opinion, but the laws which they form only give the end vitality to that public opinion. It is in the broad field of social intercourse, it is in primary assemblies such as this where mind in its wildest, freest range is brought in conflict with mind, that truth is elicited and public sentiment formed. It is true, as was beautifully said on yesterday, that this Convention may be but the acorn, but it depends upon the vitality which you impart to it whether the acorn shall grow in a stately tree, stretching its broad arms to give shelter and food to the land, or whether it shall be the noxious Upas tree, withering each flower, and loading each breeze with its deadly poison. If this Convention will keep itself within its legitimate range; if it be minded—that spark which links man's spirit with the spirits of the skies, is brought with all its burning intensity to elucidate the subjects which properly belong to its deliberation, then may we hope it will give forth such thoughts and conceptions as will go bounding over the land until they will gather such power and strength that the Legislature of the land will give life and vitality to them.

It is pleasing, with folded arms, to stand and gaze at the gorgeous sunset—to mark each floating cloud as it is touched with its golden fringe, and weave fancy after fancy into a bright tissue for the future; thus to stand until the stars peep out, and then with a bound of the spark ethereal, which gives life and variety to man's thoughts, pass from star to star, peopling them with our thoughts and filling them with our fancies; but while we are pursuing these figures of the mind and nature in her closing reminiscences, by the gathering darkness and falling dew, that man's life was not to be all a dream, but that on him rested high responsibilities—that while he was thus indulging in pleasing fancies and permitting the mind to waste itself in dreams he was neglecting the development of those blessings which nature has so bounteously bestowed on him.

In this day and time, when the mind is exercising its sovereignty over matter, the truth is felt and I regulated that the gathering of the fruit and the enjoyment of the blessings of Heaven belonged not to the lucrit and slothful, but to those who by the employment of those faculties of the mind with which God has blessed them, render the things of this world subservient to the great ends of their creation, the happiness and perfection of man. Let not then this Convention waste its time on the pleasing fancies that cluster around abstract questions, but let it, like that circlet of stars, cluster around one great idea until their concentrated rays shall form one burning center, so bright that the path which leads to the power, prosperity and happiness of the South shall be so plain that none will hesitate.

What this idea should be, it is only necessary for us to look abroad to our sister States and see the rapid strides which some of them have made to greatness and wealth. But a few years since New York occupied but a secondary position in the confederation of States—now she is the Empire State in population, wealth and power. The genius of her Clinton opened her western resources and filled her forests with a teeming population. The mind of her people indulged not in pleasing dreams, but was directed to this development of those gifts with which God had blessed them. Ohio caught the bright spirit of progress and her lines of improvement by penetrating every corner have filled her rich valleys with a teeming population and made her one of the first States of the Union. Georgia, first of the Southern States, was roused to the employment of her energies and now her barren plains are the abode of productive industry, and the happy cottage marks each of her mountain passes.

From these let us gather wisdom and by the employment of the bright, noble spirit of the South develop those advantages which nature has so bounteously bestowed on us. Carry your lines of improvement to every section, and thus open to it a highway for the transfer of the productions of its industry, and you will soon bring wealth and power to the South.

Much has been said of the unequal influence of the South in the Hall of Congress, and resolution upon resolution has been offered on the subject; but this will not rectify the inequality. To do full let the mind of the South be directed to the development of the advantages which nature has so bounteously bestowed on her, and thus fill her now waste lands with a teeming population. This increased population will bring her increased representation on the floors of Congress, and to this and this alone, are we to look for an equalization of power.

It is not, Mr President, by passing resolutions—or indulging in pleasing fancies, that this is to be done; but the mind must act upon matter and give to it a practical application to the concerns of life. In the discussions of the Pacific Railroad, New Orleans, and even Louisiana, seem to have been forgot. The important position which we occupy to the trade of the Valley of the Mississippi has been overlooked. When the Atlantic shall have been linked to the Pacific by a line of improvement, New Orleans must become one of the most important cities of the world. When the trade of the Indies shall pour all its commerce along these lines, it must be in the hulk of New Orleans that this rich traffic must be first poured from its warehouses to be diffused through the broad valley of the Mississippi. Not only this, but the immense and constantly increasing productions of the North-western States will have to find a mart in some other land than Europe. Where is it to be, save in the Indies and the constantly increasing traffic of the Gulf—where the long and elderly, freighted with all of its happiness, sing and bounding until the islands of the Gulf shall echo back the glad tidings? There shall we find in those sunny lands a mart for our productions. When this shall be, and the ladies pour along our lines of improvement their wealth the United States will become what England now is, the store-house of the world. But for this is no finality here. It is only necessary to point the eye of the merchant to the map. Make these improvements and your commodities from Canton, by New Orleans and New York to London will be made in forty-five days, while now the shortest time across the Isthmus of Suez is sixty-two days—making so great a difference in time that all mercantile men will understand that it must revolutionize that commerce.

"With hopeful loudness and with thoughts as free,"

But what is the highway line of communication to be made? Already have lines of railroads constructed, or in the process of construction, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. These are met by lines constructing further into the West from New Orleans, Mobile and other points. Give to these lines of note our money, at least the support of your approbation. Mr. Garland's remarks were attentively listened to, and at their close warmly applauded.

Capt. Pike, of Arkansas, said:

Sir, it is well known that there was a large delegation to the Charleston Convention from the States of Virginia, South Carolina and Georgia. We know that those delegations were adverse to the powers of the General Government being called into the same measures, and we of this section and the West were compelled to pass over resolutions requesting Congress to make appropriations for the improvement of our Western Rivers again and again. It is well known too, that the delegations from these States were opposed to the meeting of this Convention in the city of New Orleans. They desired that it should adjourn to meet in Richmond or Norfolk.

Now, sir, this Convention was brought here for the very purpose of furthering the interests of New Orleans.

Mr. Pike then spoke at length and in the quickest way of killing a proposition of this kind to be adopted by the author with wanting common sense, or charged him with the misfortune of being a poet. I make no pretensions to poetry. I was not born a poet, and have never succeeded in making myself one. I would, however, set myself up for comparison with the gentleman from New Orleans, as to relative practical sense and ability. He would be the last individual. I would judge to be endowed with great common sense. He is represented as being at the head of one of wild-cat banking in the country.

Capt. Pike alluded to the prosperity of New York. The idea of connecting the waters of the Atlantic with the Northern Lakes was looked upon once as a chimerical scheme. There is a man now living in England who laid the first railway in the world. That man can now see his own island checkered over with railways. It will be utterly impossible to retain our Western States, made strong by the maternal nursing of the Government in the early years of their history, without communication by railroads with them. They will never consent to be themselves an independent empire on the shores of the Pacific. This scheme of road initially is called chimerical. I know of no other.

Let us reduce the plan to its smallest limits. The plan proposed is to form a corporation, obtain a charter from some one of the Southern States, and invite citizens and States to take stock in that road. The object is to build a road to the Pacific, with branches verging from Vicksburg, Cairo, New Orleans and other points, if thought proper. He spoke of the reckless and revolutionary condition of Europe—that capitalists were anxious to invest their wealth in a peaceful country—that now was a most favorable period for commencing this great national work.

In reference to the charge of disunionism, made by his honorable friend (Mr. Walker), he had the most profound respect for the Constitution. God forbid that he should utter one word against that holy compact by which the Union of these States is effected. God forbid that he should say a solitary word to bring about a difference between the North and South.

Mr. Pike's speech was listened to attentively, and frequently applauded.

Dr. McGimsey, of Louisiana, offered the following, which was referred to the General Committee:

Whereas, More than ten thousand American and Foreign shipping, laden with the great agricultural staples of the Southern and South-Western States, and with their return cargoes to the value of more than three hundred millions of dollars, pass through the narrow strait between Cuba and Florida; and, inasmuch as this commerce is rapidly increasing, and must continue to do so with the increase of population in the great Valley of the West, and opening of the Isthmus routes to the Pacific Ocean; and whereas, the Island of Cuba, by its Northern ports lying directly upon this only highway for this immense commerce, and commanding the transit of the same, both export and import, possesses the only suitable and sufficient port or harbor within the distance of two hundred leagues, where a naval station at all adequate to the protection of this great commercial interest can be established, and for the want of which, from unfriendly relations which may be very readily apprehended, especially may action, exposing this commerce to such dangers and perils as the laws of nature and the rights of self-protection demand of us to make for its security, therefore, Be it be

Resolved, That this Convention deems the acquisition of the Island of Cuba essentially necessary to the proper protection of our commerce in those waters and security of our Southern seacoast, and as essentially wise, as a question of permanent national interest, directly and national supremacy, immediate action by Congress on the same.

The Convention then adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow.

FIFTH DAY.

SATURDAY, January 13, 1855.

The Convention met at 11 o'clock. Prayer by the Rev. Dr. Van Arsdale, of Louisiana.

Gen. Lamar, being indisposed, called Vice-President Coleman, of Mississippi, to the chair, and retired.

The journal was read and approved.

Mr A. Levison, of Louisiana, Assistent Secretary, (and upon whom nearly all the labors of the Secretaryship have devolved during the session,) tendered his resignation, and Mr. C. C. Lathrop, of Louisiana, was appointed in his stead.

On motion, the thanks of the Convention were tendered to Mr. Levison, for the able and efficient manner in which he had acted as Secretary.

The General Committee reported favorably upon Mr. DeCordova's resolutions in reference to a treaty with Spain and Mexico, and upon Mr. Bates's resolution asking Congress to reduce the tariff on coal. The resolutions of Gen. McLeod, of Texas, in reference to the claims of his State upon the Pacific Railroad, were respectfully rejected by the Committee, as being too sectional in their character.

Mr. N. R. Jennings, of Louisiana, Chairman of the Committee on Quarantine, read the report of the Committee, submitting the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, for the past two summers several of the Southern States have been severely visited by that terrible scourge, Asiatic cholera, and this year, tending more than any other cause to cripple the energies, impair the prosperity, and affect the commercial as well as all other interests of the country—

And whereas, high fever, typhus, typhoid and yellow fevers, small pox and other infectious and contagious diseases are imported into our seaport towns:

Resolved, That it is the opinion and firm conviction of this Convention, that all the States bordering on the Atlantic, south of 36 degrees, and those on the gulf of Mexico, have a right to the benefit of the Marine Hospital Service, which is the result of the Federal Government, and that it is the duty of Congress to make provision for the establishment of Marine Hospitals at such points on the coast as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. Hyams, of Alexandria, proposed the following:

That this Convention most earnestly recommend to the incoming Congress from the South and States to advocate, by all constitutional means in their power, such a specific duty upon sugar and molasses as the existing interests justly and legitimately demand, and as will secure to the people of the South, as equals with the people of the North in this great confederacy of States.

He proceeded to elucidate his views, when he was interrupted by the President, who stated that the hour had arrived for taking up the order of the day, namely, the Pacific Railroad.

Capt. Albert Pike moved that in adopting the resolutions the vote be taken by States.

Mr. N. D. Coleman proceeded to reply to the charge of hostility to the prosperity of New Orleans, shown by the Memphis Convention. He did not believe there was just cause for such an accusation. He did not believe there were any resolutions brought before the body, in which the interests of New Orleans were concerned, that were not properly reported and adopted by the Convention. After some further remarks he proceeded to read from the minutes of the Convention at Memphis some of the resolutions adopted by that body, in which Congress was requested to make appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, and for increasing commercial facilities in the city of New Orleans. Was not this an evidence that the existence of New Orleans and of the Mississippi River was properly known to the members of that Convention? When the time for adjournment came it was proposed by gentlemen that it meet in the city of Louisville. Another gentleman proposed to meet in Nashville. He himself as chairman had given an especial invitation to the Convention to adjourn to meet in that city, though it is only to-day that city to accept its invitation. There were no resolutions introduced in that Convention relating to New Orleans that the did not heartily sustain. He looked upon New Orleans as the great Emporium of Southern trade. He then addressed a few words by way of reply to the speech of Gen. McLeod, of Texas, which he proceeded to the discussion of the Pacific Railroad question. He regard the route by way of construction of a railroad to the Southern point. The people of the North would have one for a Northern route and such a road would not benefit the South. The great Southern States could accomplish the task if they would resolve to do it.

Railroads, he said, are already constructed, certain process of construction, from various points on the Mississippi leading off to the North. From this city the State of Louisiana is now engaged in constructing a road to the State of Texas. A railroading is also in contemplation, called the "Mobilsing and Texas Railroad." These roads are sustained by the citizens of these sections of the country through which they pass. Their completion will add much to the prosperity of the South. Though we may not bring a direct trade to the city of New Orleans, we shall build up trade in the country and develop the natural resources of the country, which will bring trade to the city of New Orleans. The State of Texas, though a young State in the Union has shown a higher degree of intelligence and enterprise on the subject than any other State except Georgia. She has granted a charter for the construction of a Pacific Railroad beginning on the eastern boundary of Texas, north of Sabine, and has offered twelve sections of land to every mile of road to any company who will engage in and complete the work. A contract on the above conditions will probably be made in May next.

But the road cannot be made useful and profitable unless it reach beyond the Western boundary of Texas. For the purpose of obtaining necessary funds for the continuation of the enterprise he recommend that the Southern States combine in a corporation, each subscribing two million dollars; the remainder could easily be raised from private sources. Now, Mr. President, one may be thought my visionary on this subject. Others have looked at this enterprise in the future, and they can see the day, not far distant, when people will go over from the Pacific to the Atlantic at the rate of forty miles an hour.

In the present navigation of the Pacific Ocean, you are compelled to sail away down south before you can turn directly to China. From San Francisco the voyage can be made direct. Look at the riches of China—the flowing Hoang and Kiang Ku, equal in size to the Mississippi, penetrating into the heart of that country, affording the most easy access to the interior of those Oriental regions. Within a few years China has opened her ports to the commerce of the world. She is not far distant from us. By the South Pacific Ocean it will not require more than a month to make a voyage from Canton to San Francisco. By the new route it is less than 11,000 miles; by the old it is more than 19,000. It will not be long before there will be a vast and increasing amount of travel across the Western continent. The commercial interest of the United States will have much to take into consideration at this time can not be overlooked.

It is a subject worthy of the attention of this nation. The South has it in her power to control and turn into her ports and harbors the trade and travel of the whole Eastern world. So soon as this is done, and the line of trade from the Orient is changed, New Orleans and San Francisco will become the Liverpools of the world and control the world's trade as it is now controlled by the English republic. If we can raise the funds the work will most assuredly be accomplished. The State of Louisiana, as any other State, will, no doubt, be supported

Mr. Pike offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the scholarly, the enlightened merchants and the men of science and learning in the Southern and South-western States, are respectfully invited by this Convention to prepare and lay before it, at its next sitting, papers and statistics, statistical, scientific or otherwise, germane to the objects and purposes of the Convention, and referring to the subjects which have engaged its attention to be published as a portion of the transactions of the Convention.

Mr. Jennings, of Louisiana, offered a resolution commending the report of the Sanitary Commission, appointed by this city in 1853, to the attentive perusal of the cities and towns of the South, which have been afflicted with yellow fever.

On motion, the Convention then adjourned until Monday morning, at 11 o'clock.

SIXTH DAY.

MONDAY, January 15, 1855.

The Convention met at noon.

On motion, the calling of the roll and reading of the journal were dispensed with.

Mr. C. C. Lathrop, the Secretary, announced the arrival of Mr. C. G. Baylor, editor of the Cotton Plant, at Washington City, and moved that he be permitted to address the Convention.

Judge Walker suggested that as the attendance was slim, Mr. Baylor should reserve his speech for a more proper time, and that the Convention proceed with routine business.

Mr. Baylor stated that his object was not to address an audience, but to offer simply a resolution for the consideration of the Convention. The resolutions of Mr. DeCordova, in reference to a treaty with Spain and Mexico, and of Mr. Estes, asking Congress to reduce the tariff on coal, which had been reported back by the General Committee, were taken up and adopted.

A motion being made to reconsider the action of Saturday in reference to the printing of the proceedings of the Convention,

Mr. Dolbear, from the Committee of Ways and Means appointed for that purpose, stated that all the expenses of printing the proceedings would be defrayed by the city of New Orleans.

Dr. Barton, of Louisiana, offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were adopted:

Whereas, It is of incalculable importance to our common country, and to the Southern and Western States particularly, that the position pointed out by nature and improved by man, as the great depot most convenient and accessible to all at all seasons of the year, should have removed the only impediment to that free intercourse which consists in an improvement in her sanitary condition. And whereas, to the site of the city of New Orleans converge most of the great rivers of the country, and to whose being made a center of a system of Railroads still more exceeding her sphere of usefulness, placed, as she is, in the estuary of that magnificent stream whose tributaries, susceptible of navigation, in the natural and most convenient outlet and mart of the largest and most fertile valley in the world, the richest portion of our common country. And whereas, it is well known that nature endows no great location for a large city without some compensating disadvantage—her unequaled conveniences for commercial purposes in the sale and exchange of the great mass of the productions of our common country and of the world, is met by influences on her visitors and immigrants in a sanitary point of view, which materially hinders her usefulness to all. And whereas, it has been demonstrated by the most scientific and experienced of her family, in the entire satisfaction of practical men, that the healthcity of this city, caused by her epidemics, is entirely under the control of sanitary measures, which, when completed, would enable her to compete in that respect with any of the great marts of commerce of our country—the entire probability of which is most satisfactorily shown by reference to the condition of the rural districts around us, (as exhibited by the mortuary returns of the late United States census,) which will compare favorably with those of any section of our country. That whereas, with the restoration of her sanitary condition, New Orleans presents a climate unsurpassed, at all seasons, for all the purposes of business or recreation—neither oppressed by summer's extreme heat nor inconvenienced by winter's cold, which every one of her rivals is afflicted with—that, as it is important for the interest of the Southern and South-western States to have their great central mart as healthy as it is convenient and indispensable for those States.

And whereas, New Orleans has spent for the actual and contemplated expenses of the said States, through her charitable institutions, more than $3,000,000—as can be shown by their records—alone, for from their losses, they were stricken down by sickness and misfortune—constituting a strong bond of union, of feeling—of interest and of destiny—and whereas, had she expended this large sum for their sanitary condition, she would materially diminish the evils of inhumanity silence the voice of interest; and whereas, now, crippled as she has been by repeated recurrences of these clearly removable calamities of pestilence, and compelled, as she has been, to spend most of her vast resources for the conveniences and advancement of commerce for the improvement of her wharves for the reception and transmission of goods to and from the interior, and for other improvements, most of which are for the benefit of her sister States—that, in fact, she has been made a great entrepot of, mainly for their use and benefit—these have all involved her in heavy responsibilities, which hang upon her efforts and prosperity as a great incubus, from which she has long been endeavoring to extricate herself, and therefore she is entitled to the sympathy and co-operation of her sister States represented in this Convention, to aid her from her overwhelming embarrassments; and as the amelioration of her sanitary condition, in which they are nearly as much interested as she is, is alone required to accomplish all the purposes expected or desired of her position; and, as the Government of our common country has many millions of acres of public lands intended, or remaining as a reserved fund, for the great trusts and purposes of our people, it is hereby

Resolved, As the unanimous sense of this Convention, that the Government of the United States could not more appropriately dispose of a great 2,000,000 acres of the public domain than for the great and patriotic purpose of restoring one of her most important cities to salubrity.

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of our several States in the Congress of the United States be requested to co-operate in procuring from the said Government the grant of land aforesaid, on the express condition that the proceeds of the sale thereof be appropriated solely to the amelioration of her sanitary condition, through the executive councils of the city.

Resolved, That a Committee of three delegates of this Convention be now appointed, whose duty it is hereby made to carry out the sense of this Convention.

Attorney General Isaac N. Morse, of New Orleans, offered the following preamble and resolutions, which he accompanied by an explanatory address:

Whereas, One of the objects of this Convention is to obtain valuable and useful information, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Representatives and Senators of the States represented in this Convention be respectfully requested to procure, from the proper departments in Washington, the cost, of the several custom-houses in the United States, the number of persons employed, and the expense of collecting the annual revenue.

Resolved, That they be further requested to inquire into the propriety of substituting for the present method of collecting the revenue, direct taxation, and the propriety of abolishing the whole system of custom-houses and import duties.

Gen. M. desired to make a few remarks. He thought a legitimate object of this Convention was to obtain correct commercial information, not only with regard to the Southern States, but with regard to the whole of this Union.

He spoke of the prejudice existing against direct taxation. It had been thought to be more agreeable to make every one's contribute to the support of General Government indirectly. He thought he could show with a very few words that the present duties on imports compelled the man who is least able to pay the most. Of the man who had been fortunate and accumulated an amount of ten thousand dollars, Government demanded one dollar for the support of the army, the navy and the judiciary, which is to protect his property. Of the man who amassed a fortune of twenty thousand dollars, Government required two dollars. Now, all this seemed perfectly fair and honest. John Jacob Astor, the distinguished millionaire, possessed a fortune of twenty or thirty millions and William Gray was owner of ninety odd of square-rigged vessels. Now, to protect the property of these gentlemen, the army and navy of the United States were sent to distant seas. In return for this they actually paid nothing into the public treasury. It is true, a tax was laid upon sugar, tobacco, brandy, wines, &c.; but it is also known that for the last twenty years of John Jacob Astor's life, he consumed none of these articles. He lived principally upon milk, and absolutely will not contribute as much to the expense of General Government, as a man in Minnesota or Nebraska who kept a cow, ox and horse. Now, in return, what does this man who resides in the interior want with army or navy? A foreign foe cannot trouble him; and yet he contributes more to support of Government than the man who possesses millions.

He thought it perfectly fair and honest for a man to contribute to the maintenance of government, and at the same time the people had a perfect right to inquire how the Government funds were expended. He should like to know how many millions were being expended on the Custom-House here.

Nothing could be gained by taxing foreign imports. The additions was immediately made upon the articles on which the duties are imposed. An English or New Orleans merchant buys flour at six dollars per barrel, ships to Cuba and a duty is laid upon it which advances the price to ten dollars. He ships to New Orleans, pays another duty and increases the price to nineteen or twenty dollars. Who pays this duty? The citizens of New Orleans. Here was a subject which intelligent men should think of. He had talked much talk of the sword leaping from the scabbard against direct taxation. It is true, we did draw the sword and kept it unsheathed for eight years against Great Britain imposed a direct tax without any right. It remained to be seen whether the liberality of this Convention would end him in obtaining information of Government at Washington as to the amount we have invested in the Custom-Houses. He had been informed that it cost near thirty-three per cent to collect the revenue of the United States. He proposed to avoid this vast expenditure by direct taxation. He wanted all duty to be removed. The people wanted Railroads, they wanted iron. The duty on iron is thirty per cent. Remove this duty and it can be obtained from England for less than in the United States. He wished to make the port of New Orleans free; to let the produce of the world come here and make this the greatest exchange market in the world. Ships of the world will come here with their produce when they are exempt from a duty of thirty to forty and eighty per cent. At our next census the United States will number thirty-six millions of people. Thirty-six millions economically expended, will be sufficient to defray the expenses of this Government. In conclusion he asked most respectfully that these resolutions be adopted in order that they might know what the collecting of the revenue cost. His remarks were very attentively listened to, and he was highly applauded on taking his seat.

Mr. Wilkinson made a few remarks in reply. He hoped the resolution would not pass. He thought there was too great a disposition to tax property holders. If you want to build a railroad or establish a line of steamships you tax people who have property. He alluded to the fact that two taxes were assessed—a property tax and another called a poll tax. This was imposed upon those who are supposed to have no property. There is a great portion of this class who pay no tax whatever. He thought the Attorney General was personally interested in the repeal of import duties, and he proceeded to support his argument by a personal allusion to that functionary and his family—inferring that he wished to escape the payment of duties upon champagne, broad cloths, silks, laces, etc.

Dr. Wilkinson, of Plaquemines, spoke in opposition to the resolutions, and moved that they be laid on the table.

Judge John C. Lorne, of New Orleans, urged upon the Convention the importance of them, and moved that they be laid over, to be taken up by preference at the next meeting of the Convention. The motion was carried.

Mr. N. R. Jennings's resolution, asking the Legislatures of the Southern States to repeal all usury laws, and permit individuals and corporations to deal in money as they please, was taken up.

Judge Walker moved to amend it by striking out the words "and corporations."

Capt. Albert Pike thought it would be better to postpone action upon such an important matter till the next session of the Convention.

The President coincided with Capt. Pike.

Mr. Jennings consented that the matter be postponed, and moved the appointment of a special committee of three to consider and report upon the subject at the next Convention. The motion was carried:

Mr. C. G. Baylor, of Washington, then rose and read the following resolutions:

Resolved, That C. G. Baylor be allowed to incorporate his special report in the proceedings of this Convention to be published with them.

Resolved. That the President of this Convention appoint a committee of five, a majority at least of whom shall be cotton-growers, to act as a Committee of Correspondence between the planters of the South and the manufacturers of Europe in regard to the cotton interest; that said committee can fix upon the point to be the central point of its correspondence, and that the information thus obtained be laid before this Convention at its next meeting, or, if deemed by the Committee and President of this Convention sufficiently important, before a Special Convention of cotton-growers, called together for that purpose.

Mr. Baylor remarked that his object in offering this resolution was to test a theory which has been known as direct trade, and for many years has received much discussion. His object was to put the cotton growers of the United States in direct correspondence with the cotton manufacturing interests of Europe. He remarked that Liverpool merchants had entire control of the cotton trade; that cotton planters were mere hewers of wood—overseers of that great estate which was managed by others. His object was to show that if cotton planters would come forward and put themselves in correspondence with the cotton interests of Europe, they would certainly respond to them and heartily co-operate with them for the purpose of breaking up Liverpool monopoly. I want to see a time and a company of men engage in this business who have got individual wealth and personal standing to vouch for whatever they undertake. What will be the result? All I ask of this Convention is the passage of this resolution, and to appoint a committee. There are those here who are interested in the cotton business. England is not a consumer of cotton; she is only a reproducer. Labor is cheaper on the Continent than in England; population on the Continent of Europe is greater than England. England is only a speculator. She ships annually more than thirty-five millions in cotton. By means of her capital and organization she controls the great crop of America. What does she do with it? It requires forty out of every hundred bales of cotton to take it to Liverpool and sell it. What's the effect of that monopoly? The result is, the Liverpool merchants control the price of cotton. We are dependent upon her alone. You are demanded to break up that monopoly. Russia and Turkey go to war. It touches no part of America, but England chooses to engage in the war, and plunges all Europe in a war with her. What is the effect on the price of cotton? It was this year and last forty millions; simply because England involves herself in Eastern War. It has been urged that the establishment of direct communication with the manufacturing interests of Europe would injure the commercial prosperity of New Orleans. So far from that being the case, it would have a tendency to build it up. If a depot for cotton were established on the Continent, and the Liverpool monopoly broken up, would that injure the commercial prosperity of New Orleans? Not at all; it would only promote it.

We regret that lack of room compels us to omit the remainder of the talented gentleman's speech.

The Secretary then read the names of the following gentlemen as appointed upon committee:

On Mr. Jennings's anti-usury resolution: Messrs. Jennings, Lathrop and Pike.

On Dr. Barton's sanitary resolutions: Messrs. Barton, N. B. Benedict and Gerard Stith.

On Southern Education and Southern School Books: C. R. Marshall, of Mississippi; D. F. Kenner, of Louisiana; M. T. Johnson, of Texas; J. S. Preston, of South Carolina; H. W. Hilliard, of Alabama; B. Manley, of Virginia; Ahbury Hill, of Georgia.

On motion, the Convention then adjourned to 7 o'clock in the evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The resolutions offered by Attorney General Morse during the morning session, in reference to the abolishing of Custom-houses and import duties, were taken up, and as Judge Larne, who was expected to make an address in favor of them, was absent, they were, on motion of Mr. Jennings, laid on the table subject to call.

Judge Walker offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of three members of this Convention be appointed by the chair to address memorials to the Legislatures of the Southern and South-western States, urging the adoption of a uniform commercial code, by which trade will be facilitated and the rights of the citizens of the several States be placed on an equal and uniform basis.

Rev. C. K. Marshall offered the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the acting Presidents of this Convention be requested to appoint a committee of seven gentlemen, whose duty it shall be to fix upon the time and place for the next meeting of this body, and publish the same in the journals and newspapers for the information of the people, and the said President shall be chairman of the committee.

Mr. John A. Watkins's resolutions, asking the Legislatures of Mississippi, Tennessee and Kentucky to aid in building the Jackson Railroad to some point on the Ohio River, were taken up and adopted.

Mr. Howard, of Alabama, moved that the chairman of the Committee on Quarantine be requested to prepare a copy of the report of the committee for publication with the proceedings of the Convention. Carried.

Mr. Heward offered resolutions tendering the thanks of the Convention to the President and Secretaries, for the able manner in which they have performed their duties; to the Mayor of the city, for the use of the Hall; to the newspaper reporters and publishers, for giving the proceedings proper publicity; to Mr. Campbell, the Marshal; and to various other persons, for courtesies shown to the Convention. They were adopted unanimously.

Mr. Jennings made a few remarks on the subject of New Orleans hospitality, concerning which a misunderstanding had existed between two distinguished members of the Convention. He hoped that the delegates would depart from New Orleans in a spirit of amity and good feeling.

Judge Larne having entered, Mr. Morse's resolutions were taken up and read. The Judge then took the stand and addressed the Convention.

Mr. Lathrop moved that the resolutions be laid on the table.

Dr. Hyams, of Alexandria, was in favor of inquiry upon the subject, but not of free trade.

Mr. Lathrop then addressed the Convention in strong language, renewing his motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

The President, Mr. Coleman, was opposed to the introduction of such a matter before the Convention as (to politicks) in its character. The free trade question had been thoroughly discussed long ago in its legitimate sphere, and it was rather improper to revive it at this late day in this Commercial Convention.

Mr. Howard, of Alabama, thought the subject worthy the serious consideration of this or any other Convention. He would vote to lay the resolutions on the table; not because he was in any way opposed to them, but because they were introduced at such a late stage of the proceedings.

A vote was then taken, and the resolutions laid on the table—Judge Larue alone voting in the negative.

The resolution of Saturday, fixing Tuesday as the day for the adjournment of the Convention, was rescinded.

On motion, the Convention then adjourned, subject to the call of the Committee of Arrangements, for its next session.

The President subsequently appointed the following gentlemen on the Committee of Arrangements:

N. D. Coleman, of Mississippi; C. R. Marshall, of Mississippi; M. T. Johnson, of Texas; Wm. H. Dawson, of Georgia; Jas. Lyons, of Virginia; W. B. H. Howard, of Alabama; Leslie Combs, of Kentucky, and John L. Lewis, of Louisiana.

Judge Walker, Judge Slidell and Attorney General Morse were appointed on the committee called for by Judge Walker's resolution.

Upon the committee called for by Dr. Barton's resolutions, the following gentlemen were appointed:

Dr. Barton, Chairman; and Dr. A. F. Axson, of Louisiana; Dr. Ashbel Smith and Dr. S. K. Jennings, of Texas; Hon. Solon Borland and G. Paxton, of Arkansas; F. A. W. Davis and T. J. Harper, of Mississippi; Dr. Leverett and Dr. Hamilton, of Alabama; Dr. J. F. Scrivan and M. S. Cohen, of Georgia; Dr. N. S. Baldwin and W. D. Mosely, of Florida; Gen. J. Winslow and J. H. Gibbon, of North Carolina; Dr. A. P. Hayne and Dr. King, of South Carolina; Prof. J. B. Lindsay and Prof. ——, of Tennessee; Rev. J. Miller and Lawrence Young, of Kentucky; Dr. George Engelmen and L. M. Knunsti, of Missouri; S. F. Leake and C. A. Rose, of Virginia; Dr. Smith and Dr. Martin, of Maryland.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1855.

HON. J. F. DOWNELL has laid us under obligations for Congressional attentions. The Census Statistics is a valuable document, especially to the press.

SOUTHERN AID SOCIETY.—On the establishment of this society, we expressed our doubts of its necessity, its utility, and especially of the propriety of affixing to it a general name, as if it were designed to do a general work, when it was manifestly got up under New-school (Presbyterian) influences. We learn from the First Annual Report, that after a year's existence, its whole collections amount to $4,695, of which two individuals contributed $2,000, nearly one-half; and of the whole sum, $1,852, nearly one-half of the whole amount received, was expended on salaries and incidental expenses, and $1,000 were given to two New-school Synods, and, with the exception of $300 to a German Reformed Classis, the rest of the appropriations seem to have gone in the same direction.

REV. J. W. SHELTON, A. M., has been engaged by the trustees of Sharon Female College, Miss., as its President. Mr. Shelton is a graduate of Randolph-Macon College, Va., an institution well represented in Mississippi by its alumni. His antecedents (as the politicians say) as a man, a preacher and a teacher, are good.

STEWARD'S REPORT.—The Texas Advocate gives an extract from the Steward's Report of Texas Conference:

"We find the quarterage claims to be $11,735, on which $7,570 have been collected, leaving a deficiency of $2,163. The claims for table expenses are $10,102, on which $8,022 have been paid. These statements show the entire claims to be $21,837, and the total deficiency $4,243. To meet this deficiency there has been collected, from circuits and stations, the sum of 206 75.

"The Board of Stewards regret to have to report a falling off in the receipts of the past year. We were able last year to settle with the claimants at 87 cents on the dollar, while this year we are only able to pay a fraction over 80 cents."

CHINA MISSION.

TO THE PREACHERS AND MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH IN THE MISSISSIPPI ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Dear Brethren:

We have a Missionary and his family in China. They reached there in September last. They are in want.—GREAT WANT. They want 1st, a house to live in; 2dly, our brother wants a house to preach in; 3dly, his wife wants a house to teach in. She proposes to have a school to teach the Chinese. Perhaps a building might be so constructed as to answer for all these purposes.

Our Missionary collections are to be taken in April next. I propose that we do our best for these objects in our collections. Can't we raise $5,000 for the China Mission this year? What say you? Who seconds the motion? Let the vote be in dollars.

SCENE AT THE WATER'S EDGE.

That—

"There's many a slip
'Twixt the shore and the dip"—

Was strikingly illustrated last summer in the western portion of Alabama Conference. The "party" came before the Conference on an application for deacon's orders. We gathered the following items from representations of the case, pro and con.

Rev. Mr. E——, a licentiate, had been appointed to a circuit where the Baptist controversy raged. All the changes were rung on baptize, "to dip, to plunge"—eis "unto"—ek "out of," etc. In vain did the Methodist preacher withstand the current. The cry was, "Still they come!" Of one after another of his members it was recorded on the Church book—"gone to the Baptists." His congregations were thin, so that the people he wanted to address his counter-arguments to were not there. If he had any thing to say (as he thought he had) there was no showing for him. One of those panics had arisen which sometimes occur even in Churches; and it was notually rumored that the preacher was going! Make a clean sweep of it. The days of pouring and baby-sprinkling were ended!

He had been known to say that, if they would convince him that immersion only was baptism, he would become a Baptist too. He was taken up promptly, and gave in his hand and his experience. Considerable excitement! Methodism at a low ebb! Glimpses of millenium enjoyed by some souls.

On a fixed day the country round about assembled where there was "much water," to see the Methodist preacher baptized, and another added to that list so carefully kept and paraded in Baptist papers. One standing on the shore of that stream and looking out upon the gathering crowds, as they came up by path and road, and hitched their horses, might have exclaimed—"still they come." At length he came; head tied up in handkerchief and his burial clothes on, ready for the "liquid grave."

The only "lawful administrator" prepared to lead the candidate down into the water together.

"Stop—that little matter—you were to convince me first."

"Oh! that can be done at any time—afterwards."

"But—the agreement—I am all ready—if you convince me—first."

There was no getting round it; so clearing a space, the well known and oft used argument—a thousand times answered and yet declared unanswerable, were drawn out. Baptizo meant to dip, to plunge, and nothing else. This pouring and sprinkling was no baptism at all—a human invention—and so on and so forth. The thing was as clear as day.

The candidate listened; but either was not convinced or showed that—

"He that's convinced against his will,
Is of the same opinion still."

In turn, he became speaker. On this point and that, his mind wasn't exactly clear. Some difficulties, would like to have cleared up first. [Blankness sitting on some faces.] By degrees he warmed up. The handkerchief came off and the grave clothes. [Consternation.] On he went for the Paedobaptist side of the question. He remarked that he had long been wanting a chance, just such a chance as this, and now by the kindness of his Baptist friends he had it, and would improve it. And improve it he did, till the saying "caught a Tartar," might well have expressed the general sentiment. At the winding up, the "only lawful administrator" was overheard to congratulate himself on having narrowly escaped an "improper subject."

The application for admitting Mr. E—— to orders created some discussion, but was finally refused and by a large majority. Such sharp practice ill became a Christian minister. One of a deacon's scriptural qualifications is, that he should be "grave." The conduct was not only inconsistent with straightforward sincerity, but that solemnity with which a Christian sacrament should be treated and that courtesy due to a sister Church.

FAILURE OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC PRESS.

Very few of the editors of the few successful Roman Catholic papers in this country, or the world, were bred and born in that faith. This demonstrates that the Press, especially the periodical press, is so entirely incompatible with Romanism that the two can not exist together. It shows that a Romanist is incapacitated by his religion for the post of editor—that he is in a state of mental vassalage, and never can act with reasonable independence so long as the shackles of Popery are upon him.

The Southern Journal of this city lets out the lament on this wise:

"It is not that we are few in number. On the contrary, our numbers exceed, nominally at least, those of our brethren in most other dioceses. Not a village or country town of passing importance but has a respectable number of individuals professing the One faith. And yet, despite this, we have no book stores, except in one or two large cities, throughout the whole South. In all the vast extent of country between Charleston and Chicago, we have but two Catholic papers, of which one only is published in the English language. In the book line, our neighbor, Thos. O'Donnell, supplies most of the adjoining States with pious reading, and he alone. The Southern Journal and Propagateur are the only sheets advocating Catholic principles in all the South-Western portion of our country, and especially in that district which was one of the earliest fields for Catholic zeal. Even these isolated enterprises are not patronized as they should be. A long period of probation has barely placed our leading bookstore on a firm basis, while the subscribers of the two papers mentioned, count by the hundreds and not by thousands, like their cotemporaries."

SPIRIT OF MISSIONS.

BELIEF AND UNBELIEF.

The absence of a deep and all pervading missionary spirit in the Church must be largely ascribed to the unbelief of Christian men. The startling Bible truths, upon which the enterprise is based; the doctrines out of which it grows as an evangelical necessity; the ideas that underlie it, in its inception and prosecution, are either disbelieved or held by a faith which is, for the most part, vague, feeble and inoperative. These truths, doctrines and ideas are few and simple, but momentous; and their hearty belief cannot consist with indifference, nor even with partial consecration.

The doctrine of the Bible is that the heathen are lost without the gospel; that they are in a state of condemnation, the children of wrath, without God and having no hope in the world. The gospel assumes that nothing but its own truths can save them. These truths can and will reach them only through the instrumentality of the Church. Upon the Church is devolved the tremendous responsibility of giving the gospel to the heathen or of withholding it from them. These positions are accepted in our theology, and generally defended in our pulpits, but the mass of our communicants do not receive them; they do not believe them. There is reason to think that they are generally so qualified and explained away in the popular religious mind, that the pith and heart of them is almost wholly lost.

The prominent ideas are too vaguely apprehended by most Christians. In their conception of them there is nothing fixed nor tangible. They have no sharpness of definition; and none of the reality of fact. Incontestible as it may appear to those of us who are in the habit of thinking, praying and studying, that the heathen perish—perish eternally without the gospel, there are multitudes of Christians who have no definite opinions on this subject. With some of these it has been a subject of occasional reflection, but it has been fruitless of conclusions; and were they to be individually questioned upon the point, the result would show that they are without settled and determinate convictions.

To thousand of Christian minds the moral status of the heathen world is undefined and involved in impenetrable obscurity. It is regarded as a high and inscrutable mystery, existing in fellowship with the secret things which belong to God, and which it were equally vain and presumptious to investigate. That which we have supposed to be so well settled by matter of fact and scripture, is, in reality, a distant and nebulous object of attention. Whilst we have assumed that the religious mind of the Church took in a perishing world, in all of its immense and appalling outlines, and have based our hopes and appeals upon the assumption, in fact, a large portion of the Church has done nothing of the sort. The great issue has not yet been established. The elements of decided opinion and deep conviction are floating in an atmosphere of vagueness and darkness.

Where the moral state of the heathen is not undefined, it is too much misapprehended. That they are going to perdition for want of the gospel, we believe, finds a stout denial in the minds of thousands of converted men and women. Personal observation confirms us in this assertion. The general and temporal benefits of Christianity are admitted with little reluctance. Its political and social influences are unquestioned. No one in the Church denies that the gospel is a good thing, and that it is a worthy benevolence to send it to those who have no knowledge of Christ. But that it is essential to the eternal salvation of benighted men, is a truth of which Christians are but half convinced. There is a fearfully matured and defined infidelity in the Church on this point. The words of inspiration are received with many grains of allowance, and so explained and modified that the heathen are saved without the hearing of the gospel, and without faith in a crucified Savior. If the vote were taken today, we firmly believe that a majority of our communicants would decide that the heathen are somehow saved without any knowledge of Jesus Christ.

An equal amount of unbelief exists in regard to the efficiency of the ordinary instrumentalities to save the world. That the gospel, and its propagation by the Church, alone is to do this work, will receive the assent of those who are imbued with the right spirit. But the most of Christians do not believe it. With many the questions, "Whether the world is to be converted, and by what means are yet unanswered. Like the moral status of those who have no gospel, these questions are wrapped in high, inexplicable mystery. Those who are not satisfied to rest their consciences in this convenient lullaby of mystery, look beyond and beside the ordinary means, to something high, miraculous and extraordinary. Millenial clouds, "nations born in a day," angels flying with the everlasting gospel, the literal resurrection of dry bones, and things of the same ilk, take possession of their fancies. The responsibility of the Church is evaded by these miserable sophisms, and Christians become disinterested spectators of half the world's damnation.

This unbelief is at the bottom of half our apathy. We cannot expect the Spirit of Missions to pervade the Church until the paralysis of skepticism shall be removed, and the doctrines and ideas of the enterprise shall have a clear and powerful lodgment in the convictions of the people. The great and eloquent Olin; to whom we are indebted for many valuable suggestions, utters these "burning words:" "Did the Church really believe the gospel to be as necessary to the heathen as it is to us, there would be at once, and forever an end to her guilty repose. They who give full credit to such truths do not sleep over them. It would be easier to find rest in our beds above the throes of an earthquake. The agonies of Laocoon and his children, dying in the coils of the serpent, were but past-time, compared with those of the Church, until she had either unlocked herself from the grapple of this tremendous conviction, or disburdened her conscience by a faithful consecration of her energies to the work of rescuing the world from its doom."

CALIFORNIA.

The preachers who have accepted for California, will please notice that, if God will, to be in New Orleans for that country, somewhere between the 20th and 25th of February next, and it is important that they be in that city the 20th of February. I also request that the preachers for California forward, as early as may be, their names and the sizes of their families to Rev. H. N. McTYEIRE, New Orleans, in order that the preliminary arrangements may be made for procuring their tickets. JAMES O. ANDREW.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

The editors of the Church periodicals will please change the direction of my papers from Oxford, Georgia, to Summerfield, Ala., and publish a notice of this change of address, that my correspondents may govern themselves accordingly. JAS. O. ANDREW.

SUMMERFIELD, Ala., Jan. 10, 1855.

DEATH OF DR. KITTO.

We regret to have to announce the death of Dr. Kitto, which took place at Canstadt, near Stuttgard, on November 25. It appears that the reverend doctor, owing to protracted ill-health, had repaired to that place with his wife and family—with the exception of one son, who remained in London—in compliance with the recommendation of his medical advisers. At first the change appeared beneficial; but, soon after his arrival there, his infant boy died of the then prevailing epidemic, diarrhœa; and a few weeks subsequent, his oldest child, Miss Kitto, who was not quite twenty years of age, was attacked with the same malady; and having been some time previously afflicted with dropsy, she also speedily died. The effect of these severe visitations on a man so isolated from the ordinary resources of human companionship as was Dr. Kitto, may easily be anticipated. He was exhausted by a series of severe attacks, the last of which deprived him of the power of speech. He was speechless, although sensible, to the last; and he expired, in the fifty-first year of his age, calmly relying, in the moment of death, upon the atonement of the Saviour.

Much sympathy was excited throughout the Christian public on the announcement of Dr. Kitto's distress, and exertions were made in Edinburgh, as well as in London, Glasgow, and other places, to raise contributions for his relief. Something will still require to be done, as the pension of $500, granted him by the liberality of the Queen, terminates with his life. We understand that his friends contemplate a petition to Government to continue the annuity to his family; and we feel assured that their efforts will be supported by the approval of the public; for the claims of so useful a writer as Dr. Kitto can not be easily forgotten.

PRETTY BESS.

"Pretty Bess! Sweet little creature! How charmingly she is dressed!" All these praises were bestowed on a little Miss of six, who was certainly beautiful, but my heart was sad to see this child, a type of Ilenveu, the slave of fashion; I sighed to see that floral bonnet on her beautiful head; that fairy-like form adorned with laces and ribbons; those lovely eyes wandering only on her dress. Yes, I said, "Poor little Bess," her mother does not think, as she decorates the person of her child, of the cultivation of its intellect and the improvement of its heart. Her great desire is that Bess shall dress pretty. Could that mother raise the pall of futurity, and see the fate that awaits her child? Could she view the turbid sea beyond the calm waters of childhood? Though she may walk in prosperity's paths, since she has been taught that admiration is the great aim of her life, the "green eye'd monster" soon possesses her soul; discontent finds an entrance; selfishness is enthroned. Prostrating herself before the shrine of fashion, can she be happy? Should adversity's mantle envelope her, having no resources within herself for amusement and happiness; when the doors of the fashionable circles bar her out, when the iron heel of poverty oppressed her, where can this devotee of dress and fashion fly?

Poor little Bess! hers will be a sad fate, whether an inhabitant of the magnificent chambers of a palace, or a miserable hovel. There is something wanting to calm the raging billows of life which has never been taught her. She has not learned to "lift the heart and bend the knee;" no hand points her to a home in the skies; no voice bids her live for others, to soothe the afflicted and aid the needy. Without following these holy precepts there is no earthly happiness.

"Pretty Bess," unfortunate child! Though fortune has shed her golden gifts in blind extravagance, though beauty is her lot, my heart sorrows as she sits by me, in such costly attire. I read unhappiness all her life. Who is the mother of "Pretty Bess?" Who is the architect of her character? Whose glorious mission, to direct her youthful mind! Whose influence guides the destinies for "weal or woe," of "Pretty Bess"! FANNIE PIE

THE RELATION OF BAPTIZED INFANTS TO THE CHURCH.

I. The Church is an organic body.

The stone whose strength or beauty attracts us is not an organic body; its particles, arranged once for all by the forming hand of nature, are held together by a mere inactive adhesion. Nor is a watch an organic body, for although its wheels may be well arranged to turn its index regularly, it lacks the essential element—it has mechanism, but not organism. But an organic body is one which, by virtue of its own structure, has power to draw new material from without to perpetuate and increase its substance, and by the appropriate and mutual action of each separate particle, to preserve the health and active power of every other. Thus, a plant is an organic body; its absorbent roots and breathing leaves are organs through which it imbibes and assimilates new materials, and by the energy which works through every particle of sap and fibre, each atom is at once sustaining and sustained. The continued health of each is guaranteed by its connection and participation in the general structure.

Now, we lay stress upon the fact that the Church is an organic body—not a mere association of individuals, like a sand-heap; nor even a mass attracted together and compacted by a magnetic sympathy, nor yet an association so constituted as to give concentration and system to efforts for a given object, like business or benevolent societies, which are rather mechanized than organized; but the Church of God is a body so constructed that through the pervading energy of the Holy Ghost, it has all adequate powers for rapid absorption of the world into itself, and by the right action of each function and of each particular soul, is competent to give health to every other in its system.

Now, that it is only through the action of the Church that the world at large receives the effectual grace of Christ is obvious at a glance. Nations to whom the voice of the Church has never come, or individuals in Christian land, shut in ignorantly or wilfully from her ministrations, are, for aught we can see, as devoid of any evidences of regeneration as though there were no gospel message and no gospel grace. Apparent exceptions can generally be identified as cases where a struggling or reflected ray has glimmered upon some heart shut in from "the light of life." The great Head of the Church will not give her assurance of any salvation to the adult world, of which she herself is not the instrument.

But it is less generally comprehended how the heathen man, unturned, convinced of sin, willing to obey the precepts, and relying on the atonement declared by the Church, and thus prepared to receive the seal of regeneration, is not now independent of her, but still to receive his maturing and perfecting grace through connexion with the body into which he has been admitted. Her public instruction and direction of his private study of the word, her open or private rebuke of his faults, her incitement or guidance of his active Christian life, her social atmosphere replacing the poisoned air of godless dissipation, her seasons of united worship and fellowship of the Holy Ghost sending a fresh thrill of electric power through each weary spirit, and her ministry in affliction and death, are the channels through which daily and sufficient grace is given to mould the rough and imperfect likeness of Christ into a perfect Image. The instance of a heathen convert presents the truth more boldly but not more strongly than that of any new convert. Rare cases there may be, where, in solitude or sickness, the Head of the Church compensates for the absence of her regular nurture by a large blessing on the truths already taught and the habits already imparted. It is true, also, that sometimes amid great irregularity of Church instrumentalities and great want of a general spirit of life, some few may retain a close and living fellowship with Christ; but the majority will fail for want of those associated aids and impulses which a healthful Church alone can apply. Nothing but a special effusion of divine power, restoring the spirit of regulanction of such a Church, could afford a reasonable probability that a new convert would not relapse, or advance with very doubtful progress. While alluding to the danger of even a partial withdrawal from the means of grace concentrated in the Church, our purpose is rather to enforce the truth that it is in their right use and action that any can attain the manly stature in Christ Jesus.

In the light of these truths is not the reason made apparent why Jehovah, whatever his reserved purposes may be, has only made his absolute and formal covenants with the organic Church; and, also, why, in the great commission, Christ only declares that he that believeth and becomes an integral part of the organic Church—that is, "is baptized—shall be saved, leaving other cases as exceptions? Was it not because, under the actual constitution of human nature and society, no permanent covenant with man can be carried on except in such organic association as is formed by fulfilling its functions; and because the addition of each new subject of the covenant of mercy is demanded, both for his own probable permanency and perfection, and in order to perpetuate the whole?

1. We are now arrived at a standpoint from which we may define analytically the rationale, or the common sense, of baptism, beginning at once the "seal of righteousness and the initiating ordinance into the Church.

1. First, then, there is a personal and present fitness in the believing penitent for the reception of the seal of God's covenant of grace. Through the atonement, the guilt both of original and actual sin is removed, and he is justified before God; and, moreover, the dead heart is quickened with the germ of a new life in Christ.

2. There is a relative and prospective fitness for that "seal of the covenant" in the heart, so subdued and regenerated, prepared for, and introduced to, the action of organic means of grace, which are a pledge and vehicle of a continuous salvation—the organic body being presupposed to be in healthful action. Thus, the covenant is formally made only to a justified and renewed heart, about to enter circumstances which render probable its continuance in faith and love.

II. We proceed to apply the principles thus ascertained to the consideration of infant baptism.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Assuming the divine institution and perpetual obligation of infant baptism as being sufficiently proved in any of our standard theological works, we would direct attention to the general principles upon which it is instituted by God. We believe that it will be found in the reason and significancy of the rite itself, in the same double fitness of the subject—a first present and personal, the second prospective and relative, which is the ground of adult baptism.

The present and personal qualification of infants for the seal of the covenant.

It will not demand an extended discussion to remind the Arminian reader that all infants are considered as justified unconditionally through the atonement of Christ. They have no actual transgressions to be expiated, in whatever sense the guilt of original sin attaches to them, it is not imputed; and for them thus guiltless before God, both reason and Scripture assure us that the grace of the Spirit is so far bestowed upon them that they are not left to the unbroken thraldom of a depraved nature; but while as yet their will is undeveloped, there is no hindrance in them to the effectual work of the Spirit, which is gradually perfected if they die in infancy or which as they grow responsible they may receive if they will. The infant thus occupies the same general ground as the adult believer—he is justified from guilt—his nature is so far renewed as to offer no moral obstacle to the sanctifying power of grace. Thus it will be seen that the fitness of infant baptism lies not in any regenerating power in the rite itself, nor in consideration of faith of the parents: for the covenant directly with the child, and the parent is but an instrument of God to bring the child to receive the seal. But the ground of its fitness lies in its own present personal state of

We consider the relative and prospective fitness of the infant for the seal of the covenant.

To hold that, as in the case of an adult subject, the moral propriety of a formal seal of infants as children of God, lies not only in present acceptance before him, but in the fact that the heart duly prepared is now to be brought under those continuous means of grace, through which it is able and likely to persevere unto the end. Yes, we hold that the Church into which that child entered has entrusted the glorious power of making it grow up into a developed and perfect Christianity. We hold that whatever grace and light, and power, and love, the Church can bring to an adult believer, for long years prayerfully and earnestly yielding himself to divine influences, all that and more the Church can bestow to the child growing up beneath her care. And as a healthful, watchful parent has a right to expect that a sincere and docile convert will not backslide nor advance with tardy progress, so she has moral assurance that the infant, duly trained amid the pure teachings and examples, shall not grow up in indifference to religion, or in a false phase of Christian character, but shall bloom each day into a full and energetic piety.

Neander bears witness to the sentiments of the early Church:

"It is the idea of infant baptism that Christ through the divine life which he imparted and sealed in human nature, sanctified that nature from the germ of its earliest development. The child born in a Christian family and when all things were as they should be, have this advantage above others, that he is not first come to Christianity out of heathenism or the sinful-nature life, but from the first downing of consciousness unfolded powers under the imperceptible preventinfluences of a sanctifying, ennobling religion; that with the earliest germination of natural self-conscious life, another divine principle of life should be brought nigh to ere yet the ungodly principle could come into full activity; and the latter should find here its powerful counterpoise. In such a life the new birth was not to constitute a new crisis, beginning at some definable moment, but it was to begin imperceptibly, and so proceed through the whole life. Hence baptism, the visible sign of regeneration, was to be given to the child at the very outset; the child was to be consecrated to the Redeemer from the very beginning of its life."

Thus the lamented Olin, in his impassioned appeal in behalf of religious training:

"To this end God intends the Christian family to be a school of Christ—to live in an atmosphere in which the children should be bathed, and baptized and nurtured as in the genial element. He would have them put on the Lord Jesus with the first garments of their childhood, and drink in Christian sentiments from the mother's loving, beaming face, as they hung upon the breast. He bids them to learn religion as they learn a thousand other things—from the spirit and life of the family—from its vocal thanksgivings and songs of praise—from its quiet joys and deaths—from the penitent tear, the humble carriage, the tender accents, the reverent look and attitude of the father, when at night he offers the morning and the evening sacrifice. The new immortal that has fallen into the midst of the Christian family is to be taken into the soul of its piety, to be sanctified by its prayer and faith, and to form part of that reasonable and acceptable offering in which morning and evening the fondly parents lay all that they are and all that they have on the altar of sacrifice. This, with faithful, diligent instructions and restraints adapted to the different periods and exigences of childhood and youth, is the nurture of the Lord, the right training which, under our gracious economy, insures the sanctiety of the children of Christian families to grow up Christians. They are sanctified from the womb. Even their childish sensible savors of divine things; and they press on to the attainments and functions of manhood by gradations so easy and imperceptible that it is not always possible to fix the day of their espousals to the Savior."

It is not clear, then, how the baptism of infants as a seal, that is, as confirming a perpetual covenant, derives its highest propriety from the moral assurance of a continuance in grace, afforded by the organic and plastic power of the Church into which the baptized is ushered!

Let it not be objected that the quotations above cited refer to the plastic power of the family and not of the Church. The Christian family is only a subdivision of the church, as originally, each family was a church, and as the Church, when formally organized under Abraham, was in one family. It was not necessary for Jehovah to institute the family as a Church institution, for it was already in existence; he adopted it as a part of his organization, and the parent is as absolutely a divinely-appointed officer in the church as any ordained presbyter. He is as responsible to the Church for neglect of his charge, as is an unfaithful pastor. Through him, and through her who is one with him in this office, the grace of Christ is to flow in ceaselessly varied blessings of light and spiritual energy to each child's heart. During the earliest years of childhood, the parent is almost exclusively held responsible by Christ—as the pastor of his children. Afterward, just so long and so far as parental authority or filial affection furnish a means of restraint from evil, or stimulus to do good, just so long as he has a coordinate pastorate and responsibility. The Church can do whatever the family can do—since it includes it—and the Church, as the entire organic body, is bound to see to it that the family is an efficient school of Christ.

But, as the child grows older, and the privileged but contracted circle of its home ceases to confine it, and it goes abroad to meet other children and other adult associations, the Church is to see to it that it is shut in from contaminating influences, and to a continued holy atmosphere. In other words, as the Church has sanctified the family, so it must sanctify society.

And, in the first place, the education and associations of the baptized child are carefully to be guarded. It is not only that from its instructors there ought to breathe forth the same glowing piety which has hallowed the home of infancy, giving it to view all knowledge only in the light of religion; but the child should also be so kept from contact with other children who have been imbued only with the spirit of ungodliness and worldliness, that its budding virtues shall not be nipped by the frosty atmosphere. The Church must control the literary education of her children—provide their teachers and their companions; and while we may not exclude all children, except those brought up under Church influence, yet they should only be admitted so far as they can easily be penetrated and changed by the pervading piety and gracious influences of the whole. And, secondly, the Church must regulate the social circle of her baptised children. Since she cannot expect to transform the character of worldly society, she must be content to form a society mainly within herself. For a Christian parent to encourage or permit a child to go from a prayerful fireside to mingle with festivities of a circle entirely irreligious, whether relatives or not, is simply to dress up a young member of God's household for a sociable visit at Satan's. The Church is not to withdraw from all association with the impenitent, but it is to be understood that so far as these associations are not of necessity or charity, they can only be tolerated so far as the world will submit to the habits and regimen of the Church. Every element of high and noble enjoyment which worldly society possesses, the Church has also at command, and she can well afford to dispense with any companionship or indulgence which she cannot sanctify, and she must do it.

But there is a more direct agency to be exerted by the Church as such. Although for a time the teachings and motives of religion may be blended with family intercourse and discipline, yet no the years come when the child emerges from the family circle and begins to realize its relations to the world and to God as a soul of independent powers and responsibility, the Church, as God's messenger, is to meet the expanding mind, and officially assume the separate office of instruction and nurture. Not only is a system of regular and classified instruction in divine truth to be afforded; not only are the early sympathies and energies of the young member to be directed to appropriate work of benevolence and usefulness; but, what is less thought of, a direct provision should be made for the expression of religious experience, for administering of religious counsel, and the exercise of spiritual gifts. A child's heart has the same social impulses and wants as the adult, and demands the same means of grace; if they cannot be given in conjunction with mature Christian exercises, they can be given separately.

MARRIED, in Pensacola, on the 10th Jan., by Rev. Joseph B. Cottrell, Capt. DANIEL GREEN and Miss MARTHA N. STROUD.

OBITUARY:

DIED, 22d Dec., at Col. Dreyberry's, Smith county, Texas, JOHN WESLEY, infant son of Rev. William and Martha F. Monk, lately from Alabama. The child was born on 11th Nov., immediately on their arrival in this county.

But He who gave it hath taken it to Himself. J. W. FIELDS.

JOHN K. KEARNER, son of James and Elizabeth Kearner, died on the anniversary of his birthday, Nov. 16, 1854, aged 22 years, after suffering much for the greater part of two years; being confined to his room for the last five months.

He was a young man promising much usefulness to society; of chaste morals, good habits and elevated mind. During his illness, although he suffered much, yet he was patient and mindful of the great principles of the gospel—love to God, faith in the atoning merits of Christ, confession of sin, and pardon through the blood of the atonement; all of which he sought after as his treasure, during his long illness. A short time before his death he was hopefully and powerfully converted to God, to the rejoicing of his aged pious parents, with brothers and sisters, whom he called around his bedside, to rejoice with him, while he told them what great things God had wrought in his soul. I. MERSHON.

DIED—On the 5th of November, 1854, in her 64th year, Mrs. MARY MATILDA PEEBLES. She has been a member of the Baptist Church forty-four years, and we believe that she was a Christian of untarnished piety. She was not a bigot, for when it was announced that a Methodist was to preach in the neighborhood, she was sure to attend, unless unavoidably prevented. She not only attended, but she was a liberal contributor to the support of the Methodist preachers. She was an affectionate wife, a lovely mother, and an excellent neighbor. She has kept a public house for the last thirty-four years, on the stage road leading from Montgomery to Mobile, and there are hundreds who can testify that she was a nice landlady, polite and accommodating to her customers.

She died happy, and left behind a bright testimony that she was going to inherit a mansion in the skies. Her husband is now in his eighty-sixth year, and ripening for the grave. May God comfort him in his old age.

On October 27, 1854, in Ibberville Parish, La., MRS. ELIZABETH M. BROWN, wife of William S. Brown, and daughter of James and Polly Bruce. Mrs. Brown was born on December 15, 1813, in Kentucky. She joined the Methodist church early in life, and though like her friends in Christ, she had her seasons of trial, darkness, and doubt, yet her pathway was brighter and brighter to the last. Hers was a living, comforting piety, for it rested upon Christ as a rock; fed upon him as the food of life; drew its strength, vigor and vitality from him as a branch from a vine; and as a means of communion with him, made constant use of the means of grace. She was a Bible reader, and read it like Whitefield, through and through—over and over. She was a woman of prayer, and her latest audible accents were prayer. This was her vital air, the life of her soul. She in a word loved Christ, wore the image of Christ, and finally fell asleep in Jesus. No terrors—no doubts—no terrible dark valley; no horrible fear of death. All was calm and serene, not like some meteor traveling in glory and bursting in dazzling splendor, but like the setting of some gentle, constant star, only fading in the full blaze of the Sun of righteousness. Oh that the Church of Christ had many such. If fervent prayers from a mother's tender, faithful heart are answered, even though she be no more, we have hope that the two lovely boys she has left will ere long take her place, and her sorrowing husband will follow her radiant pathway. He who loved and knew her in life, sorrow not, for her spirit is with her Savior in glory. Read her Bible, choose her Savior, and you shall have her reward.

A. FRIEAN.

EMILY E. MCADORY, daughter of Thomas and Mary E. Owen, and wife of Thomas McAdory of Jefferson county, Alabama, aged thirty-three years and seven months, died in the full triumphs of faith, December 11, 1854.

Many years previous to her sickness, she received pardon for sin, and joined the Methodist E. Church, loved its doctrines and discipline, and enjoyed the ordinances and privileges of God's house much to her comfort. She was a "chaste keeper at home," devoted a great deal of her time to the comfort of her children and servants. As the time of her departure drew near, she committed her soul and body into the hands of her blessed Saviour, called her family, took her leave first of her husband, then her children one by one, and then servants and relatives, exhorting all to meet her in Heaven. At intervals she joined her minister and friends in religious devotion, and when very feeble, apparently, she joined in singing aloud "O Sing to me of Heaven," etc.

A few hours before she departed she became very anxious to go and leave all and be with Christ. On being asked for a token of victory, she raised her fingers and then her hands, smiling, and shortly after fell asleep in Jesus. R. PHILIPS.

SUNDAY SCHOOL VISITOR—NEW ARRANGEMENT.

The same hindrances which delay the publication of the Home Circle, will retard, for a time, the appearance of the Sunday School Visitor. We wish to employ every possible advantage of skill and experience, so as to put forth a Child's Paper that will be hailed by its readers with a hearty welcome. This we cannot do just yet. The editor, however, is all ready, and we will issue the Visitor at the earliest possible day—say, last of January, or first of February.

But we beg all officers and patrons of our Sunday Schools to consider the necessity of extending to this paper a large, prompt, and continuous patronage. We have to compete, from the start, with similar publications, which are sustained by over a hundred thousand subscribers, and are thus enabled to employ the most costly materials and embellishments. Will you not, dear brethren, so rally to the support of your Sunday School Paper, as to enable us to compete with those periodicals, without allowing our publishing interests to suffer.

It is believed that the size of the Visitor was much greater than necessary; it will, therefore, be reduced, tastefully embellished, and, in every way, handsomely executed.

Terms.—The Sunday School Visitor will be published monthly, at Nashville, Tenn., by Stevenson & Owen, according to the following scale:

Single copies,	40 cts per annum.
From 5 to 20 copies sent to one address,	34 " "
From 20 to 50 " " "	25 " "
From 50 to 100 " " "	20 " "
100 and over, " " "	15 " "

When packages of five or more are sent to one address, the person to whom they are directed must be responsible for the distribution of the papers.

It will thus be seen that the terms are as low as possible, and the subscriptions must, therefore, be paid INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

All communications and exchanges must be sent to L. D. Huston, Editor. Subscriptions to STEVENSON & OWEN.

Notice.—It is our earnest desire that the Minutes of the Annual Conference should be published at as early a period as practicable after the close of their present sessions. In order to this, it will be necessary for the Conference Secretaries to forward to our address, at Louisville, Ky., with as little delay as practicable, the minutes of their respective Conferences, accurately prepared, and in due form, and written in a clear and legible hand. Of the several Conferences, whose sessions have already been held, we have received, as yet, the minutes of but ONE! Our worthy Superintendents will please look well to this matter. STEVENSON & OWEN, Agents.

TO THE CONFERENCE AGENTS OF THE TRACT SOCIETY OF THE METHODIST CHURCH, SOUTH:

Brethren—Having been elected to the Secretaryship of the Tract Society, I am desirous of hearing from each of you at your earliest convenience, at Nashville, Tenn. I wish to learn your addresses—the prospect you have severally of obtaining the requisite number of suitable persons for colporters—the point or points suitable for depots for Tracts, and Tract volumes, within the bounds of your respective conferences—and any other information you have to communicate.

Any monies you may have in hand, or that may be in the hands of the Treasurers of your Conference Tract Societies, you will please remit to me at once, at Nashville, as the successful prosecution of our great undertaking will require funds at an early day.

In the mean time, until you hear further from me, or the Parent Board, it is desirable that you employ your time in raising funds for the cause—remitting as promptly as possible—as we shall be unable to determine upon what scale to project our plan of operations, until we can form an opinion from your remittances, as to the amount of funds we may expect to realize. J. HAMILTON.

FURTHER PARTICULARS OF FOREIGN NEWS BY THE BALTIC.

We have already published very full telegraphic reports of the Battle's advices, and find few further items of interest or importance. We, however, make some additional extracts:

It was stated that the storming of Sebastopol would commence on the arrival of the Turkish reinforcements. The French are to storm while the English and Turks are to attack Menschikoff. The Russian naval artillery have been taken out of the Baltic. The whole Baltic fleet is to be brought to Sebastopol.

Notes have been exchanged regarding the Conference at Vienna between the Representatives there.

The Allies were defining the sense in which their Cabinet was to understand the "four points" heretofore proposed.

Private advices from London say that the source of politics favors the possibility of a speedy termination of the war.

Austria, it is believed will assume the offensive, and thereby influence all Germany on her side. The people, it is thought, will force their Governments to accept the propositions of the Allies.

Much excitement continued throughout England on the war question, which was absorbing all interests. Nothing definite had been done in Parliament. The proposed loan, however, would be made.

Affairs in France present no change. The people are enthusiastically united in reference to the war.

It is fully believed that Prussia will join the Allies. Indeed, that the steps taken by Austria will compel her. Spain quiet.

Large reinforcements of Russians were daily arriving at Sebastopol. The next battle, if it takes place, will be the most desperate and bloody of all.

The Prussian mission to England was of no special importance. The bill for the enlistment of foreigners passed the English Parliament.

A letter in the Soudaian Freund says that the defense of Sebastopol is now to be conducted on a new plan. The really material is to be removed from the land side in the train and carried back to the ships. Twenty-two ships in the harbor of Sebastopol have been equipped ready to use.

The Semaphore Bluet says it seems that the defences of Sebastopol are to be confined to the forts.

The communication between Perekop and Sinferopol was temporarily interrupted. A week had elapsed since a courier arrived at Odessa from Sebastopol.

Two Russian vessels of war attacked a French steamer bound for Sebastopol. The English frigates came to her relief and the Russians retreated.

Russian bulletins generally claim their having gained important advantages over the Allies.

The Turkish troops at Kars were pressed by the Russians.

It is reported that Omer Pacha has written to the Sultan, making the condition of his accepting the command of the Turkish forces at Sebastopol that he shall have two votes in the council of war, in order to prevent his being outvoted by Lord Raglan and Marshal Canrobert.

VIENNA, Dec. 28.—A dispatch from Warsaw announces that the Russian navy artillerymen were taken out of the Baltic fleet, and to their presence at Sebastopol is due the recent premotion of the fire from that place, as well as the new-found boldness of the fleet.

A high political conference was to be held at the residence of the British Minister, at Vienna, on the 28th inst., at which the Ambassadors of England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Prince Gortschakoff, were to take part in the discussion. The conference was to be of the most positive character.

A dispatch from Vienna, dated the 29th, says that Prince Gortschakoff had presented a note received from Mr. Pershing to Count Buol. It is believed to be unsatisfactory, but is not the final reply of Russia.

The Prussian mission to London, of which high expectations had been formed, it is now surmised, was merely the bearer of an autograph letter to the Queen and instructions as to watch the movements of certain known agitators in London.

The eight English steamers had taken soundings at Eupatoria, and it is rumored that the allies will make an attack on Eupatoria preparatory to the attack on Perekop.

Extracts from Foreign Journals.

PRUSSIA.

Orders have been promulgated at Warsaw to complete the additional works of the citadel within the first fortnight of January. Prince Paskiewitch has ordered the immediate enrollment of three parts of the militia. The recruits of the new levy are to create a second ground army to reserve, to be concentrated in and around Moscow.

Twenty thousand men were occupied in fortifying Riga.

A Russian ukase has been published ordaining that whoever after battle shall commit acts of cruelty on the wounded, or unresisting, shall suffer death.

The chief engineer officer who conducted the defence of Sebastopol is Gen. Bestrom, a Finnlander.

A levy of ten men in every thousand has been ordered in the southern half of the Empire, to be completed by the 25th of March.

The frontiers of the Kingdom of Poland next to Gallicia are crowded with troops.

The Constitutional states, on the authority of a Warsaw journal state that the news of the recent calling out of the battalions of reserve of the Russian corps of Crimea is the result of. The resurrection spoken of was exhumation of the dead.

ENGLAND.

Parliament has adjourned until the Royal assent has been given to the foreign enlistment Bill. The measure continues unpopular. It is said that the officers of the German and Scottish corps refuse to fight in distant subjects from entering the military service of foreign States.

The war was absorbing all interest, and a large loan was about to be effected.

Cobden declines, in a letter to the London Times, that he has offered to supply pistols to the army of the East.

The U. S. steam frigate San Jacinto was at Gibraltar on the 12th of December. The steamer New York passed the Straits on that same day.

SPAIN.

A letter from Madrid states that Mr Soule, the American Minister, was present at a discussion which took place in the Spanish Chambers on the propriety of selling Cuba. No report of the discussion was published.

MADRID, December 23.—The Cortes has today voted the bill fixing the effective force of the army at seventy thousand men.

The Government declines raising auxiliary troops to send to the Crimea to assist the Allies. It also declines the proposition of Mr. Soule to join in a treaty with the United States and Russia recognizing the principle that the flag protects all goods.

FRANCE.

The Emperor Napoleon, in his speech at the opening of the French Chambers eulogized the victories of the French arms in the Black and Baltic seas, and in the Crimea. He thanked the British Parliament for its liberal and responsible, and asks a levy of one hundred and forty thousand men. He declared the present resources sufficient to meet the demands of the war. The speech was very patriotic.

The land army is stated by the Emperor at 331,000 men and 113,000 seamen. There are 62,000 sailors in the merchant and he asks for an additional levy of 10,000. He states that the revenue of the country remains undiminished. His speech was highly patient, but it caused a slight depression of the funds both in France and England.

On the 27th the Minister of Finance was authorized to raise a loan of 500,000,000 francs.

The steamer Arabia sailed from Marseilles on the 21st, with 1653 French troops for the Crimea.

PARIS, December 28.—The legislative body to-day unanimously approved the bill authorizing the Minister of Finances to borrow a sum of 500,000,000 francs. Two hundred and forty one members were present. The whole assembly are to unite this evening at the Tuileries, to present the bill to the Emperor.

ITALY.

Some changes are to take place at the end of this year in the press of Turin, the chief of which will be that the Parlamento, which has been the organ of the majority of chambers for the last two years, will (it is said) a certain support from the Government, is to cease, and to be succeeded by the Piemonte, under the direction of Signor Luigi Carlo Farini (author at the History of the Roman States), translated into English by Mr Gladstone) assisted by almost effective staff, but independent of government aid.

Two thousand Austriane troops are about to be withdrawn at the beginning of the year from the Tuscan Territories, and it is even hoped that (in consequence, or at all events, at the same time) the state of the siege which has been continued ever since 1848 will be raised from Leghorn. This will be a considerable relief to Grand Ducal Promises, and, as his royal highness has now got an army of about 10,000 or 12,000 men, perhaps he will be content to do without foreign aid for the future, unless his friends should be very pressing. The French regiments of dragoons and a battery of artillery will be leaving Pisa about the same time, so that if there be no direct compact on the subject, it would appear as if there was a tacit understanding at least. The clerical papers here say the French regiment is intended to re-establish Prince Floristan of Monaco in his rights on their way home, and remind their own Government that, while always contemplating an aggrandizing policy, they have been utterly unable to possess themselves of this little Principality. We foreigners can not but recognize the sound sense of such arguments, though we can hardly admire the patriotism of those who put them forward.

A quarrel has sprung up between the King of Naples and the Pope, upon the question of the superiority of the Pope over the kings of the earth.

AUSTRIA.

The Wanderer, of Vienna, of the 23d, says: "A letter from Tchernakow states that there has been a sanguinary engagement between the Russians and a battalion of Turkish infantry which was making a reconnoissance. The latter had the advantage."

The Press, of Vienna, of the 23d, says: "Gen. Duplat made his will in the presence of the English Embassador. He has bequeathed £1000 to the fund for widows and orphans of the soldiers killed in the Crimea, and £500 for the purchase of articles for the wounded—to particular wine. He has likewise left a considerable sum to the poor of Vienna."

A letter from Vienna says: "The field hospitals of the Austrian medic army have been placed under the command of a colonel. The Third Artillery regiment is being placed on a full war footing, and in a few weeks will proceed with a powerful staff to Galicia. Several companies of engineers and pioneers have also recently received orders to be prepared to march."

THE CRIMEA.

KAZATSCH BAY, Dec. 13.—Kazatch Bay, the little inlet adjoining to the one containing the French ships, now holds the remnant of the Black Sea fleet. As anchorage, it is decidedly superior to the Katcha. No winds, except perhaps a westerly hurricane, such as we have no reason to anticipate, can disturb the ships which ride on its bosom. The Vengeance and Rodney, in tow of the Agamemnon and Algiers, joined the Commander-in-Chief, from the Katcha, on the 11th. These, with the Hannibal, compose our whole force of line-of-battle ships at present watching Sebastopol. The French retain but four. This gauntlet is thus again thrown down to the enemy to engage upon equal terms, for our superiority in screw-ships may be fairly supposed to be counterbalanced by the superior strength of their three-deckers. The Sidlerophon, at Eupatoria, and the Sansparell, at Balaklava, would be unable to partake in the conflict. But I have no hope of seeing a Russian, either by sea or land, dare to engage on equal terms.

On the 5th of December two Russian steamers, the Vladimir and Bessarabia, towing six gun-boats, came out of the harbor of Sebastopol. One of these steamers, unheeding the French frigate Mogere, which was cruising near, went close in shore to Strelitzka Bay, and commenced firing on a French steamer and bomb-ketch, which were there. On observing this, the French steam frigates Valorous and Terrible went to their relief on which the Russians retired under shelter of the batteries. This fertile has proved that there is a passage left for ships between the sunken ships, although only wide enough for three ship to pass at a time. The Russian fleet could however, form in safety under cover of the batteries. A Russian announcement says that this sortie of the steamers was a mere reconnoissance. The Allied fleets, excepting the cruisers, are now moored outside of the double Bay of Cherssonesus, where the anchorage is better than at Katcha.

Her Majesty's ship Swallow, Commander Crawford, arrived from England on the 9th and the Arabat left for Malta, for repairs, the preceding day. She took as passengers from the Firebrand, en route for England, the two little orphans from Kustendje who have been adopted by her Majesty. The elder, who is gradually recovering the use of his shattered arm, is a fine intelligent little fellow, and shows, in his kindness for arms and proficiency in the musket and cutlass exercise, strong traces of the fierce old Moslem blood.

The weather has been beautiful during the last few days, the air as soft and balmy as in May. If it only continues, of which there is at present every appearance, you will soon have better and more stirring news from before Sebastopol.

ACCIDENTS FROM THE CAMP.

The following are extracts from the correspondence of a London journal:

This morning upwards of one thousand sick men of the English regiments were carried down to Balaklava by the French mechanicane corps. They were brought on the mule pannier seats, two sick men being carried by each mule. Some were taken as far as Kamara, while others were carried from Kamara by the cars. The latter, which are covered from sun and rain, protecting the face and body, but the majority were sitting. They were sent in certain proportions to each regiment at, and, after receiving their convoy, were formed up at the head quarters of each division. The journey to Balaklava was performed in half the time which would have been occupied by the ambulance wagons. All the mules were fat and sleek, not a nail was wanting in a shoe, not a strap or buckle appeared to be out of order. The Cossack muleteers, who conducted the train, officers and men were all active, in good health, cheerful, and manifestly understood all the details of the employment in which they were engaged. The mules came chiefly from the quarter-general at Chersonese; had they collected these also remaining with the disbanded ambulances, they could have conveyed double the number.

There is a very great amount of sickness continuing in the English camp. The fine weather of the last few days has done some good in arresting the increase, but now that the labor of carrying up the rations from Balaklava is added to the severe duties in the trenches, the benefit will in some degree be counteracted. We trust that the mild weather may continue until the means of hutting, and other necessaries, are brought. A general order appeared the other day, of which the following is a copy:

"Until further orders, the issue of fuel will be limited to that troops encamped upon the heights before Sebastopol. From the wording of this order, one would be led to imagine that fuel had already been issued to these troops, but such has never been the case. No fuel has yet been obtained; and indeed if it could be got, there would be no means of transporting it from Balaklava to the regiments, unless carried by the men themselves. I hear a question continually asked—Where are our private but horses? They were left at Varna when the army left for the Crimea. The officers would gladly part with these for less money than they gave for them, as they are utterly useless to them where they are. Some say they have left Varna, and have been sent up by land to Constantinople.

A PEEP INTO SEBASTOPOL.

The correspondent of the London Morning Herald, writing from the camp, on the 7th thus describes the appearance of the town of Sebastopol, and the condition of the Russian defences, as viewed from the trenches:

Sebastopol is not in ruins, and what is more important still its defences are four times stronger and more vigorous than the first day we opened fire. I know this statement may make my letters unpopular with certain sets, who will see nothing but victories and causes for gratulation in all we do; but nevertheless, it is only the truth, and I am confident that time will vindicate my assertion even in the eyes of the goblins.

To tell myself in this point, beyond all possibility of doubt, I yesterday determined to visit the trenches, and meet unarmed, in quiet pool, within two hundred yards of the Russian batteries, and close overlooking the town and harbors. Independently of my approach this place now for a covered way had been constructed to it, and both sides have comparatively speaking ceased firing for some time. I therefore, got in the trench easily, and lying under the shelter of a broken wall was enabled, with my glass, to survey the whole town minutely.

I confess I never saw the town under such favorable circumstances. Except now and then, from an occasional field-play gun, there was no smoke, and the sky being lowering and heavy objects could be distinguished with unusual clearness. At the first glance I was led to suppose that the town had in reality been much injured; for all the lofty lines of its edifices compared with the dockyard walls looked in ruins. But, changing my point de vue for one more lofty, I was soon convinced of my mistake.

The real damage inflicted on the town of Sebastopol amounts to this: all the huts used by the dockyard laborers and the Turkish quarter of the town outside the walls are nearly destroyed—that is laid almost level with the earth. This part of it is composed something of the same kind as our Bielcliff highways. The walls are here and there marked with shot but most unquestionably, as defenses, they are still unimpaired.

The large barrack here on the walls, against which our fire, as against a Government building, has been particularly directed, is riddled in every part, and most of its roof destroyed. The same is the case with all at sixty or seventy of the houses nearest to the walls, but beyond this nothing has been done. Had any of the principal missions been in the centre of the town been injured, it would be easily seen, as most of them are of limestone, and all are white as snow, and instantly show a shot mark. The splendid structure which we call the Parthenon—the Government House—and, indeed, almost even twentieths of the buildings—show no trace of injury.

The citizens which I could see, and which, of course, were those nearest to our batteries, were all in a most enviable state of cleanliness and good order. In these were numerous bodies of troops lounging about unconcernedly with their muskets piled upon the pathways. Many civilians passed constantly to and fro, and now and then an ammunition wagon; but I saw no trace of either women or children, or other vehicles of the ordinary description.

Once during the time I was watching, three carts, laden either with sick or wounded—most probably the former—passed towards the north side of the town. None of the Russians appeared to take the least notice of their suffering comrades or from that one may not unreasonably argue that they have got as used to death and misery as ourselves.

The only incident that appeared to move these Muscovites was the passage along the streets of an officer evidently of high rank, while they all instantly stood to their arms and beat their drums while he passed just as the French salute their generals. Who he was, of course I was unable to guess, but he certainly displayed a considerable amount of nonchalance and coolness, as a few minutes after I saw him riding from battery to battery attended by five or six officers on foot.

Near the walls on the south are the ruins of some large buildings, which has evidently been burned. This is the hospital in which so many of the Russian wounded unfortunately perished. Two or three more buildings near the dockyards are also blackened by fire, as if they had been gutted; but the walls were too thick to permit the conflagration extending. Most of the houses in the Quarantine section, especially cabins—are built with stone, and of extraordinary thickness, for the purpose of resisting the tremendous gales which sweep this part of the world in winter. So much for the aspect of the town.

Of the earthworks round Sebastopol it is more difficult to speak with accuracy. So numerous are these additions that of them it is quite impossible at once to gain a neat and extensive view. As far as I can judge from traversing nearly two-thirds of the allied lines, the enemy's batteries are armed generally in good working order. Only in one or two instances were the embrasures marked—that is closed up when a gun is dismounted—and these marking, I was informed by our officers, would be merely temporary, as the enemy always managed to replace their artillery in twelve or fifteen hours. I myself have seen them do so within three.

The whole of the enemy's batteries are now protected by a deep ditch in front, with regular abatis and rows of stockades and cheveaux de frise. From this last alone it is evident that they are guarding against, and therefore fear, an assault. But it is principally on the south side that I wish to speak. I was told before I set out upon my survey that I should be astonished at the immensity of the Russian batteries, reaching from the head of the harbor to the east, right round to Star Fort and St. Cervelna on the north, and all of which had only been unmasked two days previous.

FROM CHINA.

The following are extracts from a letter in a London paper. They seem worth attention:

During the last ten days several bloody engagements have taken place at the north gate of the city, on some occasions as many as 30,000 combatants have been in the field—the rebels have been driven from their entrenchments and also from the villages they occupied, and were, until yesterday, in the open field, but having recruited their forces they returned to their old ground, which they found in the possession of the Imperialists, whom they attacked with great fierceness and overthrew; so they are now again in a strong position within one mile of the city. It was discovered on the 4th inst. that the chief magistrate, an old man of eighty years of age, was in communication with the rebel chiefs, and that he had promised for the sum of $50,000 to open the city gates on the morning of the 5th inst and permit the rebels to enter; the old man was decapitated on the evening of his apprehension. Well informed persons look upon the fall of the city as certain, as the treachery lately discovered is prevalent among the highest officials is said to be nearly universal in all classes of the people.

Sir James Stirling returned to Hongkong early in the month; he had been lying at Hakodadi, Japan, for seven weeks, with the whole steam force of the East India and China Station; his Excellency is now engaged in the good work of chastising the pirates; twenty-nine junks were destroyed on the 4th and 5th inst., by the Barracouta and Encounter, which two vessels have, in conjunction with the Styx and Spartan, sailed for the west coast, to rout the inhabitants out of their strongholds. A few days ago, while the American steamer Queen was cruising, she fell in with and was attacked by thirteen pirates, the heavy armaments of the junks compelled her to haul off, and in three hours she renewed the contest; but the thirty-two pounders from the junks would soon have made mincemeat of her, for, while the pirates' shot went through her, her own fell short, so she was again, after the most persevering efforts of Lieut. Preble, obliged to abandon the action and steam off to Macao, where she fell in with her Majesty's ship Encounter, which vessel immediately weighed and stood away in company with the Queen; the pirate fleet remained at anchor, and threw some splendid shot at the Encounter, but her 120 pounders proved too much for them; for having received six shells from the large gun and a few sixty-eight pound shot, they abandoned their vessels and took to the hills; the junks were burnt.

HALIFAX, Jan. 17, P. M.—The details of the news by the steamship Canada possess considerable interest. The principal items are appended.

The London Times is an advocate of the immediate recall of Lord Raglan, on the ground that he is entirely incompetent to the high station assigned him.

The Times also severely assails the Ministry, and recommends the appointment of the Earl of Dalhousie, at present Governor-General of India, as Minister of War.

At the conference at Vienna on the 28th ult., the Austrian, French and English Plenipotentiaries drew up their interpolation of the four points, which have been so often announced as the grounds on which negotiations of peace could be commenced.

The Austrian Minister carried the document to Prince Gortschakoff, the Russian Embassador, who was asked if he was prepared to accept them without modification or reserve.

Gortschakoff replied that his instructions did not go so far, and asked and obtained two weeks' delay in order to communicate with the Czar.

The terms of the Allies are reported to be neither hard nor humiliating to Russia.

It is also stated that the Russian interpretation of the four points differs but little from that of the Allies.

The siege works about Sebastopol are rapidly advancing, and reinforcements to the Allied troops were constantly arriving.

The Conqueror's Grave.—By William Cullen Bryant

Whilst this lowly grave a Conqueror lies,
And yet the monument proclaims it not;
Nor round the sleeper's name hath chisel wrought
The emblems of a fame that never dies,
Fly and unhearsed, in a graceful sheaf,
Twined with the hero's fair imperial leaf.
A simple name alone,
To the great world unknown,
Is graven here, and wild flowers, rising round,
Mock meadow-sweet and violets of the ground,
Lean lovingly against the humble stone.

Here, in the quiet earth, they laid apart
No mass of iron mould and bloody hands,
Who sought to wreak upon the cowering lands
The passions that consumed his restless heart;
But one of broader spirit and delicate frame
Gentlest, in mien and mind.
Of gentle womankind,
Gladly shrinking from the breath of blame;
Only in whose eyes the smile of kindness made
Its home, like flowers, by sunny brooks in May.
Yet, at the thought of other's pain, a shade
Of sweeter sadness chased the smile away.

Nor doubt that when the hand that moulders here
Was raised in menace, realms were shaken with fear,
And armies mustered at the sign, as when
Clouds rise on clouds before the rainy East—
Gray captains leading bands of veteran men
And fiery youths to be the vulture's feast.
Not thus were waged the mighty wars that gave
The victory to her who fills this grave;
Alone her task was wrought,
Alone the battle fought;
Through that long strife her constant hope was stayed
On God alone, nor leaned for other aid.

She met the hosts of Sorrow with a look
That altered not beneath the frown they wore
And when the storming breed were rallied and took,
Meekly, her gentle rule, and frowned no more.
Her soft hand put aside the wreaths of wrath,
And calmly breasted truth
The fiery shafts of pain,
And rent the nets of passion from her path.
By that victorious hand despair was slain.
With love she vanquished hate, and overcame
Evil with good, in her Great Master's name.

Her glory is not of this shadowy state,
Glory that with the fleeting season dies;
But when she entered at the sapphire gate
What joy was radiant in celestial eyes!
How Heaven's bright depths with sounding welcomes rang,
And flowers of Heaven by shining hands were flung
And He who, long before,
Pain, scorn and sorrow bore,
The Mighty Sufferer, with aspect fond,
Smiled on the timid stranger from his seat;
He who returning, glorious, from the grave,
Dragged Death, disarmed, in chains, a cowering slave.

See, as I linger here, the sun grows low;
Cocks afar are summoning that the night is near.
Oh, gentle sleeper, from thy grave I go
Consoled, though sad, in hope and yet in fear.
Brief is the time, I know,
The warfare chafes begun;
Yet all may win the triumphs thou hast won.
Still flows the fount whose waters strengthened thee;
The visions' names are yet too few to tell
Heaven's mighty roll; the glorious armory
That ministered to thee, is open still.

SKYLARKING.

Our experiences in locomotion have, heretofore, been considerable. From walking to riding wild jackasses; from traveling on horseback to traveling in stage coaches; on express engines running a mile a minute and Mississippi steamboats with turpentine beneath their boilers; on pinkey schooners and full-rigged ships: we have tried them all. We have been down in a diving bell, and now we have been up in a balloon.

Desirous of obtaining the exact relationship existing between the two Crescents—celestial and terrestrial—we took passage for the upper world with M. Eugene Godard, on Sunday afternoon last, and, rising easily and pleasantly from Mother Earth, sailed off towards the South-west. In about five minutes from the moment of cutting loose we had gained an altitude that laid the city open to our sight like a grand panorama. Its streets and shipping and buildings; its churches and cathedrals, with all the little fauxbourgs adjacent, were translated into a grand picture, of which the horizon was the bordering. Lake Pontchartrain lay clearly expanded on the one side; the Mississippi seemed like a great thread of silk, growing momently more and more indistinct underneath. We could see the white sails of vessels on the one and the smoky progress of steamboats on the other. The cheers of crowds in Gretna and Carrollton came indistinctly to our ears, and through the glass we could almost make out the numbers assembled. A more beautiful picture cannot be conceived, and the clearness of the day rendered it doubly grand.

As soon as we had risen to the comfortable height of four or five thousand feet, M. Godard hung up his barometer to one side of the netting, placed a small mahogany board across the car for a table, and commenced getting dinner! It was an exceedingly mundane and terrestrial matter, but better claret, cake and champagne we never discussed—washed down with a glass of veritable Cognac. The health and prosperity of New Orleans; of its pretty women and other agreeable institutions, were all duly drank as we progressed on our journey to the celestial empire. Dinner having been disposed of, a natural inclination arose for getting high and something "of the earth, earthy," was thrown overboard in the shape of bags of sand. The balloon evidently felt relieved, for it bounced up two or three thousand additional feet and increased the size of the picture in an equivalent ratio. We saw lakes, and creeks, and bayous, and swamps, and plantations, and multitudinous other agreeable things to be seen: but they all served to remind us too strongly of the quarter whence we came. Accordingly more ballast was disposed of, and Lake Salvador somewhat diminished in depth. The balloon responded to the wish expressed, and rose up into the clear heaven until matters and things underneath began to look rather indistinct. Great lakes dwindled into mere wash-tubs, and big bayous dwarfed to an utter contemptibility. Owing to the calmness and clearness of the atmosphere, we enjoyed a fine opportunity for examining every matter within range, until the last struggle upward, which brought the clouds much nearer than the churches.

In this agreeable state of suspension the balloon remained, following the course of the wind, until it was deemed expedient to try the truth of that poetry which says facilis descensus Averni. The valve was opened and the descent commenced. The sensation accompanying it was of a sinking but agreeable nature, and, if long continued, would, we should imagine, produce a pleasant sleep. When a proximity of four or five thousand feet to the earth had been attained, M. Godard made a reconnoissance, but found nothing visible beyond illimitable swamps, creeks and bayous. It was, however, becoming season to get down, down we intended to come before night; and, accordingly, the best place visible was selected and the balloon lowered into a swamp not far from a bayou or canal, skirted with cane, brush and cotton wood. The party, which consisted of a lady and two gentlemen, hailed M. Godard, waited patiently until the anchor had taken fast hold in the brush and then, started for the levee. The locality was utterly unknown; but as no houses could be seen in any direction, a campement became a necessity. Accordingly, while two of the gentlemen detached the car from the balloon and let up the latter as far as the cable would permit, the third made a fire and the lady began preparations for supper. Darkness came on during these operations, but it found a bright fire burning, piles of fuel collected, and a rude table set out with claret, cake and champagne; roast duck, gelatine, ham, bread and other similar eatables and drinkables.

After supper the party gathered around the fire and discussed matters and things in general—especially where they were and how they should get back. The prospect was certainly any thing but pleasant, but was met with all the buoyancy and good nature that distinguishes French character. After a while the car was fitted up for the lady's bed-chamber, and the musquitoes stretched themselves on the ground—their aerial wings and wishes materially lessened. The stars were overhead, however, and the Crescent as much above its compeers as usual. The less said of that night the better both for it and us.

When morning came there was no one unprepared to welcome it. The camp was struck; by which it is to be understood that all things were left in statu quo. An examination of the chart and compass showed the direction of the city, but as the swamp intervened, a pilgrimage with the current of the creek became a necessity, and was accordingly commenced... Those who have threaded a Louisiana swamp, in which cane-brakes, bayous and quagmires are the predominant characteristics, may comprehend the felicity of that journey—which lasted from 6 to 1 o'clock, and in which a progress of seven miles was made. We say nothing of it.

About 1 o'clock a hunter's pirogue was discovered with the hunter in it. Both were chartered, and an additional skiff being obtained, the party returned to the camp whence it came. The basket and empty bottles were there, but the balloon—no where visible. A little research discovered it, however, in the last choleraic state of collapse—exploded, prostrate and torn—its former glory thoroughly departed. The balloon and basket were gathered into the skiff, and, together with the party, started by water for the burgh of La Vacherie, a place on the banks of Bayou Lafoncho, in the Parish of that name, containing about fifty inhabitants—every man of which goes about in a pirogues with a dog and double-barreled gun! both half-cocked. On the way thither several ducks were shot, that made an excellent supper, and afterwards a long and refreshing sleep was enjoyed, between sheets. Early the next morning a neighboring planter—Mr. E. Mauge, sent around a wagon to convey the celestials to his plantation, where every kindness and courtesy were extended them and they sent on still further, to a station called "Robinson's," on the Opelousas Railroad. Mr. Charles G. Thibodaux then took them in charge, and having presented them with sundry snipe and other products of that ilk, handed them over to the consideration of Messrs. Harris & Jackson, of the New Orleans, Opelousas and Great Western Railroad, who landed both balloon and ballooners safely in this city.

The voyage, aside from that portion pertaining to the swamp, was very pleasant and agreeable. M. Godard is an experienced and able aeronaut, as his two hundred and thirty different ascensions fully prove, and contrives to give a double zest to the enjoyment of the trip by his evident knowledge of the matters pertaining to air-travel. Our compagnons du voyage—M. Charles Bleton, of the "Orleanian," and Mme. Emilie Gayaze, of this city—although they thought Jordan was a hard road to travel in some places, kept up their spirits and aged with us that the voyage was grand—magnificent—pretty good. We have to record, "in advance of all our cotemporaries," a great fire on several prairies; a reported rise of one inch in Bayou Lafourche; some injury to M. Godard's balloon, and a very uncomfortable "Winter Night's" experience in the swamp.

M. Godard will ascend again next Sunday.

Filthy Democrats Filth Good for Nothing Brats.

THE "REPUBLICAN COURT."

Washington City, December 7, 1854.

Dear Sir—I enclose you an extract from a work entitled "The Republican Court, or American Society in the Days of Washington," which is going the rounds of the press.

I particularly call your attention to a relation by "Mr. Wansey, an English manufacturer," who, it is stated, once breakfasted with the Presidential family.

Mr. Wansey not only contributes facts, but furnishes gossip, and relates an anecdote "manifesting feelings" with which that "excellent women," Mrs. Washington, regarded Democrats." The anecdote exhibits characteristics so different from those usually attributed to that lady that I could not refrain from presenting it to your notice. It is as follows:

"After Wansey says her drawing-rooms were objected to by the Democrats as tending to give her a superemincy, and as introductory to the paraphernalia of Courts. With what feelings the excellent woman regarded these Democrats is shown by an anecdote of the same period.

"She was a severe disciplinarian, and Nelly Custis was not often permitted by her to be idle or to follow her own caprices. The young girl was compelled to practice at the harpsichord four or five hours every day, and one morning, when she should have been playing, her grandmother entered the room, remarking that she had not heard the music, and also that she had observed some person going out whose name she would very much like to know. Nelly was silent, and suddenly her attention was arrested by a blemish on the wall, which had been newly painted a delicate cream color. 'Ah! it was no Federalist,' she exclaimed, looking at a spot just above the settee; 'none but a filthy Democrat would mark a place with his good-for-nothing head in that manner!'"

No one in the world is so well qualified as yourself to judge of the authenticity of this paragraph, and I respectfully submit it to your adjudication.

I am, with high regard, your friend and fellow-citizen,
Samuel Young Atlee.

George W. Parke Custis, Esq.

Arlington House, December 20, 1854.

My dear Sir—Your very kind letter of the 7th, together with its enclosure, was duly received, and has remained too long unanswered. Ill health and spirits have caused my correspondence to fall much in arrear.

I have no sort of recollection of Mr. Wansey, the English manufacturer, and am much at a loss to know by what manner of introduction Mr. W. breakfasted at the Presidential mansion. It was not a breakfasting house.

The introduction must have been derived from Sir John Sinclair, or the Earl of Buchan in Europe, or from old Bob Morris, in Philadelphia, to have given Mr. Wansey his breakfast at the Presidential mansion.

As to the story of Nelly Custis, practising very long and very unwillingly at the harpsichord, that part of the Tale of Wansey is true. The poor girl would play and cry, and cry and play for long hours under the immediate eye of her grandmother, a rigid disciplinarian in all things.

As to the absurd details in the Tale of Wansey, that chronicle a saying of Mrs. Washington touching the Democrats, no one, my dear sir, who knew the venerable lady, or who had ever heard of her, will believe a word of it.

As the esteemed Lady Washington of the Army of Independence, or the Lady President of later days, Mrs. Washington was remarkable for her affable and dignified manners, and her courteous and kindly demeanor to all who approached her. Again, it is notorious that the politicians and statesmen of both parties were equally well and kindly received at the Presidential mansion, where were welcomed Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Giles, and others of the chiefs of the Democratic party, as well as Mr. Ames, Mr. Sedgwick, and others of the Federalists.

I can with great truth aver that, in the whole period of the first Presidency, I never heard Mrs. Washington engage in any political controversy, or, indeed, touch the subject of politics at all.

Another remark, and I have done with the Tale of Wansey.

The sitting-parlor, into which all visitors were shown, was papered, not "painted;" but, even had it been painted à la Wansey, things were better ordered in the house of first President than that a gentleman visitor, on leaning back against the wainscot, should leave his mark behind him.

I have had but a glance at the work lately published, called the "Republican Court, but was truly amazed to find that, among the distinguished ladies who adorned that dignified age, to descend to all time as the Age of Washington, the very élite of the number Mrs. Robert Morris, the wife of the great benefactor, and the sister of Bishop White, has been forgotten!

Among the many worthies of the Revolution, none—no, not one—stood higher in the esteem, or dwelt nearer to the heart of the Chief, than Robert Morris. At the Congressional and other great dinners, the custom was for the President to hand Mrs. Morris in to the table, while Mr. Morris performed the same duty to Mrs. Washington.

At table Robert Morris always sat at the right of the Lady President, while Mrs. Morris occupied a similar position next to the Chief.

At the drawing-room Mrs. Morris occupied the chair next to Mrs. Washington.

The matters of etiquette in the old days of the Republican Court were not arranged or directed by a master of ceremonies; they were adopted and carried out by common consent.

I have promised my friend Mr. Lossing, the talented author and artist of the "Field Book of the Revolution," a short memoir of the Republican Court, from an eye-witness, so soon as I can muster a little health and spirits to write it. I have written you a long letter.

Health and respect from, my dear sir, yours faithfully,
George W. P. Custis.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

The Rev. Thomas Hurlburt, of Rossville Mission, Hudson's Bay Territory, in his journal, dated September 17, writes: "Dr. Rae has just returned, and has found traces of Sir John Franklin. One of our members here was on this expedition and has made his family happy by his safe return. His name is Thomas Mastitukwin. I had a long talk with him on the subject. He gave me an interesting account of their journey, and their sluttering in a snow house, where they had six weeks of constant night. In March last they started on the ice to the north, and were thirty-seven days on their northern journey. They were about one hundred miles beyond the region inhabited by the Esquimaux; but where they all found the tracks of the musk ox.

"Sir John and his party are dead; but perhaps one or two of the men may be still alive and among the Esquimaux. Sir John's watch, all in pieces, with his silver spoons, knives and forks, were found. The ship was a great god-send to these people, and they now all have good sleds, floors, canoes, etc. of oak wood. Dr Rae and party did not see any of the remains of Sir John and his party; but the Esquimaux informed him that Sir John was found dead, with his blanket over him and his gun by his side. The probability is that it is not more than two or three years since the party perished of hunger."

We copy the above, says the New York Advertiser, from the Toronto Guardian. It is a paragraph calculated to "go the rounds," and it may as well carry a word or two of comment with it. We have no doubt that Mr. Thomas Mastitukwin is an excellent, worthy, and veracious man. His being a member of Mr. Hurlburt's mission charge is a guarantee of this, for we know Mr. Hurlburt to be all that a Christian missionary should be. But Mastitukwin's statement varies from Dr. Rae's in two particulars—too feeling of the ship into the hands of the Esquimaux, and the finding and recognition of Sir John Franklin's body, "with his blanket over him and his gun by his side." These are such assertions as almost unavoidably accumulate upon any marvelous or exciting story orally communicated and spread.

THE CAVE OF THE SEVEN SISTERS.

AN IRISH LEGEND.

The locality, which was the scene of the following tragedy is the little village of Ballyhunion, situated within a few miles of Kerry Head, Ireland. The scenery around is of the wildest and most striking description. Frowning rugged cliffs, rising abruptly out of the water to the height of over one hundred feet, and perforated with numerous caves, into which the ocean rushes with fearful fury in winter; for it is a stormy coast, and rarely does a month pass without beholding some dead, putrefied body washed ashore; while inland a barren, uncultivated plain, consisting mostly of bog, stretches away to nearly the foot of the Rocks, which, looming in the distance, seem to rear their giant masses even to the sky, and form, as it were, an impenetrable barrier between the coast and the interior. On the brink of one of these precipices we have mentioned, there stands the ruins of a castle, seemingly of great antiquity. Nothing now remains but the basement story, and that seems as if it would be able to withstand the war of winds and waves for hundreds of years longer.

According to the legend, the castle was inhabited by a gallant chieftain at the period of the incursions of the Danes, and who was the father of seven blooming daughters. He was himself a great warrior, animated with the greatest hatred against the Ostmen, who, at that period, were living every part of Erin waste. His sword never rested in its sheath; and day and night his light galleys cruised about the coast on the watch for any pirnical marauder who might turn his prow thither. One day a sail was observed on the horizon; it came nearer and nearer, and the pirate standard was distinguished waving from its mast-head. Immediately surrounded by the Irish ships, it was captured after a desperate resistance. Those that remained of the crew were slaughtered and thrown into the sea, with the exception of the captain and his six brothers, who were reserved for a more painful death. Conveyed to the fortress, their wounds were dressed, and they were allowed the free range of the castle. Here, gradually, a love sprung up between them and the seven Irish maidens, who yielded to their ardent protestations, and agreed to fly with them to Denmark. Every thing was arranged for the voyage, and a fearful stormy night in winter was chosen for the attempt. Not a single star shone in the sky, the cold blast came sweeping from the ocean, the rain fell in torrents, and the waters roared and raged with terrific violence amid the rocky caverns. Escaping down the battlement by a rope ladder, they discovered to their horror that on reaching the ground they were surrounded by armed men. Not a word was uttered; but they well knew into whose hands they had fallen.

Conducted again within the fortress, they found themselves face to face with their injured father. One deadly glance of hatred he cast on the prisoners, and, muttering some few words to one of his attendants, he pointed towards his daughters. The man, on receiving the command, recalled a few paces, transfixed with horror; and then he advanced nearer, and seemed as if remonstrating with him. But the parent's face assumed an absolutely demoniac expression; and more peremptorily repeating his order, he stalked out of the room. And now commenced a fearful scene. The lovers were torn from each other's arms, and the women were brought forth again. The storm had grown more violent, and the spray was dashing far over the cliff; whilst the vivid flashes of lightning afforded a horrible illumination to the dreary scene. Proceeding along the brink of the precipice, they at length came to a chasm which resembled somewhat the crater of a volcano, as it was completely closed, with the exception of the opening at the top, and the small aperture below, through which the sea rushed with fearful violence. The rolling of the waters sounded fearfully on the ear of those around, and now at length the sisters devined their fate. One by one they were hurled into the boiling flood; one wild shriek—the billows closed again—and all was over. What the fate of their lovers was, the legend says not. The old castle has crumbled into ruins; the chieftain sleeps in an unknown grave; his very name forgotten; but still the sad ending of the maidens is remembered, and even unto this day the cavern is denominated the "Cave of the Seven Sisters."

HOW THEY DO THINGS IN FRANCE.

The following anecdote, which we translate from the Paris correspondence of the Courier des Etats Unis, besides being amusing, suggests in contrast by which it would be well if we could profit:

After a recent accident on a railroad near Paris, the Directors took immediate measures to compensate those who had suffered in the affair, although the road was not in the least to blame in the matter, and it was one of those occurrences which no prudence can avoid. The travelers had been taken to their destination with the greatest dispatch in good carriages; the wounded and bruised had received all imaginable attention, and a compensation in money was made at once to all, who demanded it, without any dispute as to their claims.

The Directors thought they had arranged every thing, when a gentleman of respectable position in the Parisian world; a man of note and wealth, whose name is well known, presented himself at the office of the company, and addressing himself to the clerk whose business it was to attend to such claims, said, with a smile, and in an easy way: "Sir, I was in the cars at the time of the accident."

"Ah, you were in the cars?"

"I was, sir; here is my ticket."

"And you have come to claim damages?"

"Of course, I have"

"You are wounded?"

"Not at all."

"Bruised?"

"Not in the least, thank God!"

"Then what claim have you on the company?"

"The fact is, I was neither wounded nor bruised; but I was compelled to stand in the open air for a whole hour during a very cold night, while they put things to rights, and I caught cold—a very severe cold," (coughs).

"I see; and you claim damages for your cold?"

"Yes, sir,"

"Very good. What do you charge for your cold?"

"Well, I think forty francs would be none too much."

"Agreed—forty francs. Is that all?"

"No; my spectacles were broken in my pocket by the shock; they cost me eighteen francs; it is fair that you should pay that."

"Very well. Forty and eighteen make fifty-eight."

"Excuse me."

"Is there any thing else?"

"Yes. When I came to Paris I was naturally anxious to set my friends at ease about my safety. I took a cab, which I kept about seven hours—I have a large circle of friends—at two francs an hour.

"That is fourteen francs: fourteen and fifty-eight are seventy-two. Is that all?"

"That's all."

The cashier counted out the seventy-two francs; the gentleman took the money, gave a receipt, and departed perfectly satisfied.

Monster Pines.—We often hear the big trees of California spoken of, and we wonder and doubt if the stories be true, and the California papers seem to be proud of their "tall" pines, and to delight to make us "open our eyes" at their marvelous dimensions. The Placer Times mentions a spruce pine log, twenty-six feet long, which turned out 4,000 feet clear stuff, without knot or windshakes. The tree made 13,000 feet clear lumber. Trees of other species are much larger—for instance, the red-wood—some of which turn out upwards of 100,000 feet. One such tree will build two houses, each two stories high and fifty feet square, furnishing all the square timber, planks, shingles, etc. The following account of big trees seems almost incredible: "One of the trees is named the 'Father Pine.' This is dead, and has fallen to the earth. Its dimensions are as follows: length, 400 feet; circumference, 110 feet. The trunk of this tree is a hollow, which has been trnced for a distance of 250 feet. There is a little pond of water in the center of this cavity four feet in depth. The tree 250 feet from the stump is no less than 12 feet in diameter. The cluster called the 'Three Sisters,' taken together, are 92 feet in circumference, and 300 feet in height. The center is bare of branches for 200 feet above the ground. The 'Mother Tree' is 91½ feet in circumference, and 325 feet high. The 'Mother and Son' are 92 feet in circumference, and 300 feet in height, united at the base. The 'Twin Sistors,' 100 feet in circumference, 300 feet in height. The 'Pioneer's Cabin' is a remarkable curiosity. This tree has been partially burned; the result of the scorching is the dividing the trunk into several compartments, which are known as 'parlor, bed-room, and kitchen.' The holinw, which is 200 feet in height, is called the 'chimney;' the tree is 85 feet in circumference. The 'Siamese Twins,' 95 feet in circumference, and 325 feet in height. 'Guardian of the Times,' 85 feet in circumference, and 325 feet in height. The 'Old Bachelor,' 81 feet in circumference, and 275 feet in height. The 'Old Maid,' 76 feet in circumference, and 275 feet in height. 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' 94 feet in circumference, and 300 feet in height. 'Pride of the Forest,' 87 feet in circumference, and 200 feet in height. 'Two Friends,' 85 feet in circumference, and 300 feet in height. These trees are all embraced in an area not exceeding one half mile in extent."

What Was It Cut With?—A party of friends had assembled one evening, and after discussing the various topics of the day, one of them remarked: "Well, boys, 'spose you have all heard of Dave Duncomb's marriage,"

Some of them had, and some had not.

"Well," continued the speaker, "he is married, and I was at the wedding. A right merry time we had of it, too, I assure you; but there was one thing that surprised me very much, and that was the manner in which they cut the wedding-cake. I can't help thinking of it. Now, what do you think they cut it with?"

"The wedding-ring," said one.

"No," said the first speaker, "you must guess again."

"A string," said another.

"No."

"A stick whittled to an edge," suggested a third.

"No."

"A piece of tin," ventured the fourth.

"No."

"A piece of pasteboard, guessed the fifth."

"No."

"Well, what was it?" exclaimed they, all in a breath, after guessing every imaginable article, except the right one, that could possibly, or impossibly, to be put through such a caks.

"Why," said the quiz, slowly, "they cut it with a knife, to be sure."

Malay Pirates.—The clipper ship Misohief arrived at New York on the 8th instant, with the following report:

Passed through the China Sea, during the typhoon season, with very heavy weather. October 18, entered the North end of Gasper Straits, and at P. M., saw a Dutch bark on shore, surrounded by Malay proas, and signals of distress flying; also near her a ship sunk, with only her top gallant masts above water; came to, in company with clipper ship Archer, and English clipper ship Aurora, and sent an armed boat, as did the other two ships, to the bark's assistance. She proved to be the Henri Wester, from Whampoa, bound to Antwerp, vessel and cargo a total loss, both being in possession of the Malays, who were clearing her of every thing; gave the crew every assistance and proceeded.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

THE undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements for the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of a high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own, and the adjoining States the adoption of a plan, which we trust will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. O. Thweett, (well-known throughout the State as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South) has been engaged as President of the Institution The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweett is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield having subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured, that no school can be found in the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweett to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning, as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages as far as health, society, etc, are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher Schools of the country—the particulars of which will be published hereafter. The first session of the School to commence on the 4th day of January, 1855.

Parents will please send on their daughters, as there are always advantages to be derived from an early commencement.

Board can be obtained for the present in respectable private families at moderate rates.

AYER'S
CHERRY PECTORAL
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

Of all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints, nothing has ever been found which could compare in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions. We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1847; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the Cherry Pectoral, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

Read the following opinion, founded on the long experience of the eminent Physician of the Port and City of ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851.

Dr J. C. Ayer: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how a better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

J. J. BERTON, M. D., F. R. S.

See what it has done on a wasted constitution, not only in the following cases, but a thousand more:

Sudbury, Jan. 24, 1851.

Dr. Ayer: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness. I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage. My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my acquaintances as a victim of consumption. I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed. At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to state to the afflicted, through you, that my health, in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL. Yours truly,

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty, to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

☞ The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug6—6m26

VOL. IV., NO. 52. NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY MORNING, JANUARY 27, 1855. WHOLE NO. 208.

THE RELATION OF BAPTIZED INFANTS TO THE CHURCH.

IV. We may now state emphatically the ground all along implied: that the baptized infant is a member of the visible Church of Christ in the same sense as a baptized adult convert, and is entitled to precisely the same ecclesiastical recognition and training.

Before advancing to a further exhibition of this main principle, we shall relieve the argument from a few objections.

1. We cannot deny that however true and appropriate the institution of an actual church membership might be, if the Church were what it should be, yet our ideal picture falls little to correspond with it in the actual history of Christ. We ourselves avow it to be a sad and sad bitter fact, that an ordinance of God's house has come to appear an empty form—a burlesque upon a sacrament; and the solemn words of prayer and of covenant vow end a blasphemy! Yet, what of all this? Is the Church of God to pronounce its own institutions improper and incongruous because she has failed to convey the grace which was meant to give them fitness and efficacy! Evidently, the Almighty, in constituting his Church, was compelled to adopt her ordinances either as appropriate to an unfaithful Church, or to a faithful one. Now it is hard, indeed, if men will reduce him to the dilemma of either shaping the house of his house in a style only suitable to a shattered and dilapidated building, or to the discrepancy between the promise of the portal and the fulfilment of his Church appeared so striking that he never could have erected the portal, and it must be hurled to the dust. On the contrary, the entire odium of the incongruity comes back on the faithless Church which has made it. It speaks sorrowfully of her disorder and negligence, when a divingly-established seal and symbol of her blessings has not in her the correspondent reality. Let her not hurl from her hand the reproachful monument; let her not rend its inscriptions of covenanted blessing with a veil of flimsy explanations! Let it stand there until its perpetual witness and voice arouse her to prayer and systematic earnestness, and she can feel that all its meaning and promise is yea and amen in Christ Jesus.

2. We meet the observation that the Church, without thus recognizing an actual membership of its baptized infants, does much of which we have spoken for their Christian training. We admit the fact; but it has done it in a random and desultory manner. Her measures have lacked the unction and the successive order of a regular system. The family is an institution by itself; and where a pious and judicious parental care has, by religious instinct, been set forth, there have been its fruits; yet there has been no system of responsibility securing such care to every household. The same instinctive sense of danger has led any a parent to shield his child from godless associations and amusements; yet if he neglect his solemn charge, the impression appears to provail extensively that it is his business, and the Church has nothing to say about it; instead of his being arrested for a breach of truest and spiritual infanticide, sometimes during a revival, prayer-meetings are held for those young hearts which overflow with feeling, and with childish but spiritual thought—yet the plan is not kept up as though the children of the Church were expected to have any experience to tell, or any gifts to exercise, until the involuntary cry arrests attention. In our own Church, especially, where an intimate acquaintance of the pastor with the religious condition of the souls of his flock is an impossibility, no adequate substitute is found, except in an occasional Sabbath school teacher. Even where one part of the spiritual machinery is well applied, another is left unused. And thus because the relative position of the family, of society, and the organic Church, which includes, and should control, them, is not understood and conceded, each jars against the other and neutralizes its blessings. In some few cases, perhaps, the infant Christian is nurtured at home, its opening graces sheltered, and a genial, social atmosphere and a judicious Church culture bring it to full maturity. But how many pious families there are who do not believe the answers to their prayers when they come; who receive expressions of religious emotion on the part of their children with a suppressed smile of amusement; who regard their little prayers and declaratives of sin and of forgiveness as much harmless play, like their fancies of pretending all mature experience of business or military life. The formal and random answers of parents fall coldly on the little heart, which, tender as a tremulous convert, needs to feel itself fully appreciated and sympathized with by those it loves. So we heedlessly break off the bud of early piety until the soul, exhausted and feeble, beneath the world's dull sky, puts forth a sickly bloom, or hangs as a barren stem. Though a covenanted member of God's household, it fails to consider itself as of the synagogue of Satan, and its acceptance into grace is made a problem for the future to settle, and its motives are to be drawn, not from what Christ has already done for and in it, but from fear of the wrath from which it has no reprieve. No wonder that our children have to be "regularly converted" between the age of twelve and eighteen. It is as early as the Church will let them have their rights. And for the want of a thorough, comprehensive, spiritual activity on the part of the body of Christ, that highest and grandest application of the atonement by which whole generations should be met at their birth, and, unstained by evil passion, unfettered by evil habit, unshaken by unbelief and error, rise up to assert the highest power of redemption even on this scene of our sin and curse—this grandest scheme of God is brought to naught, and made a visionary's day-dream.

3. But, again, and coming to the direct discussion of the identity of the membership held by the infant and the adult, we meet the modified view that, although the baptized child is introduced into the visible Church, yet it is not made a member of any particular branch of that Church, and, of course, has no claim upon the pastoral and ecclesiastical care of any particular Church.

"A person may be a member of the Catholic or Universal Church of Christ while he is not a member of any particular Church. Baptism introduces a person into the Catholic Church of Christ. Baptism alone does not constitute him a member of any particular Church. To become a member of a Presbyterian Church or a Methodist Church, etc., something more is required besides being baptized. Therefore, when an infant is baptized, although he is introduced by baptism into the Church of Christ, he is not thereby constituted a member of any particular branch of Christ's Church; and, if the baptism be performed by a Presbyterian or Methodist minister, he does not baptize him by virtue of his being a Presbyterian or a Methodist, but by virtue of his office as a minister of Christ. He does not, therefore, by virtue of his office, introduce him into the Presbyterian or Methodist Church. But he does introduce him, by baptism, immediately into the Church of Christ." SANFORD.

Now, so far as all this means that no baptized person is by that baptism bound to believe all the minor opinions of any denomination, it is certainly true; for he is bound only to faith in the great fundamental doctrines of the one Church, and to a submission to such disciplinary rules as are adopted by the particular Church with which he is brought in contact. A denomination is only an association of separate congregations of the one Church, who, agreeing in some unessential matters, find it pleasant and profitable to maintain an intimate connexion. But just as ten men, heads of families in one parish, who may form an association based on agreement in matters of opinion, cannot compel their baptized children to membership in that clique, and yet must consider those children as members of their respective family organizations, and hold themselves responsible for them to the Church in which they are enrolled, so a few congregations of the Catholic Church may form a society and agree in minor matters, but they do not thereby lose their character or their responsibility as parts of the Church general; and although they cannot claim that a person by baptism becomes amenable to their society, yet they must hold him amenable to their particular Church congregation as that section of the one Church into contact with which God's providence has brought him. So the family in which a baptized child is placed, and the congregation of saints of which that family is a part, and any larger section of the body of which that congregation is an organic part, are responsible for the nurture and training of every soul they admit by baptism, as much as if the unity of the Church were not, in appearance, broken by distinctions which God utterly ignores.

The idea of admitting a person into the Church visible, and yet not making him a member of any visible section of that Church, is absurd. What is not found in any of the parts, is not to be found in the whole.

Of course, these views arise from a proper conception of the organic and plastic nature of the Church. Of course, the grains of a sand-heap may be in that heap, and yet have no definable connection with any other grains of sand. If the Church were nothing but a loose catalogue of baptized people, it might be left in uncertainty where any particular name fell in. But if every member of the visible Church is to receive his nurturing grace through connection with the body of Christ, some section must hold him in living unity, and be the particular channel of his grace. So with the adult convert; so with the infant member. So no man can be a member of the visible Church, except by his right to membership under some particular denomination, and in some separate "congregation of believers."

V. The same great principle which thus authorizes the baptism of an infant, both, or even one of whose parents are Christians, utterly condemns that unscriptural way into which some ministers of our Church have wandered—of baptizing the children of parents that are both irreligious and who are living without the pale of the Church of God. The error has sprung up in the new light of Arminian sentiment, which declares the equality of every infant in moral character and relation to the atonement. Standing in contrast to the idea of a reprobated infancy, or an infancy entirely unsanctified until baptism conveys regenerating grace, this doctrine of the universal gracious state of the infant race is a glorious advancement in theological truth. But it is clear that personal character, although the fundamental, is not the only qualification for the seal of the covenant, but that there is regard to a prospective tuition and membership in the Church of the covenant. There were many infants in Abraham's day equally worthy in themselves as his own, and yet the formal covenant was made with those of the patriarch alone, on the express ground of their absolute subjection to religious teaching and discipline—"For I know him that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord and do judgment and justice." So the confirmation on the day of Pentecost was—"For the promise is unto you and your children," etc. This great idea of God's institution cannot be impugned by that other truth which serves as a platform upon which it builds. If his ministers venture to go beyond their commission, they will only find that his wisdom in the limitation was greater than theirs in the promiscuous application of his covenant mark, seeing that Jehovah recognises two great facts or principles, while they neglect the most obvious—the facts and law of spiritual nurture. Their course will sap the ordinance of its inmost truth and meaning. The child of an Olympian boxer and of a bacchanalian was as intrinsically worthy as any child, and yet God gave no orders to put his seal upon that child if its parents chose to let him receive it in momentary mockery. And because the unsanctified nature of the parent may not, under our social restraints, be exhibited in such glaring excesses, there is no compromise in God's covenant system with a more moral heathenism. How can God, through his Church, assume a formal and visible charge over a child when the only officer through whom that charge can be exercised is not found in the Church—when the conducting chain of the sanctifying power is wanting? Now, an unconverted parent, although living in a Christian land, is a heathen in all ecclesiastical relations. The more he knows—the more he associates with the Church, and yet refuses allegiance to God and his Church, the more clearly is he marked as one "holding the truth in unrighteousness." The Church may have more or less control over his children, but there is no natural guarantee for it. Neither civil law nor the law of natural influences permits the Church to exercise nurture which is the essential ground of her character as an organic body. It is true that the child may be as yet of the same regenerate nature as the Church itself, but the parental disregeneracy and heathenism come in between it and the visible body of Christ, and cut it out from a vital union. Instead of humoring the worlding into the notion that his children lose nothing ecclesiastically by his wilful separation from the Church, the occasion should be seized to make him apprehend how cruelly he himself is debarring from his offspring that covenant reality, of which a consistant Church only reflects the sign. Thus, while the Church does all that it can for his children, it should endeavor to awake him to a personal consecration, or the redemption of the vows of other days. The Church may not stoop to the mockery of welcoming a child over the threshold of God's household visible, and putting the seal of a perpetual shelter on his brow, when the very next minute it must be let go unprotected, to the world, the flesh, and the devil.

VI. The history of the obscuration of the great principle which we are illustrating, may serve to show how deeply its original meaning has penetrated the sense of the Church in all ages. In the apostolic era we have but little said about infant baptism, but much expressed in regard to the relation which they born to the Church. Before long a material philosophy began to encroach the simplicity of early faith, and inspired a tendency to reliance on the magical power of sacraments and forms. Forgetting its deep meaning as the pledge and first link of a long chain of ministrations through which power should come, Christians regarded baptism as a talismanic rite, conveying by itself a cleansing power. Yet, even with all this, a recognition of the early and true idea remained in forms which, even beyond the scriptural requirements, asserted the prospective reference to Church training as an essential ground of the administration. The introduction of sponsors could have regard only to the future. By admitting them, whether a useful innovation or not, the Church recognized the obligation of early and incessant watchfulness so fully, that even in advance she provided against the death or apostacy of the parental Church officer by engaging another to take his place. The early Church thus bore witness to all after ages that it dared to affix the seal of a covenant mercy upon no child over whom, as the instrument of that mercy, it was not to have continuous supervision from its baptism to its grave.

But when at the Reformation the doctrine of baptismal regeneration was abandoned by the continental reformers, another doctrinal error came in to obscure the meaning of the ordinance. According to the Calvinistic theology, all infants were in a state of unmitigated depravity, and therefore baptism could have no basis in their personal qualification. Many or most infants were assuredly reprobate forever, and therefore the rite could have no meaning as sealing anything to them individually, in view of future influences. Thus, those theologians who expected to baptize the children only of those who, as adults, assumed fully their early vows—that is, believers—declared those children baptized "on the faith of their parents." While another class, considering as Church members acknowledged unbelievers who had grown up in it, and their children canonically entitled to baptism, explained the unomaly of sealing a reprobate, by asserting the seal to be merely general in its import of a covenant to those who were not reprobate—the invisible Church of the elect. Having thus destroyed the significancy of the rite, they proceed to show that the Church membership of reprobates—so long as they are not openly immoral—is a definite expedient in God's organization of his Church to keep her in money, protectors, and material for conversion in the generation to come. The fact, therefore, that the simpler theory of infant baptism and Church membership which we advocate is not recognized by so large a section of the evangelical Church, is explained by their rejection of another truth—the universality of the atonement.*

In the Church of England there lingered a large element of the Romish theory of baptismal regeneration from a natural state of wrath. But, by the more evangelical of this day, there is always a prospective reference to the future contact with the Church means of grace. Thus, they consider the benefit of baptism to consist, not in a change of heart, but in a change of place—in an admission to this contact with the saving nurture of the body of Christ. And this idea, in connection with the intrinsic qualification of infants, is the true principle.

Methodism has been at great advantage in attaining a clearly-defined theory and uniformity of action in respect to this whole matter. With new views of the spirituality of religion flashing on her conscience, and a rejection of the gross theory of baptismal regeneration, she also had to adapt her system to the enlarged views of infant salvation which her doctrine of the atonement involved. And while her early theologians held views substantially correct, and implying the theory of this article, yet the relics of High Church tenets and language have obscured its full luster.†

Then, the circumstances under which Methodism has grown up, have been unfavorable to an early recognition of the whole truth. For many years it was not a Church, but a society; and the spirit of the society has characterized many of her ecclesiastical arrangements. Her mission was for a long while almost exclusively to adults—the work of the evangelist rather than of the pastor. Able to do very little at first toward the systematic nurture of our children, and accustomed to see those around us, in churches or not, growing up almost universally into a godless maturity, she has not realized what the power of a sanctified nurture would effect. She has shrunk from the idea of any practical Church membership, and has quailed before the irony of Anti-baptist cavillers. She had not recognized the prospective reference of the ordinance, but rested its propriety entirely on the intrinsic qualification of the child, and thus has been sometimes betrayed into promiscuous baptism.

But as years have brought several generations under her care, our Church has been reverting to the true idea. The fragments of a complete system of training have been gradually created or adopted as occasion under their respective necessity apparent in different districts or congregations. And now thousands of members are calling aloud for some more intelligible theory of infant baptism and membership than they have seen recognized, and many an humble pastor is calling, as we do now, upon those whose work it is to give the Church its full organization, to combine her desultory exertions into one comprehensive system.

PROMPTNESS IN DISCIPLINE.

The following article we find in the last number of the Zion's Advocate. A correspondent, in requesting its publication, says: "A somewhat careful observation of the history of churches has convinced me that the want of efficient, prompt discipline has been a most fruitful source of evil to our churches. In numerous and painful instances has the want of fidelity in this important matter been followed by a decline of piety, a loss of moral influence, dissensions and decay. The sentiments of the extract cannot, I think, be out of place this time; and I would like, through you, to ask for them a careful consideration." [Watchman.

"I can not dismiss the subject of church discipline without a few remarks upon the importance of taking up and disposing of each case promptly, as it arises; I do not mean hastily, but without any needless delay. An offender is much more likely to be reclaimed while his sin lies fresh and heavy upon his conscience, than after he has had a long time to fortify himself with excuses and extenuations. Never wink at a disciplinable offense, because you dread to take it up, nor flatter yourself that it will be easier to deal with it at some future and indefinite time than it is now. In nineteen cases out of twenty it will be far more difficult. Indeed, I am satisfied, from long observation, that there is no way to keep up church discipline but that indicated. If you let the first case go by, how can you take up the next? When a third is added the difficulty will be greatly increased. And when others still multiply, what can you do? when will you begin?

It is no easy matter to carry a disciplinary process through, where the offender is obstinate and has influential friends in the church and congregation; but by God's help it can be done if taken in season, and before any other arises to embarrass the proceeding. But if you delay till "other offenses come," and accumulate, it will at length be nearly impossible to do any thing. The second offender, as well as the first, will have his friends, the third likewise, and so on, till perhaps a majority of the church, and, if not, a strong minority, will get their feelings so much enlisted, some for one and some for another, as to be unwilling to do any thing. Every one will be ready to ask, where shall we begin? who shall be taken up first? and begin where you will, many will hold back and charge you with partiality, and thus your hands will be weakened and your heart discouraged.

All this evil comes of criminal neglect in the first instance. However small or weak a church may be, God will carry it safe through any process of discipline, if it acts promptly, and in reliance upon Divine aid. But, however numerous or strong any church may be, how can it expect God's blessings when it suffers the discipline which he has appointed to run down by its criminal apathy and neglect. Many a feeble church has been strengthened and saved by reviving discipline when, to all human appearance, not a step could be taken without exposing it to distraction and dissolution. In some cases powerful revivals have immediately followed the discharge of this painful duty, tens or twenties of new members have been added, where one or two have been cut off. On the other hand, where cases of heresy, scandal, or covenant breaking have been winked at for fear of the consequences of exercising faithful discipline, churches have suffered for years, if not for generations, under the frown of Him who "loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it, and that he might present to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."

I fear some churches have neglected discipline so long that they almost despair of ever being able to revive it, or they can not retain even "the form of godliness," much less "the power." A mortified limb must be amputated to save the body. It is worthy of very serious inquiry whether the present withdrawment of the spirit from the churches is not in some measure owing to the growing neglect of Gospel discipline. How can any delinquent church expect to be blessed, and to see the salvation of God in the conversion of sinners, till she "repents and does her first works?" Difficult and almost hopeless as the case is where discipline has long been neglected and offenses have consequently been multiplied, any church can, by the grace of God "purge out the old leaven," and wipe away the reproach under which she has lain and languished. It may cost many a hard struggle. It will require deep repentance for the past unfaithfulness, and much prayer for Divine assistance. But the work can be done. It is wonderful to see how difficulties vanish when men set about doing their duty with a right spirit. "Who art thou, oh, great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain?"

THE CHOCTAWS AND THE AMERICAN BOARD.

The recent action of the American Board having been communicated to the Council of the Choctaw Nation, Col. Harkins, the Chief, thus refers to the subject in a message to that body:

What are we to infer from this, but that they have their secret designs, and a far greater feeling for the welfare of the slaves among us, than for the Indians? There is no State in the South that would be willing for the Abolitionists to teach their slaves; and in fact they dare not attempt it; and it is because we are Indians that they suppose that they can have the same privilege among us. If the Abolitionists are not satisfied to teach our children alone, then I say for one, let the connection between us and the American Board be dissolved, and every Abolitionist be driven out of the Nation at once. We have trusted the missionaries sent out to us by the American Board, as well as ever missionaries were trusted by any unenlightened people. We placed our children in their hands. We gave them lands to cultivate—and placed under their management our school funds, thus showing on our part, not only a reliance upon their labors, but our open and confiding spirit; and never once have we persecuted them, or attempted to drive out of the country, even those whom we know not to be good men. We have not prevented them from preaching to our slaves. This has been the course pursued by the Choctaws towards the missionaries sent out among us. But we had a right to pass laws prohibiting them from teaching our slaves; because we knew them to be a dangerous people, who neither regarded the law of God nor that of man as binding upon their conduct or conscience. Because we have done this, the Board looks upon it as an outrage, and declares her intention to withdraw her teachers from our schools. Let it be done, and the sooner the better. And now let us look for missionaries and teachers from such as we can live in peace and unity, with; from whom we will have no fears that they will teach anything beyond what the apostles of Jesus Christ taught in their day.

If, to please the Abolitionists the Council should repeal the act which has given so much offence to the Board, you will see a party spirit arise among us, which will not be put down until every Abolitionist is made to leave the Nation.

Repeal that act and you may at once agree upon your Council being dictated to by the Abolitionists of the North.

Our people need not fear that the schools will cease on account of the threatened withdrawal of the present teachers by the American Board; for it was our money that brought them hither, and surely our money can again bring us as good if not better teachers.

RESISTING A CALL TO THE MINISTRY.

A well known minister now deceased, informed the writer that he had received a letter from a friend to the following effect: that he pursued a course of literary and classical studies with a view to the gospel ministry; but that under the influence of aspiring and ambitious feelings, fostered by worldly-minded and irreligious kindred, he was diverted from his purpose, and devoted himself to the study of law. He made gratifying proficiency in preparing for the legal profession, and had before him every reasonable prospect of success. But from the moment he determined to abandon the gospel ministry and study law, God appeared to forsake him; he lost his former spirit of prayer, and religious comfort departed from his breast. At length, under the pressure of strong conviction of duty, urged upon his conscience by an agent of the Board of Education, whom he heard preach, he was led to retrace his steps, and consecrate himself anew to the service of the Church, and to that sacred office to which, as he believed, he had once been called. The letter above referred to was written to inform his old friend of his decision, and to tell him, moreover, that its influence upon his piety and Christian enjoyment was almost instantaneous that his communion with God was no longer intercepted (as before) by insurmountable barriers; his grace seemed to have a more vigorous growth, and his "peace was like a river."

Perhaps there are many young men in the Christian Church, who, against the call of God and their own convictions of duty, are turning away their minds from this high and holy vocation to some secular pursuit. If so, can they expect God's blessings when it suffers the discipline which he has appointed to run down by its criminal apathy and neglect. Many a feeble church has been strengthened and saved by reviving discipline when, to all human appearance, not a step could be taken without exposing it to distraction and dissolution. In some cases powerful revivals have immediately followed the discharge of this painful duty, tens or twenties of new members have been added, where one or two have been cut off. On the other hand, where cases of heresy, scandal, or covenant breaking have been winked at for fear of the consequences of exercising faithful discipline, churches have suffered for years, if not for generations, under the frown of Him who "loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it, and that he might present to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."

ANECDOTE OF THE CZAR.

A correspondent, on whose accuracy we can rely, furnishes us with the following illustration of the social habits of the present "autocrat of all the Russias." He says:

"The Emperor does not seclude himself from his people. One evening in the year he is present, mingling promiscuously at a masked ball; any person is at liberty to speak to him on that occasion, and the privilege is never neglected. I have seen him at the theater take a chair in his hand and go singly through the pit, seat himself at the back of the orchestra, and immediately before the foot-lights. Had he any doubt of the affection of his subjects, or fear of assassination, as some of you English suppose, think you were bravado or courage would induce him to do that as the best course to deter people from the act?

"The Emperor is very fond of taking his children with him, and literally going, as you call it, 'shopping.' In this way he will, unattended, visit jewelers' stores, toy-shops, picture-galleries and similar places, especially where French and English goods are exposed for sale. He does not wish for, and would instantly repel any recognition, but he is very well aware that he is known, and the public of St. Petersburg are also conscious that he knows he is recognized, but it is silently and respectfully. One day a gentleman, leading a little boy by the hand along a side walk of a crowded thoroughfare, carried in the other hand some toys he had just selected and bought for the little fellow, or for other children at home. Perhaps they moved on rather leisurely, or appropriated more than their convenient share of the pavement; however this might be, another gentleman, in the undress uniform of some military division, rushed most unceremoniously past him. He was evidently in a most impolite hurry, and in striving to pass struck against the little boy, detached him from the tight grasp of his father's hand, and prostrated the child in the gutter. Not stopping to apologize, or even to assist in his extrication, he merely turned a deprecating forgive me 'sort of look upon the gentleman, and kept on his hurried run at the top of his wind and speed.

"The Emperor—for it was no other than he, and the gentleman knew it—very leisurely lifted his son from the mud; he had noticed the stranger's uniform or dress sufficiently for the purposes of inquiry, and, arriving at the winter palace, he sent for the general of the division, and somewhat sagrily directed that an attempt should be made to identify the party. The general told his Imperial Majesty that he already knew of the circumstance; that a certain officer (naming him) had only an hour ago waited on him and had delivered up his sword, pending his Majesty's disposal of it, explaining the matter thus, namely, that at the moment he was hastening to fetch an English physician to his wife, who, owing to some unforeseen accident in labor, was thought to be dying. The danger was happily averted, partly, perhaps, by his promptitude. Both child and mother were safe, and satisfied that it was so, he had taken the earliest moment for submitting his sword and person to the pleasure of the Emperor.

"Nicholas heard the relation thoughtfully, and said: 'Ascertain if this be true; if in the slightest degree false, let the falsehood be told me at peril,' or words to that effect, signifying that he did not wish the effect of any appeal to him to be heightened by any extraneous and untruthful embellishments.

"After a few days the general or commandant (I forget which) reported to the Emperor that the account which had been given of the transaction was literally correct. To which the Emperor replied; 'I am glad my soldiers make good husbands; see that I am informed on what day the infant is to be christened.' I don't know whether I have got the exact word, but it was the tantamount ceremony of English baptism or admission into the Church. That officer I intend to be present, and I shall bring with me the Empress and my family.'

"And so he did, and joined in what, to a Russian, is the scene of a greater rejoicing than a marriage feast. And there and then Nicholas, Emperor of Russia, gave to a soldier, hardly a remove from the ranks, his sword again, drank to the health of the baby, and left behind him hearts burning to manifest their loyalty by their self-devotion, and wondering at the imperial condescension."

MR. BOURCICAULT'S SKETCHES OF EUROPEAN SOCIETY.

THE LONDON MERCHANT.

John Oakheart & Son are Baltic merchants. Young John entered his father's office as a clerk at sixty pounds a year, of which he paid his mother forty for his board, lodging and washing, and clothed himself with the odd twenty. Do not imagine that Mr. Oakheart's establishment required his assistance. The old gentleman desired to make his son feel independent—he was a man, he earned his own livelihood, and should feel that he supported himself. At 25 years of age young Oakheart marries, receiving with his wife a moderate sum of money. He wants to purchase a share in his father's business; they can not come to terms. Young John can make a better bargain with a rival house in the trade. The old man hesitates; he likes the sound of J. Oakheart & Son; but business is business. Had his son married a penniless girl the father would have given him what he now refuses to sell; but now business is business, and, as in calculation, he can't do it. So young John becomes chief partner in a rival firm to that which most one day be his, enters against the old man, whose only aim is to lay up wealth for his son.

Every day, at 4 o'clock, leaning against a particular corner in 'Change, stands the elder merchant, his hands deeply sunk into his dog's-eared pockets. A young city man approaches; they exchange a quiet, careless nod;

"Feel inclined to a discount for 1,200 at long date?"

"What names?" asked old John.

"My own. I will give 4 per cent."

"I should want more than that, as money goes—say 4½."

"The brokers only ask 4½," replies the young man.

"Then give it." And they separate with an indifferent nod. That was father and son.

Every Sunday young John and his wife dine at Russell Square, in the same house where old Oakheart has lived for thirty years. His name has been cleaned out of the brass plate on the door. This hence young John still looks upon and speaks of as his home. All the associations of his childhood are there—every piece of furniture is an old friend—every object is sacred in his eyes, from his own pictures, taken at four years old, with its chubby face and fat legs, to the smoke-dried print of Gen. Abercrombie. They form the architecture of that temple of his heart—his home.

After dinner the ladies have retired. The crimson curtains are comfortably closed. The crackling fire glows with satisfaction, and old John passes the bottle across to his son, for, if old John has a weakness, it is for tawny port.

"Jack, my boy," says he, "what do you want with £1200?" "Well, sir," replies young John, "there is a piece of ground next to my villa at Brixton, and they threaten to build upon it; if so, they will spoil our view. Emily," meaning his wife, "has often begged me to buy it and inclose it in our garden. Next Wednesday is her birthday, and I wish to gratify her with a surprise; but I have reconsidered the matter; I ought not to afford it; so I give it up."

"Quite right Jack," responded the old man, "it would have been a piece of extravagance"—and the subject drops.

Next Wednesday, on Emily's birthday, the old couple dine with the young folks, and just before dinner, old John takes his daughter-in-law aside, and places in her hands a parchment—it is the deed of the little plot of ground she coveted. He stops her thanks with a kiss and hurries away.

Ere the ladies retire from the table, Emily finds time to whisper the secret to her husband. And the father and son are alone. Watch the old man's eyes fixed on the fire, for he has detected this piece of affectionate treachery, and is almost ashamed of his act, because he does not know how to receive his son's thanks. In a few moments a deep, gentle feeling broods upon the young man's heart, he has no words—it is a prayer syllabled in emotions that make his lip tremble, he lays his hand upon his father's arm and their eyes meet.

Tut, Jack. Stuff pooh! sir, it must all come to you some day. God bless you, my boy, and make you as happy at my age as I am now. In silence the souls of those men embrace. But who is that seraph that gathers them beneath her outspread angel wings? I have seen her at the fireside fluttering like a dove from bosom to bosom, 'I have been her linking distant hearts, perfect by the whole world. She is the good genius of the Anglo-Saxon family. And her name his home.

Mr. Bourcicault has, in compliance with our request, enabled us to afford our readers the above beautiful family picture. It is only one of many similar graphic drawings from life with which his entertainments abound.

THE LIGHTS AND SHADES OF THE TURK.

Mohammed II employed an architect to erect a mosque. His purpose was, that the building should be as high as the mosque of Aya Sofiyah, the celebrated church, which, on taking Constantinople, he had converted into a mosque. The architect, however, reduced the height of the magnificent columns which were to decorate the new building, which columns were of great value. On being charged by the Sultan with this error, the architect excused himself by saying that he had reduced the columns two cubits each, to give the building more security in the event of one of those earthquakes not uncommon in Constantinople, and had thus made the mosque lower than Aya Sofiyah. The Sultan, however, not satisfied with the explanation, ordered the architect's hands to be struck off, which was instantly done.

The architect appeared on the following day with his family before the Judge, laid his complaint before the Sultan, and appealed to the sentence of the law.

The Judge immediately sent his officer to summon the Sultan before him. The conqueror, on receiving the citation, exclaimed:

"The command of the Prophet must be obeyed!" and putting on his mantle, and thrusting his mace into his belt, he went to the court of law.

After offering the usual salutation, the Sultan was about to seat himself, when the Cadi said:

"Sit not down, O Prince, but stand up with thine adversary, who has appealed to the law."

The architect then preferred his complaint:

"My lord, I am a perfect master-builder, and a skilful mathematician; but this man, because I made his mosque low, and cut down two of his columns, has mutilated me of both hands, which has ruined me, and deprived me of the means of supporting my family; it is thy part to pronounce the sentence of the law!"

The judge then addressed the Sultan,

"What, say'st, thou, prince! Hast thou caused this man's hands to be cut off innocently!"

The Sultan admitted the charge, but required the judge to pronounce the sentence of the law.

The judge, after having stated that if the architect required the law to be rigidly enforced, his—the Sultan's—hand should be cut off, as he had deprived the architect of the means of his livelihood, sentenced him to support him and his family.

The Sultan then offered to give the man a pension from the public treasury; but the judge declared that, as the Sultan himself had committed the offense, he must be at the expense, and ordered him to pay ten aspers a day. The Sultan immediately said:

"Let it be twenty aspers!"

The architect was fully satisfied, and the Sultan received a certificate of his entire acquittal.

The cadi then apologized to the monarch for treating him as an ordinary suitor; pleading the impartiality of the law, which required justice to be equally administered to all without distinction, and entreated the Sultan to seat himself on the sacred carpet.

"Effendi," said the Sultan, somewhat irritated, and drawing his mace from under his robe, "if thou had'st shown favor to me, saying to thyself, 'This is the Sultan,' and had'st wronged the architect, I would have broken thee to pieces with this mace!"

COOL, IF NOT COMFORTABLE.—On one occasion, when Lord Metcalfe was sitting after dinner with his secretary, in Jamaica, a shock of an earthquake was felt, so severe as to throw down the decanters on the table. Amidst the general alarm created by this convulsion of nature, Metcalfe remained unmoved. "My good fellow," he said calmly to his secretary, with the placid smile, which was seldom absent, still upon his face, "don't be alarmed, it is only an earthquake."

A windy orator in the New York Legislature, after a lengthy effort stopped for a drink of water.

"I rise," said Bloss, "to a point of order."

Every body started, in wonder what the point of order was.

"What is it?" said the speaker.

"I think, sir," said Bloss, "it is out of order for a wind-mill to go by water."

In the Paris Charivari one of the war illustrations is as follows: "A Highlander (the plumes and kilts are a godsend to the French artists) is standing sentinel at a most awful place of danger, namely, on the top of a terrible precipice, his back to the abyss, and his heels exactly at its edge. An inch's retreat and he will be smashed to atoms. A frightened spectator wants to warn him of his extreme peril. "Il n'y a pas de danger," remarks a friend; "ces soldats la ne reculent jamais." [There is no danger: these soldiers never step back."]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1855.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

The ninth session of this body began in Franklin, La., on the 17th and closed on the 23d inst., Bishop Andrew presiding. We have only time to announce a few items and the appointments of the preachers in this issue of the paper.

A more delightful Conference session, every way, we have never attended. The weather was good, the attendance good, and the good people of Franklin are an unsurpassed people in entertaining strangers as friends beloved. Their genial hospitality has left a grateful and lasting impress upon every preacher and layman who attended Conference. Preaching, daily and nightly, was kept up. A refreshing, soul-cheering religious interest was maintained and a revival left, going on, at adjournment. A revival at Conference seems to us one of the most proper things and most opportune. The preachers learn of each other the best method of altar-work and mutually cheer and emulate in revival songs and holy melodies. It fills their hearts, keeps their great work before them, and sends them away, baptised anew of the Spirit, to spread Scripture holiness over these lands. The presence of many excellent lay brethren, attending on the committees, was felt for good. To counsel they added practical wisdom; to fellowship a genuine and large Christian spirit. The strength of the Conference seemed doubled by them; its array and impression upon the community certainly was.

Dr. Taylor, of Chips, was with us, diffusing the influence of his own happy spirit abroad and enlarging us by making the antipodes our neighbors. His speech at the Missionary Anniversary, on Saturday night, was one of the events. His preaching forwarded the favorable impression he had made upon the people and preachers, and, what is more, forwarded the work of God.

During Conference many precious souls were brought from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God, and obtained an inheritance, we trust, among them that are sanctified. Mourners sought Jesus, weeping, and, to their light and comfort, as well as the awakening of sinners, were the pulpit exercises mainly directed.

The reports will show a healthy state of the Church interests. These next week.

PRIZE ESSAY.—The essays, drawn out by the prize offered by the Louisiana Conference, on Ministerial Support, have been submitted to the committee of award and award made. Dr. Young informs us that several were deemed worthy of publication. The one written by Rev. S. H. Browne, of Anderson district, S. C., was judged the best, and to the author the prize of $200 was awarded.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Starting from the station of the Opelousas Railroad at Algiers Monday morning, the 15th, about 8 o'clock, a goodly company of us, Conference-bound, reached Thibodeaux by 12½ P. M. I say about 8 o'clock, for, though the schedule gives that hour for starting, every watch pointed to an earlier figure. Some of our friends, who had set up nearly all night before, to be certain of taking the train, were left behind in consequence. The train moved off inexorably, as they came in sight. They complain of a want of accommodation in the officers about the station, who would give no satisfaction; answered questions gruffly; and, when charged that the train had not kept its own appointment, they, looking at their own time-pieces, were obliged to acknowledge it was so. I am sorry the traveling public, so soon and justly, have to complain of this road's management. This is not the first I have heard.

On we rolled, upon solid rails and well cushioned, springy cars. The country above Algiers, along the river, cannot be inferior to that which supplies the commissariat of London, in its producing qualities. The gardens smiled broadly with cabbage heads. Seed-beds were laid off, in good promise of early spring vegetables. Such lands, so rich and level and on the line of transportation, ought to feed us in the city cheaper than they do.

This road requires no ditching or filling up for grade. Nature took stock in that job; it is as level as a floor. Some of her alluvial work is rather too fresh to bear the weight of a freight-train and the vehemence of a locomotive. It cannot be called terra firma. The Creoles better call it terre tremblante. Prairies, over which you think to fly along at forty miles an hour, are cautiously crept over. The iron horse is in danger of miring down.

These prairies spread out beautiful views. Not a tree, bush or shrub do they bear; only grass and flowers. When dry, their fires set the evening skies aglow. Woods, well grown and moss-hung, form borders and sharp outlines around them, evidently showing that these prairies were once—and that in the memory of the oldest tree—sheets of water, now known as bayous. By degrees, a surface of vegetable and earthy matter, beginning at their margins, overgrew and completely covered them. They shake or tremble, for acres around, when agitated. I am credibly informed that in some parts of this Attakapas region, where these formations are numerous, a spot of surface having been removed, or a hole dug down, water is reached in a body, and a baited hook thrown in draws out fish.

Somebody has said that the Mississippi delta was inhabited a hundred years too soon. Be that as it may, it seems impracticable ever to get a solid, fast road over this terra tremblante. Sands and shells are to be hauled from a distance and laid on. But the country penetrated is worthy of the enterprise—the sugar plantations. Already the road is paying, though it has only got as far as the Lafourche, which it crosses a few miles below Thibodeaux. A vast and wealthy country is yet to be reached and laid under tribute. The conductor told us that last month eight thousand dollars were cleared, beyond all expenses.

At Thibodeaux, our company was met by hospitable friends, who entertained them till morning. I took advantage of a private carriage and made part of the next day's journey that evening, spending the night with the lovely family of brother Littlejohn. By 11 A. M., Tuesday, we were on board the steamer plying from Lake Verret to Franklin. Shortly after, the stages arrived from Donaldsonville, delighting us with the faces of our left-behind-friends. Disappointed at getting on the cars, they took the mail steamer, Sparhawk, at New Orleans, on Monday morning, and having made as good time as we, boasted of a cheaper trip.

The little steamer reminded me of a mimnow navigating a bucket of water. The bayous and lakes seemed land-locked, and, not until we neared Berwick's Bay and entered the Teche, was I assured of communication by water with the outside world. Here we saw water crafts, with masts and sails, and capable of direct intercourse between this sugar-growing, molasses-distilling region and Northern ports. At Franklin is a regular port of entry. Cargoes of ice are unloaded here!

The day was quiet and not cold, and so our two Kentucky preachers were shown a longed-for sight—alligators lying full length on logs, basking in the sun. The phlegmatic lizards were little disturbed by the waves we set in motion—treating our small craft and our noise with marked contempt. By association of ideas, alligator tales were suggested. Some of the old Louisiana preachers were as familiar with them as chickens. One pronounced them cowards and quite weak, except in the jaws! You might take a large one by the fore leg and handle him! They are precious of their eyes and dread gouging as bad as an Irishman. Dogs are their favorite prey. The barking of one will readily gather a crowd, poking their muzzles up like snags, and we be to the dog when he takes water. A sagacious case was vouched for, along these bayous. A favorite hunting dog, intending to cross, would go above the point of intention, bark, gather the alligators, and then cut below and cross. This ruse, in order to get a clear coast, may be pardoned on the law of self-preservation; though it is a nut for the casuists to crack.

The Bayou Teche is a stream of equal breadth and regular banks. Coming down to the edge is the most fertile land I ever saw. Slightly sloping banks, shaded with live oaks and orange-evergreens, afford palatial residences, whitewashed negro quarters and sugar-houses.

Tuesday, 7 P. M., we reached Franklin and were met by the pastor, N. A. Cravens, and his aids, who soon had us all snugly at home—Conference preachers, local preachers and visiting laymen. My own good lot is to be quartered at the parsonage.

The ninth session of the Louisiana Conference opened in the Baptist church, Wednesday. Bishop Andrew, not being present, J. C. Keener was elected President, P. M. Goodwyn Secretary, L. A. Reed Assistant Secretary. Dr. Thweatt being absent, J. B. Walker, in his stead, preached the Conference sermon at 11 A. M. The congregations are good. There is a fine state of religious feeling in the community. The Conference found it so, and I hope will be instrumental in promoting it. The preachers are unusually prompt in attendance. The most of them are present, in good health. The year's work, I think upon report, will turn out prosperous. None of the preachers have died. Several of our best lay brethren are in attendance upon the Committee of the Whole. Bishop Andrew is expected tonight.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE REPORTS.

ON EDUCATION.

The committee on education beg leave to report the result of their deliberations, with regard to the memorial from the citizens of Auburn, on the subject of establishing a male college in that place, to be under the control of the Alabama Conference.

We have, in addition to an examination of the memorial, in which the reasons for locating a college at Auburn are clearly put forth, had an interview with a number of responsible citizens from that place, and received such assurances as have led us to recommend to the Conference the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That there should be a male college in the bounds of the Alabama Conference. Adopted.

2. Resolved, That, to place such college on a firm basis, it will be necessary to secure, in good subscriptions, the sum of $100,000. Adopted.

3. Resolved, That the Conference appoint a commission, consisting of two lay and one clerical member for each district of the Conference, who shall receive propositions for the location of a college within our bounds, until the 4th of June next, when they shall meet in Summerfield and fix the location of said institution.

SUMMERFIELD.

The committee on education, having had an interview with the President of the Board of Trustees of the Centenary Institute, are gratified at being able to report that there are in the male and female departments some two hundred pupils—a larger number than has ever been in the Institute, at this period of the collegiate term. All the departments are supplied with able instructors, who have, as they deserve, the entire confidence of the Board of Trustees.

The new building is under contract, soon to be completed, and will, when finished, not only greatly increase the educational facilities of the Institution, but make it without a parallel in architectural taste in the South. We therefore recommend to the Conference the re-appointment of Dr. Mitchell to the Presidency, and a renewal of energy, in behalf of the Institute, in both the male and female departments.

With regard to the subject referred to us in the communication of brothers Pitts and Dunklin, who have charge of the male department, we respectfully suggest that it is inexpedient, at present, for this Conference to have an agent in the field, for the purpose of collecting funds to erect a boarding-house for young men, believing, as we do, that the dormitory system is not the best plan to secure subordination or to promote morals.

Your committee would next call the attention of the Conference to the Macon Female Institute.

It occupies a most eligible position at Macon, Miss., one of the most prosperous towns in the eastern portion of that State, embracing a liberal, intelligent and rapidly-increasing population. It is well adapted to meet the educational wants of that section of the country, having a large and wealthy community from which to draw its patronage without coming in competition with any other institution under the control of our Church.

Affording ample facilities for the education of the daughters of our people in that section of the Conference, your committee are of opinion that it ought to be sustained, and would most respectfully recommend it to the favorable consideration of the Conference and of an enlightened Christian public.

Your committee would recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That Macon Female Institute is justly entitled to the favor and countenance of this Conference, and that we recommend it to the patronage of our people.

2. Resolved, That the election of the following Trustees be confirmed by the Conference: Rev. Wm. Vaughan, Rev. R. Y. Row, J. J. Beauchamp and B. F. Williams.

OAK BOWERY FEMALE COLLEGE.

Your committee are informed that Oak Bowery Female College is enjoying its usual prosperity. The Rev. Alex. Speer has resigned the Presidency and the Rev. G. W. Chatfield has been elected to succeed him.

He will open the next session with the assistance of an able and efficient corps of instructors.

Your committee are apprised that this institution has been and is still doing much for the cause of sanctified learning in its immediate vicinity.

Your committee would recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Conference will still extend its patronage and influence to Oak Bowery Female College, and that we cordially recommend it to public favor.

GLENVILLE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.

Your committee have had before them a communication from the citizens of Glenville, informing them that they are about erecting at that place a male school, of high grade, which they propose, in a short time, to offer to the Conference, with rent and elegant buildings, entirely free from debt.

They have engaged the services of Rev. Allen S. Andrews, a member of this Conference, who, in connection with Prof. Wm. M. Robbins, has opened the Institute with encouraging prospects and with a determination to make it an institution worthy of the patronage of the Church in that section of the State.

They solicit the patronage and influence of the Conference, only so far as it will not conflict with their obligations to other institutions under their control. In consideration of which, they very generously propose to give the Conference the privilege of five scholarships.

They also request that the Rev. A. S. Andrews be appointed to said Institute.

Your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That we heartily approve of the establishment of such an institution by the citizens of Glenville, and that we do most cordially recommend it to public favor.

2. Resolved, That the Bishop be requested to appoint the Rev. Allen S. Andrews to said Institute.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

One of the very first principles of political economy establishes the fact that a nation's prosperity and independence are commensurate, in a great degree, with the ability it has for self-support. A thoroughly commercial or an exclusively manufacturing country may be flourishing and prosperous, but the period of its prosperity is always indefinite. So soon as it is deprived of that foreign support which has sustained its commercial and manufacturing interests, and it is thrown back upon its own resources, a greater or less degree of suffering and business prostration is inevitable. A nation, wholly agricultural, is more independent than either a commercial or manufacturing one; but no nation is so free and firm, nor gives such strong hostages to fortune, as that which contains within itself the means of supplying all its own wants, and from its own resources is capable of satisfying its own demands. These reasons, more largely laid down and strongly supported, have induced all writers on political economy to urge the absolute necessity to every nation of supporting its agricultural interests as well as its commercial, and fostering its manufactures as well as either. They have obtained in this country, from its very commencement, and with more than general force, inasmuch as the ability of this country to be self-dependent is greater than that of any other.

Providence itself seems to have ordained a new order of things on the Western Continent, and prepared the way for a commercial as well as political independence such as was never before realised. The broad and fertile fields of the Middle and Western States are adapted to the growth of corn, wheat and other cereal products to a greater extent and with less labor than any former granaries of the world. The Southern States have an equal adaptation to the growth of rice, cotton and sugar-cane. In the Northern States, where an ungenerous soil mocks the labors of the husbandman, and an ungenial climate makes the harvests small, nature has rendered fitting compensation by such facilities for manufacturing as no other portion of the country can claim. Thus it has naturally followed that the prairies of the West have waved with great harvests of corn; the fields of the South whitened beneath vast crops of cotton, and every mountain stream in New England been enslaved to the use of some manufacture. The North has built ships and the South and West have employed them. We have taken the grain of one section and the manufactures of the other and paid them back with our sugar and cotton and rice—each section offering in the exchange that which it could most easily supply.

But it has happened that while the grain of the West supplied not only all our own wants but also the deficiencies in Europe; and the Cotton of the South answered the demands of the world; and the commerce of the North surpassed even that of Great Britain, the manufactures of the country have not been sufficient to meet the home consumption. We have imported almost every article of luxury, together with a great many necessary articles, that might, just as well, have been made here. It is pleasant to learn that this state of affairs is gradually changing for the better, and that American manufactures are increasing, both in extent and excellence, so that some day every American want shall be met with an American supply. The cutlery that is made in N. England and New York has long enjoyed a high reputation for its excellence—surpassing, not only in use but ornament, the manufactures of Sheffield and Birmingham. The carpetings exhibited at the Great Exhibition, from Massachusetts, equaled in texture and design those that came from England and France. Within a few years Japan-ware has been made at home that surpassed that which came from Japan: and now we see that another step has been taken in the right direction by the manufacture of plated ware, which will shortly supersede any that can be imported. A fire near Boston has entered into business, and from the specimens exhibited in this city, at the store of Messrs. Henderson & Gaines, on Canal street, we feel assured that self-interest and good taste will combine to render their articles preferable to the English. The dies on which they are sunk are exceedingly clear, and the designs are most admirable and artistic. We saw several services, including every usual article, finished both on Britannia and German silver, that bore the closest scrutiny and comparison with the English ware. It is notable too, that, notwithstanding the allegation and fact that labor costs more here than in England, this American ware is from thirty to forty per cent. cheaper than any other. The tariff undoubtedly has something to do with this result; but the result is only in advocacy of the tariff, which enables us to make at home that which has always before been brought from abroad, and to sell it at thirty and forty per cent. less than the former price.

It is probable that a close examination of the proper statistics would show other advances in our manufacturing interests than those cited, for the country is improving and expanding with a strong and healthy growth. It is sufficient for our purpose, however, to mention these things already brought forward. They prove that, in the department hitherto least prosperous, an impulse has been received, which will, ere long, bring it to an equality with others, more advanced and prosperous, and render us a self-dependent, as well as independent, people. When that day arrives, it cannot be said, to our disgrace, that the United States export more of the necessaries of life and import more of the unnecessary articles than any other nation in the world: but we shall present to the world's gaze the grand proportions of a perfect and harmonious republic—self-reliant, self-sustained, self dependent and independent. Heaven speed that coming day!

COMPLETED AT LAST.—The Grand Gulf and Port Gibson Railroad, connecting the above places, and about seven miles in length, was opened to the public by the traveling of the locomotive and cars over it on the 7th inst. This road was incorporated and commenced in the year 1836, nineteen years since. Though its progress was interrupted for many years, we still live to congratulate the citizens of Grand Gulf and Claiborne county on its completion and successful operation.

SHIP MONARCH OF THE SEA.—The ship Monarch of the Sea, Captain Gardner, arrived in this port yesterday from Pensacola, and was brought up by the towboat Conqueror. The Monarch of the Sea measures 210 feet on deck, and 40 feet beam; her tonnage is 2,500, and she is capable of carrying 7,000 bales of cotton on 18½ feet water, and is rigged on Captain Howe's new plan. The Monarch has been for the last month at Pensacola testing the new dry dock for the U. S. Government, for which she received some $20,000. Captain Gardner states that his ship was taken out about three hundred feet on land in twenty-hours, by the new dock and railway, and replaced in about the same time.

DEPRECIATION IN REAL ESTATE.—At a sale by auction, on Saturday last, by George Palfrey, auctioneer, two lots of ground, situated on Nayades street, near First, Fourth District, were bid off at $850 each. The same lots were sold in April last at $960. They either sold for more than their value at that time or sold less than their worth on Saturday. The high rate of taxes is telling strongly against all unimproved property in every part of our city. Persons, desirous of investing and building, are seeking locations on the Jackson Railroad, out of the influence of high taxation.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—The following are the returns from the Charity Hospital for the week ending on Saturday, the 20th inst., at 12 P. M.:

Admitted	208	Died	44
Discharged	206

THE JACKSON MONUMENT.—The idea of a monument to General Jackson, which has been more or less agitated ever since the occasion of the old gentleman's famous interview with Pinkenham in this vicinity, and which has been regarded for many years, by a large class of our population, as at best a pleasing fancy, is at last beginning to assume tangibility. We mean what we say. There is no mistake about it. Observing a crowd in the center of Jackson Square yesterday morning, earnestly gazing at something invisible to us, we edged our way in, saw, and partook of the general amazement and gratification. For the curiosity of the crowd was to behold the Jackson Monument at last in process of erection; or at least the pedestal, which is a rather important part of it. There was no delusion about it as we were tempted at first to suppose. There they were—real, flesh-and-blood masons, laying actual bricks in unmistakable mortar; and there they were still, last evening, the pedestal having reached a height of three feet. We will not expose our readers to the risk of delusion or disappointment by stating what the calculations are as to the completion of the work; the beginning of the building of a monument being generally one thing, and the completion of another; in proof of which we refer to the one at Washington in honor of Washington, and in dishonor of the American people. It is enough for present gratification to know, that our Jackson Monument has at last been commenced. The work was begun on Tuesday evening.

THE ARTESIAN WELL.—The boring of the Artesian Well in Canal street progresses steadily, and has reached a depth of 240 feet. Yesterday, at the depth of 230 feet, another stratum of sand and shells was encountered. Mr. Reed showed us a basin full of the deposit brought up, consisting of curious little shells of different patterns, and fragments of larger shells, mixed up with blue sand. These shells are simple enough to look at, but excite special reverence when their unmistakable antiquity is considered.

A SAD MISTAKE.—Two years ago a young Englishman was arrested in Boston for passing counterfeit money, tried, convicted, and sentenced to the State's Prison. The money which he passed was a five dollar bill on the Weithem Bank, which was taken by the person receiving it to the Suffolk for deposit. The teller of the Suffolk pronounced it counterfeit, and wrote "counterfeit" across the face of it. On the trial, the mark of the teller was called to prove the bill counterfeit, and the teller's stamp went for evidence. About a month ago the bill, which had been safely kept in the District Attorney's office, accidentally fell into the hands of the former cashier of the bank, when he immediately pronounced it genuine. Whereupon the young Englishman was set at liberty, after a confinement in the States Prison of nearly two years. The question now is, who ought to pay the damages, the State or the Suffolk Bank?

M. C. Richards Weld, a London barrister, is preparing for publication a biography of his uncle Sir John Franklin, embracing his early naval career, which was chequered by many remarkable events, and his various Arctic explorations, with measures taken to search for his last unfortunate expedition.

The Chattanooga (Tenn.) Advertiser of the 10th inst. has the following: "Since Saturday night we have had incessant rain, and the long looked-for tide in the Tennessee will be forthcoming. There are at the present time 100,000 bales of cotton on the Tennessee River awaiting an opportunity to get to market."

COTTON.—The receipts of cotton by the river for the 24 hours ending at 6 o'clock last evening, were, from Nashville, by the America, 817 bales; from Memphis by the H. R. W. Hill, 4,964 bales: from Napoleon (Ark.) by the Leathers, 1,859 bales; from Yazoo City by the Elephant, 1,005 bales; from Bœuf River by the Naomi, 451 bales; from Nashville by the Trahue 91 bales; from Vicksburg by the Southern Belle, 3,001 bales; from White River (Ark.) by the National, 1,047 bales; from above Alexandria, Red River, by the R. M. Jones, 1,246 bales. Total, 15,381 bales.

STEAMBOAT COLLISION.—As the steamer Magnolia, hence for Vicksburg, when above Baton Rouge yesterday morning, came in collision with the steamer T. P. Leathers' bound down. The Magnolia struck the Leathers on her larboard bow, cutting her guards off close to the hull. It was quite foggy when the accident occurred.

The largest load this season was brought in yesterday by that magnificent boat the H. R. W. Hill from Memphis, consiting of 4,964 bales cotton; 46 hhds. tobacco, besides a lot of sundry merchandise.

A WILD MAN CAUGHT IN MAINE.—A Mr. J. W. Mollenl, who lives near Waldoboro', Maine, has actually captured a wild man. On first seeing him, Mr. Mollenl says:

"The little fellow turned a most imploring look upon me, and then uttered a sharp, shrill shriek, resembling the whistle of an engine. I took him to my house and tried to induce him to eat some meat, but failed in the attempt; I then offered him some water, of which he drank a small quantity. I next gave him some dried beech nuts which he cracked and ate readily. He is of the male species, about eighteen inches in height, and his limbs are in perfect proportion. With the exception of his face hands and feet he is covered with hair of a jet black hue. Whoever may wish to see this strange specimen of human nature can gratify their curiosity by calling at my house, in the eastern part of Waldoboro', near the Trowbridge Tavern. I give these facts to the public to see if there is any one who can account for this wonderful phenomenon."

On the afternoon of the 18th, a man named Southern went to sleep on the railroad track near Fredericksburg, Va., and was run over and killed by the next train.

PERSONALITIES IN LITERATURE.

When N. P. Willis wrote and published his "Pencillings by the Way," and "Dashes at Life with a Free Pencil," mentioning by name and particularly describing some of the notabilities he met in his travels, there was an immense amount of virtuous indignation expressed, in this country and Europe, that any man should have the hardihood to draw out of private life the individuals whom he met and give them a literary publicity. It was not that Mr Willis abused or denounced those whom he described, but that he described them at all. The broad doctrine was laid down and every where maintained that the private affairs of individuals did not afford a legitimate subject for comment in journals or books.

The change of sentiment that has taken place with regard to this matter is remarkable, though not easily accounted for. The swarm of writers that has arisen in this present day, ignoring scientific themes and the appropriate topics of literary exertion, have gone into private matters and commenced publishing descriptions of their friends, with racy anecdotes attached; accounts of their fathers, mothers, brethren, sisters and other relatives—digging them out of their graves, and, mindless of filial esteem and self-respect—gibbeting their memories before the world; giving portraits of those they had loved and copies of the letters they had received. The old command that nothing unkind should be spoken of the dead has been revoked or disregarded, and the feeling that used to consecrate in the minds of men any memory of past love and friendship, has been spurned as a foolish sentimentality. This state of affairs is not confined to masculine authors. The women come forward with bitterer pens and worse taste to defame and ridicule those most nearly and tenderly allied to them.

We regret that this state of affairs exists, but exist it does and grows worse daily. The Chevalier Wikoff publishes the history of his courtship, containing the letters he received, and thus seeks to injure one he professed to love and sought to wed. Barnum tries to interest the public by details of private affairs, so wrenched as to make himself always the superior of the individual named. Greeley, failing to be personal and sarcastic in his autobiography, takes occasion to play the jackal over his dead opponent, in the columns of the Tribune. Last and most notable of all, Fanny Fern, to avenge herself for some fancied neglect, writes a work that is, in the opinion of all readers, specially intended to vilify her own father and mother—her own brothers and sisters. The unanimous opinion of all, capable of forming an opinion, that the abuse is unmerited and undeserved, adds to the flagrancy of an act that is in itself almost criminal. We make special mention of this work of Fanny Fern's because it exceeds and surpasses every other personal publication we have ever read, and because the principle embodied in it is so entirely reprehensible. It matters not with what ability so ungracious a labor is performed. The more elaborate the execution the more it deserves condemnation, and they are neither good children nor good parents who do not censure it. One of the great commandments—the only commandment with a promise annexed—says: "Honor thy father and thy mother—that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." There is no qualification to this command. It is mandatory and imperative. The worthlessness of the parent can not be pleaded against its obeyance; and, to the credit of human nature, it must be said that filial love has rarely sought to profit by it. Jails, prisons, privations, ignominy, even personal dishonor, have been bravely met in the execution of that duty and the expression of that love a child is bound to bear towards its parent.

For the reasons adduced, we some time since took occasion to express our very unqualified condemnation of "Ruth Hall"—a condemnation we now desire to reiterate. Of the execution of the work we had nothing to say, as we had not read it; but the general character—the animus and intent, as described by those who had read it—convinced us that it deserved disapproval. For our condemnation a writer in the Louisville Daily Times takes us to task, and with much balderdash that we do not see fit to copy, asserts the immaculate nature of the work in question, and the unjustness of our opinion. The Times says:

"Assuming that Ruth Hall is a personal history, the wrongs that poor Ruth suffered are ample provocation for the rough manner in which her relatives are handled. On the other hand, suppose it to be a pure fiction (which is the more reasonable supposition) and even the New Orleans editor must admit that the characters—which he now makes out to be the relatives of the authoress—are legitimate. Will the cruel go so far in his horror of 'Woman's Rights' as to require a female writer to make all her characters retiring, domestic and bewitching?—

In order to convince the writer in the Times that his "more reasonable supposition" is untrue, we append the following advertisement from the Daily Bee published in Boston, where Mr. Willis and his daughter formerly resided:

A KEY TO RUTH HALL.—Such is the curiosity respecting this work, stimulated by the piquant advertisements of its enterprising publishers, that we hear inquiries on every hand as to the originals of the portraits. To gratify these "seekers after truth," we shall publish a "Key to Ruth Hall," unlocking the secrets of the book, and embracing a biography of Fanny Fern. It is from the pen of a lady, who is perfectly acquainted with the eventful life of this piquant authoress—who appreciates her talents, but does not defend her unsleeping upon relatives and acquaintances.

In order to convince our reviewer that his opinion is not common to the Press in this section of country, and that such personalities in literature as Fanny Fern has indulged in, are quite as strongly censured by others as by ourselves, we annex the portion of a criticism which appeared in the Bee of this city:

She is uncommonly spiteful to her cold-hearted father and dandyfied brother. The last is unpleasant enough, but to a properly regulated mind there is something exceedingly repulsive in the cutting tone of contempt invariably adopted by Fanny Fern towards the author of her being. Who shall child a father's faults, if not his child? When a daughter undertakes to hold up to public execration him to whom the most potent tie of nature should bind her, the impression of heartlessness is unavoidable. We are apt to think that the sluggish and icy current that creeps through the veins of Ruth Hall's parent must have been transmitted to his offspring, and contributed to the extinction of every generous sentiment. It would be difficult to persuade us of the truth and nobility of any woman who gloats with undisguised satisfaction over the shortcomings and frailties of her own father.

Should further evidence in support of this view of "Ruth Hall" and its writer be required, we refer the reader to a beautiful poem addressed by N. P. Willis to his aged father, which we copied a few days ago from the Boston Transcript. Although it makes no direct allusion to the writer of "Ruth Hall," it is in itself a severe rebuke to the unnatural sentiment which could inspire an attack upon a parent. [Crescent.

WRECK OF A CLIPPER SHIP.—The clipper ship Ting-qua, from Shanghai, for New York, struck on the outer shoal of Cape Hatteras, on the night of the 12th instant, and was abandoned by the captain and crew twenty-four hours afterwards. When they left, the ship's stern was knocked off, and a part of her bottom out, and no chance of saving any of the cargo. The vessel was valued at $45,000, freight $20,000, and her cargo, consisting principally of silks and teas, at from $200,000 to $350,000.

The eye-snake, so called from a supposed habit it has of striking rattle in the eye when grasing, is, without exception, the most beautiful and least repulsive of snakes. It is about four feet long, of the brightest grass green—the intense green of an English meadow in early summer. It is very thin and graceful in its movements, and although very rapid in its evolutions, it is so instantaneously still when alarmed, and adapts itself so wonderfully to the shape and hue of the grass or reeds among which it moves, that although watching one intently at your very feet it is most difficult to discriminate between it and the vegetation with which it mingles.

Curious Habits of the Brown Sand Hill Crane.
(Grus Canadensis.)

Many of these noble birds still nest in this vicinity; but their number is small compared with the numerous flocks that a few years since might be seen holding their strange dances on some favorite knoll, or feeding, while their sentinels, judiciously posted, stood ready to give warning of any suspicious intruder.

Some are incredulous as to the dancing of cranes. It is true their movements are not as graceful as a Frenchman's, or their quadrilles quite à la mode, but dance they certainly do. As for their music, though lacking the harmony, it is about as loud and melodious as a fashionable opera air.

The Sandy Hill crane is omnivorous, devouring pretty much anything eaten by birds. The nest is a simple pile of rushes or grass, but on the top, built in some deep slough or pond. The eggs, two in number, are shaped much like those of the common turkey, of a light amber color, splashed with brown. The nest is usually surrounded with deep water, but the young birds swim readily, and leave it as soon as hatched. It is believed by many that they separate immediately upon leaving the nest, each of the old birds taking care of one: the supposition being that they would fight if allowed to remain together. In corroboration of this somewhat singular idea, I can only say, I never found two of the young birds in company, and a pair which I had caused a hen to hatch, fought from the time they left the shell till, in fact, they killed each other outright.

This bird is easily domesticated. I kept one for several years, who showed all the attachment and intelligence of a dog. He never forgot a friend or forgave an injury. If any one had abused him, it was of no avail to attempt disguise; he recognized his enemies in any dress, and by an angry croak warned them them to keep out of his reach. He was a great gormandizer, and was very fond, among other things, of field mice, many of which he destroyed, being quite expert at finding their nests, and searching out their inmates with his long bill. He would have been of service in the garden, were it not for his inquisitive propensities, which led him to pull up for examination every thing he saw sprout. Though a desire for knowledge might be very laudable, this mode of obtaining it met one disapprobation, and eventually caused his banishment.

Though a migratory bird, he did not seem to suffer from cold in the winter, and being fond of wading, even kept a place in a neighboring slough free from ice till late in the season, by trampling about in it. I provided him with a warm house, but he preferred to sleep with the cows. He always slept beside one of them, letting flat on his breast, with his legs folded under him, and his head and long neck turned back between his wings. He was on good terms with all the cattle, and might frequently be seen playing with them; his part of the performance consisting in springing up, flapping his wings and whooping tremendously. This was precisely the same as the dancing of his wild brethren. He would also dance to the waving of a handkerchief; and on windy washing days sometimes for hours at a time to the clothes on the line. When much enraged, he would stand with head and bill pointed directly upward and utter a harsh, croaking sound, quite unlike his usual whoop.

A young crane makes no despicable article of food. The old ones, I should suppose, would be rather tough and smaky; but an old Indian hanter of my acquaintance says: "A turkey is not half as good eating."

Audubon supposed this to be only the young of the white crane, but he was wrong. The white crane (Grus Americana) is more of a southern bird, and exceedingly rare here. I saw a pair flying over this fall for the first time. These two species are among the largest natives of our North American birds.

THE GROVE, Illinois, November 15, 1854.

THE PROPOSED INCREASE OF THE NAVY.—Secretary Davis in his letter to the Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, recommending the building of seven sloops-of-war, says:

"The five steam-frigates (now building) as well as the Sabine and Franklin, much improved by the additional experience in charge of them, can each carry a battery of fifty guns, which the Department designs shall be of the largest caliber and most approved plan. Vessels of this formidable character, however, are of great draught and require a depth of water of more than twenty feet. We have many important harbors along the coast which they could not enter either for defense or refuge. They could not pass over the bars of Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, and other important ports of North and South. The experience of other nations in recent events in naval warfare demonstrate the great value, and, indeed, in numerous emergencies, the superior advantages of well armed vessels of a lighter draught.

"We have on hand at the different navy yards several frames for sloops of war, of well-seasoned timber. I recommend that Congress authorize the construction of seven steam sloops of war, of less than eighteen feet draught of water. I propose that they carry an armament each of about 20 or 22 guns of heavy caliber.

"My opinion is that the advantages of steam are great as to justify the policy of making them steam sloops, although I am far from abandoning the sailing vessel. These will be very formidable, especially when beating the heavy guns proposed. Their cost will be about one-half of the same number of steam frigates.

"If any suppose this is a large increase, allow me to say that I am advised by the chief of the Bureau of Construction, &c., that about the same number will, from the decay incident to age, have to be dropped from the list by the time those proposed can be completed.

ASTRONOMICAL DISCOVERY.—The universally accredited theory that the moon is uninhabited, because she has no atmosphere, has received, from a recent discovery, a blow that will unsettle it at least. That the moon as far as we have yet been able to examine her has no atmosphere, or at least none of sufficient density to confirm to our optical laws and the demands of animal life known to us, is unquestionable. But this must be positively affirmed of only one side of our satellite, for, as will be remembered, although she revolves upon her axis, she constantly presents but one side to the earth. How it has been discovered by calculation and demonstrated as geometrical fact, that the moon's center of gravity is eight miles nearer to us than her center of figure, through which, of course, her axis of rotation must pass, or, in other words, this side of the moon is eight miles higher than the other. If, therefore, we suppose the inhabitants on an atmosphere such as ours, it will be of such extreme rarity on the only side exposed to us that observations that for optical effect and animal life, it will not exist. For mountains upon the earth, none of which are over five miles above the level of the sea, have become accessible to a height at which life could not be supported for any length of time, and still the mountains have stretched above the paralling traveler. What, then, must be the atmosphere at four times such an elevation? The conclusion seems inevitable that although the hither side of the moon is uninhabitable for want of an atmosphere, the remote side may be perfectly adapted to animal life. It is at least certain that the mere want of an atmosphere, as is no longer conclusive as to the habitableness of the planet that rules the night. It announces this discovery on the authority of one of our most eminent mathematicians and astronomers in the world. It will soon be formally declared in a scientific quarter. [Courier & Enquirer.

It is, perhaps, not improper to add that the discoverer of the above interesting fact in science is Prof. Pierce, of Harvard College.

General Intelligence.

We learn from Le Vigilant, published at Abbeyville, that on Sunday evening, the 14th, an affray occurred at the residence of M. Ventress, near that place between M. L. F. Creath, overseer of the plantation of M. Ventress, and a carpenter named Smith, in which the latter was killed with a knife or daggers. Creath was arrested, but it appearing that he had acted in self-defence was released on bail.

The Mobile papers of Tuesday last we find the following:

A man by the name of H. B. Stephens, a resident of Perry county, in this State, was robbed on board the steamer Fulton on Saturday night last, of about $900 in gold. On the arrival here of the boat on Sunday morning, Deputy Marshal Charpentier was informed of the fact, and in a few minutes arrested a man who resided in Mobile county, Ala., whose name we will not mention at present, and took him to the Guard-house. The amount of money last was found on him, and the purse and money identified by Stephens as his. The case was brought up in the Police Court this morning before the Mayor for examination, and the evidence was of such a nature that the accused was required to give a bond of $2000 to appear before the City Court.

Although not much noticed by our turf-loving citizens, it is no less true that some very fine young blooded mares in training and preparation at the Gas-combe Course. Among them are some who are bound to leave "their tracks on the sand" in more ways than one, if, as all races do, we believe, blood will tell.

A few evenings ago two negroes belonging to Mr. Wright, Esq., of Princess Anne county, Va., went to a tavern, obtained lodging, and retired to bed, where they were both found dead in the morning with no evidence of violence about them.

A shock of an earthquake was experienced at Hanover, N. H., and at Bradford and St. Johnsbury Vt., about 6 o'clock on the evening of the 16th. The shock lasted about half a minute, and was distinctly marked, causing considerable rattling among the windows and crockery at the places mentioned.

NAVAL.—The U. S. storeship Supply, Commander Sinclair, from Singapore for New York, passed the straits of Sunda on the 6th of November.

The U. S. sloop-of-war Jamestown, fitted out at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, will sail about the 1st of February, to join the squadron on the west coast of Africa.

Com. Thomas Crabb, who is assigned to the command of the African squadron, will go out in the Jamestown. On the arrival of the frigate Constitution, Com. Mayo will return home.

TO BE HUNG.—The Baton Rouge Advocate says the warrant for the execution of William Young, of New Orleans, for the murder of the child Christina Behm, on the 8th September last, has been signed by the Governor. The warrant orders the execution to take place within the limits of the parish prison, on Friday, the 23d of February next, between the hours of 10, A. M., and 12, M.

A fire in St. Louis a few days ago a lawyer's office in the immediate neighborhood of the burning building received through the windows a liberal share of the water intended for the flames, and after the fire had been extinguished the legal gentleman captured a catfish six inches long, swimming about the room and endeavoring to find a mud-hole in which to hide himself. So says the St. Louis Democrat, the paper which furnishes all the fish stories.

On the 15th inst. as the Chicago train was coming down to Alton, a laborer on the road jumped off the hindmost car, and falling upon a pile of stones, fractured his skull. In attempting to rise, he rolled down upon the track, and remained there in a state of insensibility until the following morning, when he was run over by the return train and killed. The body was found in the course of the day much crushed and mutilated.

On Saturday week, four persons, named Edward Dixon, Gilbert Mergno, Thopson Townsend and Hannah Brown, all colored persons, belonging to Newitzland, were drowned by the upsetting of a boat, in which they were proceeding to the Wasleship Patient Jane. These persons who were in the boat at the same time were saved.

George, a negro under sentence of death at Wells, Ohio for arson, hung himself in jail a few days since.

The St. Louis Republican of the 17th instant says that every sign of the late money panic has sometimes disappeared, and confidence is so completely restored, that the matter no longer furnishes subject for a paragraph.

There has been an unfortunate difficulty between the students and faculty of Davidson College N. C. which has resulted in the suspension of the energetic head of that institution for the present. The President of the Board of Trustees publishes a statement in relation to the matter, from which it would seem that the trouble grew out of the suspension of one of the undergraduates, whose recall was demanded by his brother students, because, as they said, his suspension was unjust.

A well dressed man attempted to drown himself the other day at Baton Rouge to escape the gallows, but was prevented by the police, who took him intoxicated. The Comet thinks it a very hard case that the world would not give the man a chance to live honestly and comfortably, or, yet permit him to die.

DETAILS OF FOREIGN NEWS.

BY THE "STEAMSHIP CANADA.

The Siege of Sebastopol.

By the arrival of the Baltic at New York, we had telegraphic intelligence from Sebastopol to the 20th. The mails brought by the Canada bring the news from that port down to the 26th. The following is a brief journal of the progress of the siege:

December 12.—Weather freely. False alarm at seven o'clock in the morning. The Russians are said to be gathering and threatening the British right flank at Inkermann. The British continue to construct strong redoubts there. During the day the Russians conveyed a convoy into Sebastopol.

December 13.—A general alarm at 1 o'clock A. M. Heavy firing heard along the French lines. An attack on the British was repulsed in three-quarters of an hour.

December 16.—Severe fighting in the night. A sortie was repulsed by the French.

December 19.—Nothing important. General Adams died of his wounds.

December 21.—[Official from General Canrobert.]—At 2 A. M., the Russians, after having made a sortie on the left parallel of the British, who vigorously repulsed them, made a demonstration upon the center and left of the French works. Received by a heavy fire, the Russians withdrew, pursued by the French at the point of the bayonet. Their loss is considerable.

December 22.—The Paris Moniteur publishes an official dispatch from General Canrobert that, notwithstanding the bad weather the siege works continue, the French and British co-operating kindly. Scarcely a night passes without some point of the French lines being attacked by some, which generally cost the assailants dear. A corps of volunteers is organized to watch the approaches to the mill at night, also a corps of volunteer rifles. French redoubts to watch by day. The French works now extend to the bottom of the Quarantine Bay.

The enemy warmly dispute every inch, and the rock has to be hollowed out yet. The works advance steadily. A reconnoissance reports that there are only pickets on the bank of the Tschernaya, the main Russian army having moved probably toward Eupatoria. The officers of Sebastopol garrison are to have each month's service reckoned as a year. The Czar's sons Michael and Nicholas were to return to the Crimea on the 7th.

December 22.—Admiral Hamelin telegraphs that 8000 French had arrived in the camp between the 18th and 20th, besides others at Constantinople. The Admiral says:—Attempts at sorties take place every night, but the Russians are always vigorously repulsed. The French on the 22d had only 1400 wounded and 1300 sick. The army suffered from wet, not cold. A spurious dispatch from Odessa stated that General Liprandi on the 25th was abolished. Balaklava. A heavy snow-storm prevailed.

Dec 25.—General Canrobert writes: "We shall soon be able to take the offensive. We make good our losses more promptly and more solidly than the enemy can. We are full of confidence." The Allies on the 25th had to open fire. The plan of operation was said to be, that fire was to be continued without cessation for forty-eight hours, to be followed by a general assault from both French and British.

A letter from the Sultan, dated 25th Dec., orders Omar Pasha to go immediately to the Crimea, to concert measures with the allied generals.

Dec. 20.—Menschikoff telegraphs that between the 25th and 26th of December nothing remarkable had occurred, with the exception of two sorties on the 24th, in one of which eleven officers and thirty-three soldiers were taken prisoners, and a considerable number were killed.

In consequence of bad weather, the siege operations progressed but slowly. According to telegraphic dispatches from both armies, they were preparing for the assault on the South side of Sebastopol.

On December 28th, considerable Russian reinforcements reached Odessa. Admirals Dundas and Lyons and Boat are at present in command of the fleet.

Constantinople advices say that the siege works had advanced so far, that direct communications were provided between the garrison of Sebastopol and the Russian forces near Balaklava, to whom provisions could only be sent by roundabout paths along the coast. Although the works of attack were in a very forward state, the correspondent of the Press believes that nothing serious can be attempted against Sebastopol before the 15th of January.

The Paris Moniteur announces that the Turkish Government shows great diligence in providing supplies of ammunition and shipping repairs to the Allies.

ASIA.

Trebizond letters of the 5th, contain important news. The Russian army encamped at Bajasid, had advanced to Topak Kaleh, and some consternation prevailed at Trebizond, where the garrison was strong but badly organized.

December 23.—A strong Russian force attacked the redoubt at Kaleh. The garrison, aided by English officers and Polish Generals, repulsed the attack, but their situation is still precarious.

The Porte has sent commissioners to reorganize the army of Anatolia and Circassia.

The Russians have formed in various parts of Circassia corps of native militia with Russian officers.

Mouktee Pasha has been ordered to take the command-in-chief of the army, in Asia.

DIPLOMATIC INTELLIGENCE.

Respecting the conference at Vienna, the following transpires:

On the 28th of December, r. m. the Austrian, French and English Plenipotentiaries met in the apartments of the Earl of Westmoreland. They then drew up and signed a kind of protocol, or rather a minute, of the exact and precise interpretation which the Governments unanimously attach to the four points. The Austrian Minister then carried this document up stairs to an apartment where Prince Gortschakoff was in waiting, in company with Count Arnim and Baron Manteuffel, as the representatives of Prussia. In their presence, the Austrian Plenipotentiary communicated to Prince Gortschakoff those provisions of the Allied Powers, and asked him to state whether he was prepared to accept them without modification or reserve.

Prince Gortschakoff replied that his instructions did not go so far; his orders were only to negotiate respecting the four points, but he would send off a courier, and hoped to receive further instructions within three days. Our informant says that the terms proposed to Gortschakoff were neither hard nor humiliating. There was no mention of the razing of Sebastopol, nor of the reduction of the Russian fleet in the Black Sea. Gortschakoff requested fourteen days delay to obtain instructions from St. Petersburg, which was granted; consequently, it will be a fortnight ere any thing is decided. Hostilities will continue in the meantime. It is said that the Russian interpretation is other but little from that of the Allies, thereby affording a chance, although a slight one, for peace.

Private correspondence says that the Prussian note of Dec. 19, sent to London and Paris, states that Prussia has examined the treaty made by the envoys in the three separate conferences on the 15th. Prussia sees with satisfaction that the protocols of Vienna, and the four points, are respected therein, and Prussia, although she did not take part in the exchange of notes on the 8th of August, gives her moral support. Consequently Prussia is still in diplomatic concert with the Allied Powers, and has even engaged under certain eventualities, to military cooperation. Prussia is therefore disposed to join in new stipulations of a pacific tendency. Prussia adheres to the general scope of the treaty of Dec. 2, and is willing to reconcile an analogous arrangement, but an exact and precise determination of the meaning of the guarantees, will be the pivot on which all Prussia's diplomatic measures will turn.

It is generally stated that a treaty is actually signed between France and Austria, and that France guarantees to Austria the possession of her Italian provinces. The London times however, discredits the existence of any such treaty.

Austria has called upon Prussia to place her army on a war-footing, but the Prussian semi-official journals say that Prussia will not assent to this.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The London Times has created considerable excitement in England, by advocating in the boldest terms the removal of Lord Raglan from his command in the East, on the ground of incompetency. The Times is also vigorously writing down the Ministry, and points to the Marquis of Dalhousie, the present Governor of India as the only man capable of the position of Minister of War.

The Queen has written an autograph letter sympathizing with her wounded soldiers.

Barthelemy, a French refugee, has been sentenced to death in London for the murder of his wife's father.

The returns of the Board of Trade for the month ending December 8th, show a decrease in exports amounting to nearly two millions sterling.

Messrs. Morewood & Rogers iron merchants of London, have failed for upward of one hundred and eighty thousand pounds sterling. Their assets are said to be large.

The motion to set aside the adjudication of Edward Oliver's bankruptcy has been further adjourned.

FRANCE.

Subscription to the new loan were opened on the 24 of January, and a good business was done. Considerable gold came from England.

The French Baltic fleet is ordered to re-assemble at Brest and Cherbourg. Business was very active during Christmas week in Paris. Accounts from the industrial districts were most satisfactory. There were immense demands for space in the Crystal Palace, and a new gallery was ordered to the buildings. The Emperor Napoleon and the Empress Eugenie notify that they will not accept any present from the French Exhibition.

RUSSIA.

An imperial manifesto was issued December 26th, calling on the nation to make every sacrifice for war. An additional revenue is to be raised on salt and tobacco. The export of furs from Poland is forbidden.

Important changes are being made among the higher officers of the Russian army. General De Berg has been appointed Commandant of Finland. A general classification of the military authorities of the Baltic provinces has been ordered to take place at St. Petersburg.

GERMANY.

The Diet of Saxony was closed on the 20th ult., by a brief speech from the Throne.

The Bavarian army is now on a war-footing.

The Prussian Government and the Zollverein have forbidden the exportation of horses.

The Prussian Government has also issued a notice calling attention to the law forbidding Prussians to enlist in any foreign service.

The offer of the cession of Austrian railways to French capitalists, for a sum of $250,000,000, was definitely concluded on the 1st.

Eight Austrian batteries of eight guns each are to be supplied with iron cotton.

SWITZERLAND.

The new Ministry is thus composed: Mr. Ferrer President and Foreign Minister; Druey, Minister of Finance; Naeff, of the Post-office; Herase, Minister of War; Munzenger, of Commerce; Franscini, Minister of the Interior.

Mr Vay has presented a draft of a treaty with the United States to the Federal Council, and requested its ratification by the whole Federal Assembly. A private dispatch from Berne, on the 20th, says that the British Charge d'Affaires addressed an official demand to the Federal Council, for permission to enlist cadres. The Council is said to have replied only by a formal refusal, stating that Switzerland would maintain absolute neutrality in this great war. This is thought doubtful.

SPAIN.

The Spanish Government is said to look very coldly on the English proposals to enlist soldiers for the war. The Duke of Serillana succeeds Colorado as Minister of Finance.

ITALY.

Three shocks of an earthquake had been felt in Piedmont. At 3 o'clock in the morning on the 20th ult a labor riot broke out at Carrara, in consequence of which forty-six were placed in state of siege and all arms in the hands of the citizens were ordered to be delivered up within six hours after notice.

NAPLES, Dec. 22.—The weather has been exceedingly stormy for the last three weeks, and much damage has occurred to the shipping.

The "Immaculate Conception" was celebrated by a torchlight festival, and the Neapolitan army, while it lasted, was placed under special benediction.

LATEST TELEGRAPHIC.—Owing to threatened disturbances in Brescia and Verona, the theatres were ordered to be closed and public assemblies were prohibited.

Later from Texas by the Steamship Chas. Morgan.

The steamship Chas. Morgan, Capt. Lawless, arrived at a late hour Monday night, from Indianola via Galveston, bringing dates from the latter place to Sunday last.

The Galveston News of the 20th has the following item:

The dredging house on the Low Wood plantation of Messrs R. & D. Mills took fire night before last, (Thursday night,) and was entirely consumed, together with 500 or 600 hogsheads of sugar and 1200 barrels of molasses. The whole of which, we learn, is a total loss. The fire, we understand was accidental. The sugar mill, machinery, etc. is in a separate building, and was not injured. This is one of the heaviest losses by fire we have ever had to record in our State.

Several deaths from scarlet fever had occurred at Lockhart.

The Marshall Republican has the particulars of a bloody and fatal affray which occurred at a drinking house at Sugar Hill in Panola county, on the evening of the 24th ult. The affray was commenced by a quarrel between a man named Crain and one John Glass, the latter shooting an old man named Neary dead for interfering; while Neary's son was stooping over his father he was stabbed in the back by Simeon Glass, John's brother; young Neary then rose and rushed upon the murderer of his father, wrenched the pistol from his grasp, pursued him through the house into the yard, and killed him with a bowie knife. While this was taking place, Simeon Glass was shot dead by several of the crowd whom he had attacked with his knife. One man named Haywood, used a double-barrel gun, and probably fired the fatal shot. It was thought that young Neary could not recover from his wound.

FROM THE RIO GRANDE.

We have received Brownsville papers to the 6th inst., but they contain nothing of importance. We extract the following items:

During the past few months several lots of machinery have passed through this place into Mexico, and others are now here awaiting importation. This machinery is destined for the working of mines and factories in the Northern States of that Republic. This fact alone ought to give a new stimulus to enterprise and progress among our neighbors. With millions and millions of dollars invested in the country, the whole valley in its extent would be protected by a general law, and the whole affair would be placed on the greatest advantages.

Recently several large importations of goods have been made through the place into Mexico. The fact should teach a salutary lesson to our people. There is no necessity that New Orleans is in this instance, should supply the opening market. The rich mines of the Valley and also the staple abound richly, as has been repeatedly proved.

Texas is generally looked upon as a consuming and not a producing country. It is supposed that while millions of dollars worth of different manufactures and provisions are annually taken into the country, none is ever taken out of it. Such is not the case. The books of the Deputy Collector of Customs at the Portes exhibit a receipt of the handsome sum of twelve thousand dollars, from articles exported from Mexico into the United States, through Brownsville alone, and when we take into consideration the amounts received at the different other ports in the District, the port Point Isabel, the Aransas, Colorado, Rockport, Rio Grande City, Roma, Carrizo and Laredo the amount of duties received cannot, during the past year, have fallen short of $500,000.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

BY THE STEAMSHIP ORIZABA.

The Steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived from Vera Cruz yesterday morning, with dates from that city to the 22d and from the City of Mexico to the 17th inst.

Capt. Forbes reports that the American brig Prospero Alfonso, from this port, arrived at Vera Cruz on the 21st inst.

We copy from yesterday's Evening Picayune the following summary of the intelligence by Orizaba:

The papers before us give accounts of several successful attacks on bodies of revolutionists by Government troops.

Col. Echegaray announces that he arrived at Piedras Negras, at 3 P. M. on the 7th inst., and finding that a body of over 400 insurgents had just quitted the place, pursued them and routed them, killing and wounding many, and taking five prisoners and some horses and arms.

Col. Mejaza announces that he had attacked and put to flight the band of Augustin Nunez, killing two and taking their leader, Francisco Troyo, prisoner. Col. Jose Maria de la Cruz Vega announces that, on the 31st ult., a band led by Clemente Serrato was attacked by a detachment of the forces under his command, about five leagues from Purruandiro, that they were routed and Serrato captured; and that on the 8th he was shot.

In Oajaca the rebellion is said to have been put down. Col. Solis is reported to have routed a band at Atlo on the 5th inst., killing forty of them, and wounding many others, and capturing a 4-pounder piece.

In Guerrero, on the same day, at the Negoria Hill, another band was attacked and routed with considerable loss, and the capture of some ammunition.

The Mexican national schooner Rosario, an old unseaworthy vessel, was wrecked at Alvarado Bar, two female passengers losing their lives in the occasion.

The French brig-of-war Obligado had arrived at Tuxpinas, to inquire into the circumstance of the Raousset-Boulbon affair.

The commander, in the name of the French Emperor, thanked the Mexican authorities for the treatment the rebels had experienced. Gov. Arellano subsequently paid a visit to the commander on board of his vessel.

The formal taking possession of the Mesilla Valley by the United States authorities is officially announced in the Mexican papers.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATOR.

Both Houses met in the Hall of Representatives, when eighty-nine members of the House answered to their names and thirty Senators. Hon P. K Wagner nominated Hon John Slidell, and Hon. P. H. Rey nominated Hon John Moore of St Martin.

On his name being announced, Mr. Moore addressed the Senate and House of Representatives as follows:

Mr. President and Mr. Speaker—It this is intended as a mark of respect—if my friends wish to throw away their votes on a Democrat of the old school—of the Jeffersonian school—one who volunteered his services in defence of his country in 1812, who since 1832 has been a non-descript Whig, tried in the crucible over and over again, and found without dross, then let them use my name. I can have no objection. I intend it as a mark of respect merely, but I decline here most emphatically that I am not a candidate, never expect to be a candidate, and do not desire to be a candidate for this high office.

Mr Slidell received a majority of twenty-nine votes.

PAGE & BACON.—The St. Louis Intelligencer of the 15th instant, referring to the suspension of Page & Bacon, the bankers, says:

"We look for an early resumption by this house. The energy and exhaustless resources of Henry D Bacon will not brook things as they are. He was, we have reason to suppose, fairly taken by surprise by the events of last week.

"We hope to hear, and we expect to hear, though we have not a word from any one authorized to speak for him that Mr. Bacon will shortly open a banking house at New York, and that the three houses at San Francisco, New York and St Louis will continue to conduct, but within their own control, the immensely large and profitable business in gold shipments, which they have secured in California.

"It is supposed by many that if they had had this arrangement all along, and their business certainly justified it, the recent ill fate would not have befallen them."

The brig Ithi, twelve days later from St. Thomas arrived at Philadelphia on the 18th. She left in port the brig C. C. Billings for New York, the steamer Clyde, from New York and the U. States ship Falmouth for Le Seigle in two days. On the 30th she saw a large ship on the Spanish coast in latitude 40, longitude 7 50 with Lloyd's signals, and sails backed, but was unable to ascertain her name.

Non-arrival of the Pacific.

NEW YORK, Jan. 21, Evening.—The Collins steamship Pacific, now over eleven days out from Liverpool for this port, has not yet made her appearance. She will probably arrive in the morning, with one week's later intelligence from Europe.

An American weekly paper, under the proprietorship and management of Chas. L. Fleischmann, has been started in Paris. It is called "The American."

A German, his wife and one child, died a few days ago in St. Louis from asphyxia, produced by the fumes of charcoal which they had ignorantly left burning in the room when they went to bed. The remainder of the family, six children, escaped.

A destructive fire occurred in South Brooklyn on the morning of the 17th, consuming five stores in Court street belonging to Dr. S. P. Townsend. A most dastardly act occurred during the fire. A youth, who was protecting goods on the sidewalk, received a violent blow on the head from one of two Irishmen who were in company, and whose object was plunder. The poor boy was rendered almost insensible, but the villains got no other booty than a shawl, which the little fellow wore on his shoulders.

On the 17th a man named John Krouse was killed on the railroad about three miles from Pittsburgh. He had just stepped off the track from in front of the locomotive, and turned to escape the dog when the beam of the cow-catcher struck him and fractured his skull.

Adam Baker is under arrest in Philadelphia to answer a charge of having murdered his wife by administering poison to her in December last. He is in prison awaiting the result of a chemical analysis of the contents of deceased's stomach.

An explosion of gas took place on the night of the 17th inst. in a house of ill-fame in Boston, at No. 158 Endicott street, which blew out a portion of the brick wall of the building, smashed the windows, etc. Frances Craig, a young woman who was boarding there, was terribly, and probably fatally burned, and Matilda Pinteau, another girl, was thrown down stairs and badly injured.

NEGRO KILLED.—On Wednesday last, a negro man named Jesse, on the plantation of W. H. Thomas, in this county, was shot and killed by his overseer, Peter H. Goin in self-defence. The negro avowed he would not submit to a whipping from the overseer, and when Mr. Goin attempted it the negro cracked up a billet of wood in defence, when the overseer drew a pistol and shot him. Verdict of the Coroner's jury, "Justifiable homicide."—[Holmesville (Miss.) Independent, 13th.

QUEER MATRIMONIAL FREAK.—A letter from a citizen of Livingston county, Ky., to the Danville Tribune, relates the following bit of family history in that neighborhood:

A widow lady took an orphan boy to raise, quite small and when arrived at the age of eighteen she married him, she then being in her fiftieth year. They lived many years together happy as any couple. Ten years ago they took a notion to get a divorce. This fall the old lady died, being 76 years of age, and in seven weeks after the old man married the girl they had raised, he being 68 years old, and she 18.

DUELS AND DUELING.

We have received from B. M. Norman, No. 11 Camp street, a copy of a work, recently published in Boston by Messrs. Crosby, Nichols & Co., bearing the title of "Notes on Duels and Dueling: alphabetically arranged; with a Preliminary Historical Essay. By Lorenzo Sabine." It contains three hundred and eighty pages of matter, exclusively devoted to accounts of duels and essays on the subject.

The work is a very curious and very interesting one, but is by no means what it ought to be. The author evidently thinks that he is the first historian of the duello, and accordingly stretches his narrative from the time of the combat between David and Goliah down to a later moment than when Soulé shot the Marquis de Turgot. The author asserts that the fight between the Israelite and the Philistine was a regular and approved duel, waged by the former for the purpose of getting Saul's daughter in marriage, and quotes the language of the giant in corroboration. Goliah, according to the history of Samuel, said: "I defy the armies of Israel this day; give me a man, that we may fight together." He cites Josephus, also, who says that when David had accepted the offer of battle, and proposed weapons used in driving away dogs, Goliah asked, "Dost thou take me for a man, but a dog?" To which David very insultingly replied: "No, not for a dog, but for a creature worse than a dog." This rather early personal combat is attended with accounts of similar rencounters between Polynices and Eteocles, Richard Cœur-de-Lion and Saladin, and other old-time gentlemen.

There is far more amusement in the volume than one would expect to find in such a work. The case of Major Millas and Fenton, in Ireland, in which the former gentleman was shot, is an illustration. The Judge, in summing up the evidence, said to the jury: "Gentlemen, it is my business to lay down the law to you, and I will. The law says the killing a man in a duel is murder, and I am bound to tell you it is murder; therefore, in the discharge of my duty; I tell you so; but I tell you at the same time, in future duel than this I never heard of in the whole course of my life!" Two physicians, by the names of Mead and Woodward, fought in England, and the latter slipping, his opponent exclaimed, "Take your life." To which the prostrate Galen replied, "Any thing but your physic." "Old Put," one of the heroes of our revolution, was very old also in his ideas of the code. He agreed to meet a British officer at a specified place and hour, without seconds. When the Briton required to the spot he was greeted by a shot from "Old Put," lying in perdu about thirty rods off. While "Put" was re-loading, the officer approached and asked, "What are you about to do? Is this the conduct of an American officer and man of honor?" "What am I about to do?" replied the General. "A pretty question to put to a man you intend to murder! I'm about to kill you, and if you don't beat a retreat in less time than it takes Old Heath to hang a tory, you are a gone dog." The officer fled. The old wolf-hunter accepted another challenge from a British officer. At the appointed time and spot the officer found him seated near a barrel—apparently of gunpowder—smoking a pipe. He asked the Englishman to sit on the other side of the barrel, and remarking that "there was an equal chance for both," set fire to the match. The officer retreated in a hurry, when Old Put laughed at him, saying, "You are just as brave a man as I took you to be; this is nothing but a barrel of onions, to try you by; but you don't like the smell."

The work contains the history of many fights, however, that were more tragic than comic, and chiefly those of this country. It is very full in particulars concerning the Hamilton and Burr, Cilley and Graves, and Clay and Randolph duels. But it omits many others more desperate than these, and one be considered only a superficial affair. The author has omitted more than one half of the fights that have occurred in the South-west, and given very imperfect accounts of those alluded to; only thirteen are mentioned as having taken place in this city. Of all those fought in this country a large proportion have been between gentlemen connected with newspapers, which shows that they have the shedding of blood as well as of ink to attend to. We say it omits mention of some of the most notable duels in this section, and whoever peruses the work, will find many corroborations of our statement, suggested by his own memory.

A new edition is spoken of as probable, and we would advise the author, before it is issued, to read the very able "History of Duelling," in two volumes, written by Dr. J. G. Milligna, and published by Beatley, of London, in 1841. That work is exceedingly complete in its details, and very valuable to those interested in such literature. The latest of Mr. Sabine's compilation is not very evident, unless it be the result of idleness and a fancy for that which is out of the usual current of affairs. He neither approves nor condemns dueling, but treats it as a statistician, leaving every reader free to form his own opinion. The Irish code of honor, as established and written out at Galway, is given together with the enactments of different State Legislatures on the subject of dueling. Most of them pronounce it murder if one party is shot, and all of them prohibit it under severe penalties.

We shall pursue the course of Mr. Sabine so far as the expression of an opinion as to the abstract right and propriety of single combats is concerned. As there are cases where killing is justifiable—in self-defense or the defense of others—so there may be cases where no resort for the redress of injuries is open but that of the duel. We abide by our former opinion, however, that so long as the enactments on our statute book prohibit these meetings, the enactments should be obeyed, and every judge should follow the course of Judge Fletcher in laying down the law: "The law says the killing a man in a duel is murder, and I am bound to tell you it is murder; therefore, in the discharge of my duty, I tell you so." If there are extenuating circumstances let them be adduced in behalf of a pardon. [Crescent.

PETRIFIED HUMAN BODIES.—A few days since the body of Mrs. Loy, wife of George P. Loy, who died twenty-four years ago, and was buried some three miles from Dayton, Ohio, was disinterred, to be removed to a cemetery. Both the coffin and the body, to the surprise of all present, were found to be in an excellent state of preservation. The Dayton Enquirer says:

The shroud, and indeed all the covering which was upon the body at the time of interment, twenty-four years ago, had disappeared—not a vestige of them remained. The body was perfect, except the right leg, from the knee to the ankle joint, where the flesh seemed to have wasted away, and lay at the bottom of the coffin in a substance resembling ashes mixed with sand. With the exception of decay the body and limbs exhibited the same perfect—nay it exterior they did when life and animation were in the body.

The body, indeed had been petrified. It was by some strange quality of the earth, turned into stone of a drab, or, more properly speaking, flesh color; and the object of the artist might imitate, but could not make so close a resemblance to the "human form divine." The smile which lighted up her countenance at the moment when death gently untied the cord which bound the soul to clay, still seemed to linger upon the face of stone.

The grave of the grand-child of Mr Loy was next entered, and the coffin exhumed. It was also found to be heavy and when opened, the corpse presented much the same appearance as that of Mrs Loy. It was not as perfect, however, although petrified.

THE LAST SAVED.

Several years ago, says the New York Evangelist, we were crossing the Atlantic Ocean. One afternoon the passengers were sitting in the cabin, when we heard a cry, the most fearful that ever rings through the ship. "A man overboard!" We flew to the deck, and there saw struggling in the water, a cabin boy, who a few moments before had gone out on the bowsprit to bring a seaman's clothes, and had been swept off by a powerful wave. He saw it coming and tried to hold on, but his arms were too weak for a mighty billow. The wind was blowing almost a gale, the sea ran high, and the waves were roaring. At the ship flew before the blast, the boy was every instant drifting farther from us. The scene at this moment baffles description. The whole ship's company, four hundred persons, were gathered on deck; women crying, and all in consternation, that they could not, instantly snatch him from a watery grave. The voice of the captain rang through the ship, ordering the boats to be put down, and the ship to be put about. The mate and a couple of stout sailors sprang into the boat, and it was lowered away. In an instant she touched the sea, and with long and swift strokes of the oars the seamen drove her through the water. It was a pull for life.

The boy by this time had drifted perhaps a half mile astern. We saw him afar off, a mere speck upon the waters, now altogether lost to sight, and now tossed into view by a wave. The boat grew smaller in the distance. Rising and falling with the waves, it sometimes almost sunk out of view. Never shall we forget the anxiety with which we followed the boat. At length it seemed to approach the distant speck, a motion was made, as if the men were catching at something in the water, as if they were pulling something on board. And then the boat turned its head toward the ship. As yet we could not see distinctly whether the boy had been picked up or sunk. The boat came alongside and was hoisted up by the side of the ship, with the hearty pulls of almost all on board. We were not quite sure of the result, till we saw the mate step upon the deck, wrapping in his strong arms a cold, shivering, almost dead boy. Never did we experience such a feeling of relief as at that moment. A murmur of approbation and joy, though almost choked with tears, ran through the ship; a thrill like that which comes through heaven when a human soul, shipwrecked, and about to perish, is rescued and brought back to God!

Every man is somewhat in the situation of that boy struggling like a strong swimmer on the sea of life. And when one is saved from the billows which threaten to engulf him, there goes up from those on high, who are spectators of the scene, a shout like the sound of many waters!

ANCIENT BABYLON.

It will not be forgotten that the French Government, two or three years ago, sent three gentlemen to make scientific and artistic researches in Media, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia. One of them, M. Jules Oppert, has just returned to Paris, and it appears from his report that he and his colleagues thought it advisable to begin by confining themselves to the exploration of ancient Babylon. This task was of immense difficulty, and it was enhanced by the excessive heat of the sun, by privations of all kinds, and by the incessant hostility of the Arabs. After a while M. Oppert's two colleagues fell ill, so that all the labors of the expedition devolved on him. His first of all made excavations of the ruins of the famous suspended gardens of Babylon, which are now known by the name of the Hall of Amran-ibn-Alie, and he obtained in them a number of curious architectural and other objects, which are destined to be placed in the Louvre at Paris, and which will be described hereafter. He next, in obedience to the special orders of his government, took measures for ascertaining the precise extent of Babylon—a matter which the reader is aware has always been open to controversy. He has succeeded in making a series of minute surveys, and in drawing up detailed plans of the immense city. His opinion is that even the largest calculations as to its vast extent are not exaggerated; and he puts down that extent at the astounding figure of 500 square kilometres, French measure (the square kilometre is 1,196 square yards.) This is very nearly eighteen times the size of Paris. But of course it does not say that this enormous area was occupied, or any thing like it; it comprised within the walls huge tracts of cultivated lands and gardens, capable supplying the population with food in the event of a siege. M. Oppert has discovered the Babylonian and Assyrian measures, and by means of them has ascertained exactly what part of the city was inhabited, and what part was in fields and gardens. On the limits of the town, properly so called, stands as against the flourishing town of Hillah. This town, situated on the banks of the Euphrates, is built with bricks from the ruins, and many of the household utensils and personal ornaments of its inhabitants are taken from them also. Beyond this town is the vast fortress strength-ened by Nebuchadnezzar, and in the midst of it is the royal palace—itself almost as large as a town. M. Oppert says that he was also able to distinguish the ruins of the famous Tower of Babel—by far the most imposing, and stand on a site formerly called Borsippa, or the Tower of Languages. The royal town, situated on the two banks of the Euphrates, covers a space of thirty seven square kilometres, and contains most interesting ruins. Among them are those of the royal palace, the fortress, and the suspended gardens. In the collection of curiosities which M. Oppert has brought away with him is a plan, which he declares to date from the time of one of the Chaldean sovereigns named Nabonid, that is, some where about one thousand six hundred years before Jesus Christ; also a number of copies of cuneform inscriptions, which he has every reason to believe that he will be able to decipher.

ANECDOTE OF A NEWFOUNDLAND DOG.—A gentleman connected with the Newfoundland fishery was once possessed of a dog of singular fidelity and sagacity. On one occasion a boat and crew in his employ were in circumstances of considerable peril, just outside a line of breakers, which, owing to some change in the wind or weather, had, since the departure of the boat, rendered the return through them most hazardous. The spectators on shore were quite unable to render any assistance to their friends afloat. Much time had been spent, and the danger seemed to increase rather than to diminish. Our friend, the dog, looked on for a length of time, evidently aware of there being great cause for anxiety in the minds of those around. Presently, however, he took to the water and made his way through to the boat. The crew supposed he wished to join them, and made various attempts to induce him to come on board; but he would not go within their reach, and continued swimming about a short distance from them. After a while, and several comments on the peculiar conduct of the dog, one of the hands suddenly divined his apparent meaning. "Give him the end of a rope," he said, "that is what he wants." The rope was thrown—the dog seized the end in an instant, turned round, and made straight for the shore, where, a few minutes afterwards, boat and crew, thanks to their four-footed friend, were placed safe and undamaged. Was there reasoning here? Noacting with a view to an end, or a given motive? Or was it nothing but ordinary instinct? [The Zoologist.

VISIT OF THE OLD SOLDIERS TO THE TOMB OF WASHINGTON.—We have received from one of the Old Soldiers who accompanied the party to Mount Vernon on the 10th instant an interesting account of the visit to the tomb of Pater Patriæ:

About two hundred of the Veterans, headed by the President at their formation and several of the Vice Presidents, having marched in proper military order to the encamping ground, embarked in the Thomas Collyer, which had been chartered for the purpose, and which in a few minutes afterwards got under way for Mount Vernon. They arrived there about noon; but as no notice had been given to Mr. Washington of the intended visit, it became necessary to appoint a committee of five to precede the company from the wharf and give information of their approach. Col. John S. Williams, of this city, Col Baldwin, of New York, and Gen Leslie Combs and Col Todd, of Kentucky, formed the committee. On reaching the mansion they learned that Mr. Washington was absent; but Col Baldwin and his lady, who accompanied him, were acquaintances of the family, and, on announcing their presence, they were invited at once to the private parlor of Mrs. Washington. The moment Mrs. W. was made aware that a committee of the Old Soldiers were in waiting they were sent for to her parlor, and, after the chairman of the committee had been presented to her, and he had severally introduced his colleagues, she proceeded them with great urbanity, and ordered the rooms to be opened for their inspection. By this time the company from the boat had reached the lawn in front of the mansion; and, as many of the delegates were accompanied by their wives and daughters, they made an imposing show. Mr. Whitehurst, the daguerreotypist, had meanwhile paraded the party, and, having placed them in the position which he thought best for an effective picture, Mrs. Washington on the extreme right; on the left the old Soldiers and on their left the ladies of the party and several delegates from the "Sons of Veterans," in their picturesque costumes, and in a conspicuous position apart, for arranged his specimen and in a moment the several groups were portrayed to the life. After this they all moved in solemn silence to the tomb, where an appropriate prayer was addressed to the Throne of Grace by the Rev. Mr. Wroebrook. This was followed by several addresses, not the least eloquent or interesting of which was one by John Wilson, a delegate of the Six Nations. After these ceremonies the "Keys of the Bastile, the gift of Lafayette to Washington, was held up by Mrs. Washington to the admiring gaze of the assembly. The daguerreotypist then took a second impression of the company as they stood grouped around the grave; and thus the ceremonies ended.

Such a scene was never before witnessed, and it is hardly probable that a similar one will ever again be; for it will no doubt long dwell in the memory of every individual who formed a part of it, and they will all cherish a grateful feeling to the lady of the mansion for her kind and hospitable reception of them. CONGRESSIONAL.

WASHINGTON, Jan 15, 1855.

SENATE.—Mr. Weller submitted a resolution directing the Secretary of War to interrogate the senate what progress has been made by that Department in the defences at the harbor of San Francisco, Cal, and what is the present condition of said works. Agreed to.

The Senate considered and passed the joint resolution in relation to sending relief to the Arctic Expedition under command of Dr. Kane, and the bill to amend an act to establish a land district in the State of Florida to be called the District of Tampa.

The House bill, making appropriations for the transportation of the U. S. mail by ocean steamers and otherwise during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1855 was taken up and debated at some length by Messrs Reid, Mason, Clayton, Weller, Brown, Broadhead, Benjamin Toucey Gwin, Dixon, Hunter and Jones of Tennessee; after which it was indefinitely postponed.

The bill to amend and modify the judicial system of the United States was then taken up and debated; after which the Senate went into executive session, and after some time adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr Letcher brought to the attention of the House the fact that Wm P Chase petitioned an appropriation to answer certain questions propounded to him by the select committee heretofore appointed to inquire whether money has been offered to any member, or other illegal or improper means used for the purpose of securing the passage of the bill to extend the Colt patent for seven years, and also whether money has been offered to any member of either illegal or improper means used, to secure the passage or defeat of any bill through Congress, and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Letcher caused a report of the select committee to be read, which concluded with a resolution ranking the dissent to take action in the premises, with a view to compel Mr Chase to appear before them to give further testimony.

From the reading of a part of the printed testimony, it appears that Mr. Chase, in reply to a question by the committee, said that notwithstanding the rule requiring it to lay on the table one day; carried. Resolution adopted.

A report was introduced by Mr. Cullom to appoint a joint committee of both houses to examine the condition of the buildings of Franklin College.

Rule suspended with said resolution passed.

Mr Hatch, of St Helena, moved to take up the bill introduced at the last session to change article 8 of the Constitution; carried. The bill to the order of the day for Monday next.

Sundry unimportant bills were introduced.

An act passed the third reading to change the name of Mary Ellen Sir Whorter, daughter of Geo. C. McWhorter, to Anna Wallis McWhorter.

The House took up the resolution of the Senate appointing a committee, of the two houses to examine into the condition of the several railroad companies in which the State is a stockholder or has an interest; passed.

The committee consists of eight members, three in the Senate and five in the House.

House adjourned until Monday, at 11 o'clock A. M.

SHERIDAN AND HIS SON TOM.—Sheridan had a great distaste for any thing like metaphysical discussions, whereas Tom had taken a liking for them. Tom tried one day to discuss with his father the doctrine of "necessity." "Pray, my good father," said he, "did you ever do any thing in a state of perfect indifference; without motive, I mean, of some kind or other?"

Sheridan, who saw what was coming, and by no means relishing such subjects, even from Tom, or any one else, said: "Yes, certainly."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, indeed."

"What, total indifference—total, entire, thorough indifference?"

"Yes, total, entire, thorough indifference."

"My dear father tell me what is it that you can do with—mind—total, entire, thorough indifference?"

"Why, listen to you, Tom!" said Sheridan. This rebuff, as Tom told me, so disconcerted him that he had never forgotten it; nor had he ever again trembled his father with any of his metaphysics. [Moore's Memories.

A MISTAKE IN THE LINEN.—In a certain German town there was a tremendous furore about Jenny Lind; who, after driving the whole place mad, left it early one morning. The moment her carriage was outside the gates, a company of students, who had escorted it, rushed back to the inn, demanding to be shown Jenny's bed-chamber, and rushing up stairs into the room, tore up the sheets, and wore them as decorations. An hour or two afterward a bald old gentleman of amiable appearance, an Englishman, who was staying in the hotel, came to breakfast at the table d'hote, and was observed to be much disturbed in his mind, and terrified when a student approached him. At last he said, in low voice, to some gentleman near him at table: "You are English, I observe. Most extraordinary people, these German students; raving mad."

"Oh, no," said somebody, "only excitable, but very good fellows, and sensible."

"By heavens, sir!" returned the old gentleman, much decomposed, "then there's some thing political in it, and I em a marked man. I went out for a walk this morning, and, while I was gone, they burst into my bed-room, took away the sheets, and are now patrolling the town in all directions with bits of them in their button-holes."

RESCUE OF A CAPTIVE INDIAN GIRL.—The St. Paul Pioneer gives an account of the capture and inhuman treatment of a young Chippewa girl, by Sioux, into whose possession she fell, and her rescue from a horrible death by a white man. Last summer a hunting party of Chippewas encountered a small band of Sioux, who were out upon the war path. The former were defeated, and all except three, who made their escape, and the young girl, were massacred. The maidens endeavored also to make her escape, and jumping into a canoe, put out upon Otter Tail Lake. The pursuers followed and overtook her, when she threw herself into the water, and endeavored by diving and hiding in a cluster of weeds to elude them. The chief threw his tomahawk and wounded her badly in the side, and afterwards shamed her by a stroke upon the head with a paddle. The brave fellow resolved to retain her as his wife, and brought her to his wigwam, where he had already two wives. Their jealousy was aroused, and the young Chippewa girl was constantly maltreated. The squaws literally putting coals of fire upon her head and cutting her with knives. She resolved to commit suicide, but found it impossible. At this idea was not liked by her savage retainers, and they resolved to enjoy one of their ancient rites by burning the captive at the stake. This fact becoming known to Joseph Campbell, the Sioux interpreter he determined to effect her rescue, and going to the village found and carried off the girl, who was subsequently placed in the charge of the commanding officer at Fond du Lac, and after her wounds were healed conveyed to her kindred, and thence home to her band.

THE LEGION OF HONOR.—Napoleon used to say—"Of all the orders that have ever been created, either in ancient or modern times, there is not one which has been of such advantage to its founders as the Legion of Honor. It is my handi-work, and my masterpiece. No one, either now or in future days, can deny my right to the glory of founding it. I am indebted to it for half my victories." Napoleon stated what was perfectly true. The hope of obtaining the cross has been the parent of incredible acts of valor, many of which have still unknown to the world. Here is one, amongst others, which a chef detachment used to take particular delight in relating: In the course of the night which preceded the battle of Austerlitz one of my brigadiers was grand-duty, which with one of his comrades that he would gain the Cross of Honor the following day. In fact, in a brilliant charge against a superior force, he penetrated the enemy's squadrons, killed five of the enemy with his own hand, and carried off a standard. He was covered with blood, especially on his face, the only visible part of which was his eyes. As he was returning to his regiment the Emperor met him and said—"You have done enough for once, my friend. Go and get your wounds dressed." The brigadier wiping his face with the flag he had captured replied to the Emperor—"I am not wounded at all, sire. It is not my blood which you see, but that of your enemies." Napoleon, delighted at this answer, said—"I make you marshal des logis (quartermaster) and I confer upon you the Cross of Honor." The most singular circumstance in this affair is, that at the moment when the brigadier was thus recompensed the comrade with whom he had wagered his watch arrived, wounded by a pistol shot, which had been fired at him by a general officer, whom he had taken prisoner and whom he presented to the Emperor as another Cross of Honor! said Napoleon, laughing. "I things go on in this way I shall either have to suppress the order, or to decorate the whole of my army."

MEDITATIONS INVENTIVE.—The compound pummel, invented by lieutenant brooke, U S Navy is accomplished that, on inclining the bottom of the sea, the lead detaches itself from the line, but leaves a small iron bolt, which will bring up specimens of the bottom. Professor Bailey, of West Point, has examined by the microscope a specimen brought up from the depth of twelve thousand feet, and found it made up entirely of minute shells, without a particle of mud or gravel. [Washington Globe.

THE LANCASTER GUN A FAILURE.—A letter from the Crimea says:—"The Lancaster guns are a failure. Their power is enormous when the ball strikes the point at which it is aimed; but the gun rarely sends two balls in the same point, and as yet no means have been found to prevent this deviation. In an ordinary gun this defect would not be of importance; but the enormous expense of every ball fired from a Lancaster gun renders it impossible to indulge in my system by which only one ball in six reaches the object at which it is discharged."

Punch says the cloak of religion can sometimes be known by its fine nap during the sermon.

EXTRAORDINARY INSTANCE OF SELF-DESTRUCTION.—On Tuesday night, says an English paper a melancholy occurrence took place at the Eagle Furnaces West Bromwich. A man unknown to the workmen, who wore a dejected aspect, went to the above works on Tuesday, and without appearing to have any object, or making any remark to any of the workmen, sat down. After remaining seated a short time, he was desired to move out of the way by one of the men, and he changed his position without making any remark. A workman was engaged about sixteen yards from the spot where he sat, but being busy, did not notice him for ten minutes or so. Happening then to turn his head, he was astonished to see the unfortunate man lying on his face, under the ash grate of the furnace, with all his clothes off except his shirt and trousers, and lying near the spot. He lay, head first, under the grate; his back was raised and nearly touched the bars above. Beneath him the ground was covered with cinders, red hot, and the flame was so strong that he could hardly be discerned. The man laid hold of his leg and drew him out. He was searched all over, and presented a most deplorable spectacle, and was quite dead. It was perfectly evident he could not have fallen under the grate by accident, and it is difficult to conceive the tenacity with which he sought so fearful a death, as he must have crawled, as it were, into a roasting fire. None of the workmen who were near the place heard the deceased make any noise. At the inquest, one of the brothers of deceased stated that a few days before his death he was sent for to the house of deceased's master, and was informed that his brother had gone mad, having turned the chairs and tables over, and after pursuing one of his fellow-servants a considerable distance, had left. The jury returned a verdict that deceased had destroyed himself whilst in a fit of insanity.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

THE undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements for the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of a high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own, and the adjoining States the adoption of a plan, which we trust, will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. C. Thweatt, (well-known throughout the State as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South) has been engaged as President of the Institution. The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thwatt is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield having subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured, that no school can be found in the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning, as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages as far as health, society, etc, are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher Schools of the country—the particulars of which will be published hereafter. The first session of the School to commence on the 8th day of January, 1855.

Parents will please send on their daughters, as there are always advantages to be derived from an early commencement.

Board can be obtained for the present in respectable private families at moderate rates.

AYER'S

CHERRY PECTORAL

FOR THE CURE OF

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH,
CROUP, ASTHMA AND CONSUMPTION.

OF all the numerous medicines extant (and some of them valuable) for the cure of pulmonary complaints, nothing has ever been found which could compete in its effects with this preparation. Others cure sometimes, but at all times, and in all diseases of the lungs and throat where medicine can give relief, this will do it. It is pleasant to take, and perfectly safe in accordance with the directions. We do not advertise for the information of those who have tried it, but those who have not. Families that have known its value will not be without it, and by its timely use, they are secure from the dangerous consequences of Coughs and Colds, which neglected, ripen into fatal consumption.

The Diploma of the Massachusetts Institute was awarded to this preparation by the Board of Judges, in September, 1845; also, the Medals of the three great Institutes of Art in this country; also, the Diploma of the Ohio Institute, at Cincinnati, has been given to the CHERRY PECTORAL, by their government, in consideration of its extraordinary excellence and usefulness in curing affections of the Lungs and Throat.

Read the following opinion, founded on the long experience of the eminent Physician of the Port and City of ST. JOHNS, May 8, 1851.

Dr. J. C. AYER: Five years' trial of your Cherry Pectoral in my practice, has proven what I foresaw from its composition must be true, that it eradicates and cures the colds and coughs to which we, in this section, are peculiarly liable.

I think its equal has not yet been discovered, nor do I know how it better remedy can be made for the distempers of the Throat and Lungs.

DR. AYER: In the month of July last, I was attacked by a violent diarrhœa, in the mines of California. I returned to San Francisco, in hope of receiving benefit from a change of air and diet. My diarrhœa ceased, but was followed by a severe cough, and much soreness. I finally started for home, but received no benefit from the voyage. My cough continued to grow worse, and when I arrived in New York, I was at once marked by my acquaintances as a victim of consumption. I must confess that I saw no sufficient reason to doubt what my friends all believed. At this time I commenced taking your truly invaluable medicine, with little expectation of deriving any benefit from its use. You would not receive these lines did I not regard it my duty to state, to the afflicted, through you, that my health, in the space of eight months, is fully restored. I attribute it to the use of your CHERRY PECTORAL. Yours truly,

This Institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr. Mitchell: but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any Female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor Pitts, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary,) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order, that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in perfecting and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

B. J. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry, except a plain breastpin.

The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug5—6m26

Medical Card.

W. BODENHAMER, M. D., still continues to devote his whole attention to the Medical and Surgical treatment of Chronic Diseases, especially those of the Rectum and Urinary Organs, such as Fistula in Ano, Piles, etc. He will also treat the various Chronic Diseases of the Womb.

He may be seen and consulted in New Orleans at the St. Charles Hotel, from the 1st of December to the 1st of May; and in New York City at No. 37 Irving Place from the 10th of May till the 20th of November of each year.

[From Hall's Journal of Health, New York, September, 1851.]

W. BODENHAMER, M. D.—The card of this gentleman will be found below. Having known the Doctor for a number of years, and the singular success attending his peculiar practice in the diseases named in his card, I offer it as great pleasure to add our own testimony to that of the following, from one of the leading journals of Louisville, Ky.:

[From the Louisville Journal, May 30, 1854.]

Dr. W. Bodenhamer, a distinguished gentleman in his profession, from Louisville, Ky., has settled in our city and has rooms at the St. Nicholas Hotel, office No. 1 Irving Place. Dr. B. is well known throughout the South and West, for the successful and skillful treatment of all cases mentioned in his card. [N. Y. National Democrat May 23, 1854.]

It seems from the notice above that Dr Bodenhamer has established himself in the city of New York. We can not commend him too strongly to the people of New York city and of all that section of country. He has devoted about fifteen years in Louisville and New Orleans, to the treatment of the diseases named in his card, and we have always understood that, in the cure of these diseases, he is wholly without a rival anywhere. We know that he has treated not only hundreds but thousands of aggravated cases, and we are assured that, in every instance, he has succeeded in effecting a perfect cure, and that too without pain to the patient. He is a skillful physician, and one of the best of men. sept 23

VOICES OF PIETY.

BY REV. WM. H. SEAT.

O God of purity and love!
In Thee o'er may I find my all;
The ocean depths I long to prove,
Into thy blissful fulness fall.

Thou guide of worlds through boundless space,
Thou guide of angel armies blest,
Thou guide of Israel's chosen race,
O be my guide to endless rest.

O Thou! vast being's central Sun,
Whose light of worlds is but a ray,
O! shine along the course I run,
Resplendent shine, to cloudless day.

Thou being of essential bliss,
Thou source of joy to sainted souls,
Be thou on earth my happiness,
My glory, while duration rolls.

FAITH VENTURES NOTHING.

There is no risk, nothing ventured—not even the possibility of losing anything permanently valuable, by living a life of faith in Jesus Christ. The late Rev. Dr. Simeon, long a tutor in Hoxton College, after many years spent in the service of Christ, as he drew near to death, spoke with great disapprobation of the phrase used by good people —"Venturing on Christ." "When," said he, "I consider the infinite dignity and all-sufficiency of Christ, I am ashamed to talk of venturing on him. O, had I ten thousand souls, I would at this moment cast them all into his hands with the utmost confidence."

OUR PUBLISHING INTERESTS.

Mr. Editor:—During the last week, the Book Committee and Agents of the Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, held a meeting in Nashville, for the purpose of reviewing the operations of the Publishing House since the Session of the General Confsrence. This, of course, brought also into review the business of the Old Agency, as reported by the late Agent at the General Conference. The result of their investigations is embodied in the following Report, which I forward to you for publication in the New Orleans Christian Advocate. If its publishing shall have the effect of promoting harmony in all parts of the Connection, in regard to our publishing interest, great and permanent good will be the result. It is very desirable that all our Advocates should send forth no "uncertain sound" in reference to a matter so vital to the welfare of the Church, but that their powerful patronage should be secured in its behalf. We have a great work before us, and it cannot be accomplished without a united connectional effort—with that effort our undertakings will, by the divine blessings, be sure to prosper.

OPERATIONS OF THE PUBLISHING HOUSE.

At a recent meeting of the Book Committee and Agents of the Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the undersigned were appointed a Committee to address a circular to the friends of the Church, in reference to the operations of its fiscal Agents since the last General Conference. The appointment was based on the fact, that it had come to the knowledge of the Board, that strong dissatisfaction had been felt in various quarters, because the Agents had not met what were deemed just expectations in regard to the purchase of papers, granting credits to papers, and establishing of Depositories at various points. As these expectations were based upon the action of the General Conference, and that action, developed, upon what the General Conference thought to be the condition of our Book Interests at that time, we think it proper to recall attention to the actual stage of things, as presented to that body; hoping thereby to satisfy the minds of all concerned as to the propriety of the course pursued by our Agents since that time.

The following is the exhibit made by the former Agent to the last General Conference:

Also Assets as follows:

Payable Feb. 1, 1861	15,000 00
Payable Feb. 1, 1862	15,000 00	121,000 00
Total		390,006 12
To this is added—received a transfer of the Nashville, Richmond and Southern Christian Advocates—Presses, Types, Accounts, etc		20,000 00
Making a sum total of		$410,006 12
Present above all liabilities, which were to be placed in the hands of Messrs. Stevenson & Owen, Book agents.

In the face of these figures, and the action of the late General Conference, touching loans, purchases, etc., no wonder that expectations were indulged by our brethren in the sections referred to. But a careful analysis of the matter will demonstrate that our agents have done the best they could, under existing circumstances. To this we invite special attention.

From the apparent showing, just presented, must be deducted the following amounts:

1. The $70,000 received in cash by former Agent, from Carlton & Phillips; and also the $17,051 05 received from the Chartered Fund, it appears, had been merged by the Agent in the business of the Agency, and is to be found in the $118,177 68, reported as assets, over and above his liabilities; and, therefore, this amount, having been counted twice, must be deducted from the aggregate amount.....$87,051 05.

2. The $20,000 connected with the Advocates is vested in those presses, as heretofore, and is only available for those papers.....20,000 00

3d. Of the $64 737 39, old accounts received from Carlton & Phillips, notwithstanding the pressing applications of the Agents, only about $500 has been collected up to this time; still a large amount of it is good and ought to be paid.....04,237 39

4th. The Bonds on Carlton & Phillips are all on time: the first falling due February 1, 1855; and such has been the deranged condition of the monetary world since the Bonds came into the hands of the present Agents, that they cannot be disposed of but at a heavy discount, to which the Agents are unwilling to submit.....121,000 00

Which deducted from the aggregate amount, leaves.....$118,077 68

From this amount must be deducted the amount charged to Southern Commissioners, it being merely the amount which had been drawn from the Agent, to pay lawyers' fees and other expenses attendant upon conducting the suit, and should have been placed to the account of profit and loss.....10,285 16

Also, we are informed that the sum paid by the Louisville Depository, on account of the Expositor and Trus Issus, is counted among Assets in the Agent's report, but which should be placed to the account of profit and loss, and therefore deducted from the assets—say.....5,500 000—$21,785 16

This amount subtracted from the $118,677 68, leaves.....$96,892 52

From this amount deduct stock plates, etc., as per Agent's Report.....$47,090 99

Leaving in the hands of present Agents, after paying the acceptances and liabilities of former Agent.....$49,198 53

Since the General Conference the Agents have paid the following amounts, as per order of that body, to wit:

Paid Commissioners	$4,000 00
Paid lawyers' fees	4,000 00
Paid salaries and traveling expenses of Bishops	7,700 00	$15 700 00
Which amount deducted, leaves		$33,498 53

Not having had yet a settlement with the Book Agent at Cincinnati, as per decree of the Court, the foregoing sum $33,498 53, consisting of Notes, Accounts, and Cash, is the entire amount now in the hands of the Agents for the purpose of establishing a Publishing House at Nashville, making the loans and purchases, and establishing the Depositories provided for by the General Conference, and supplying the present demand for books.

Now, dear brethren, allow us to ask: Could the Agents, in this state of things, have made the loans and purchases expected, of themselves amounting to $31,000, and have established the Depositories desired, without abandoning altogether, at least for the present, the establishment, or even the commencement, of a Publishing House, as directed by the General Conference? Surely not.

We have been thus particular in our statement of facts, because we are fully persuaded that the dissatisfaction alluded to must have arisen from misapprehensions as to the available assets in the hands of the Agents.

Moreover, allow us to state, that such has been the pressure upon the Agents, they have, upon their own motion, determined to discontinue the Depository at Louisville, believing it best for the general interests to do so.

We assure brethren, that the Agents and every member of the Book Committee are disposed to do all they can, consistently, to meet the wishes of all concerned, and that the Agents and Book Committee agree as to the propriety of the course taken up to this time. We deeply regret the want of ability to meet the wishes of our brethren in every part of the work.

With this expose of the whole matter, may we not confidently hope that all parties will be content to wait till the Agents can see the way clear to meet their wishes; and that all sections of the work will unite to sustain the Agents in their great undertaking?

The Agents and Committee are deeply impressed with the importance of unity of action, in the whole Church, to sustain the cause in hand. And be assured, that the warm support of our brethren is valued above all price. Give them then your help, send in your orders for books, and send the money. And let brethren rally around their own papers and local interests, and sustain them till the Agents can come to their help. Our motto then shall be "everywhere—Our Church, the whole Church."

In addition, we beg leave to say, that a most judicious purchase has been made of a Publishing House, and that at a cost of about forty thousand dollars it will be fitted up for manufacturing and all other purposes of our publishing interest for the present—including sale-rooms, offices for Agents, Editors, etc. About twenty-two thousand dollars has been subscribed by the citizens of Nashville, and will soon be available; which, together with the cash on hand, and the Bonds, maturing, will enable the Agents to meet their liabilities for the premises, and make all necessary purchases of presses and other fixtures, to set the Publishing House in operation at an early day. The Agents have also secured gentlemen who are believed to be highly competent, to take charge of the mechanical departments of the establishment; the Agents and Editors are also at their posts, and the prospects of the future are encouraging. should the Church give the Agents a united and cordial support.

HOW TO MAKE SABBATH SCHOOLS INTERESTING.

Mr. Editor:—Will you allow, through the medium of your paper, a few remarks on the subject of Sabbath Schools. Though coming from the pen of a lady, yet being the result of long and earnest reflection, perhaps their publication may not be entirely in vain.

I have observed of late years, not only in our own city, but elsewhere, a growing indifference, an apparent want of real interest in the Sabbath Schools. They are irregularly and thinly attended, both by teachers and pupils and it is to be feared that many who attend are not influenced by proper motives. Perhaps a great cause of this want of interest is the monotony attendant upon them, year after year, the same old routine is pursued. There is no variety even in the hymns that are sung. "Come let us join our cheerful songs," "All hail the power of Jesus' name" and one or two others are sung week after week and year after year. Then the same catechisms and question books are brought into requisition with which many of the pupils have been familiar for years. There is no variety—nothing new to engage the minds of the children, and as we all know that novelty and variety are necessary to secure the youthful attention it certainly would not be amiss to introduce occasionally something new in order to secure their hearty co-operation in the good work.

A few years since our superintendent hit upon a plan which proved very successful in rousing the interest of the whole school. This plan was to give us a particular subject, proofs of which we were required to bring on the succeeding Sabbaths. By this means, our Sabbath afternoons, instead of being wasted in sleep, in frivolous conversation or trashy reading, were passed in searching the Scriptures. Our ambition was excited with the hope of being able to present the clearest proofs and thus, not only was our time more profitably spent, but we acquired a more thorough acquaintance with the Bible than we would have acquired by the ordinary routine of question books. Why cannot this plan be again adopted, or at least, tried?

Again, could not a greater variety of books be introduced with advantage? There might be found many excellent religious works finely adapted for the purpose, the Pilgrim's Progress, for instance. Another, also, in common use in Seminaries of learning as one of the text books of the senior class, the Evidences of Christianity. How few, comparatively, of our young people ever pursue the course prescribed for the Senior class and yet how necessary that all should have a clear and distinct understanding of those evidences.

There is a short and concise work on this subject by Bishop Pertons well suited to the more advanced classes.

Another idea has been suggested by seeing the Sunday School Visitor, that is distributed weekly, thrown carelessly aside without even a cursory perusal and perhaps never opened till called on to supply waste paper. Would it not be useful as well as interesting to question the school upon the contents of the paper of the preceding week? This would incite to its careful perusal, and there is certainly much matter in the Visitor well calculated to interest and impress the youthful mind.

One more remark. Excite a child's ambition, and you afford him—not the best, certainly, but the surest motive for exertion. Would not this be secured by an occasional celebration. By this, I do not mean the formal affairs usually denominated Sabbath School celebrations, but a regular examination, into the progress of the school. Let questions be asked, and answers required; let the younger portions repeat hymns and verses from the Bible, and let the more advanced give a short history, in their own words, of some important biblical character.

Perhaps my observations may appear to you trivial—perhaps I have attached undue value to the result of my own reflections. If so, I commit them to your tender mercies and leave their publication to your discretion.

THE MINISTRY AND THE PRESS.

The pastor errs egregiously who fails to give the due credit to the newspaper press as an agent of the evils he would correct, or an instrument of the good he would accomplish. The time has come when newspapers are almost universally read. The family that takes no newspaper is now the exception to the universal custom. And if companionship with a fellow infallibly leaves some impression on the mind, much more does the weekly visit of a friend, in the shape of a newspaper, beget a regard and confidence which give him incalculable power in leading the opinions and forming the character of those who welcome his regular arrival. Probably every minister can trace various erroneous and foolish notions, which meets in some of the families of his parochial charge, directly to the newspaper they take. If so, how plain it is that the proper preventive or corrector of such evils is a newspaper of a different character; and how can he act wisely, how can he act faithfully, if he do not do what he can to introduce such a needed antidote into such families?

FLORIDA CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor—This body met in Madison, Fla., on the 3d of January. Bishop Capers presiding. The Bishop was in fine health, and brought us through the business of the Conference in five days. The Florida Conference owes Bishop Capers a debt of gratitude. As a young Conference, we have had storms to go through, and Bishop Capers has been with us more than any other Bishop; his very soul has seemed stirred within him for our welfare. Our last was one of the most harmonious ever held in Florida; sunshine beamed upon our pathway.

We had some strong men transferred to our Conference at this session, who will doubtless do us honor and good work. There were also about eight new recruits received by the Conference, some of whom if they are faithful will make stars in our Conference.

Dr. Taylor was with us, and thrilled our hearts with an account of his labors in China. He also gave us a very interesting address on the night of the anniversary of our Missionary Society, presenting at the same time some fragments of China gods, broken by the insurgent army. We are much mistaken if the presence of Dr. Taylor among us does not increase our collections the coming year.

To conclude, after a struggle of ten years, we think that we may safely say, "Florida is ours!" We have only to go up and possess the land, for we are able.

Yours, &c., J. W. MILLS.

LATER FROM TEXAS

BY THE STEAMSHIP PERSEVERANCE.

The steamship Perseverance, Capt. Place, arrived on Saturday morning from Galveston, bringing dates to Thursday last.

The Galveston Ticket has an article in regard to the late visit of Miss Julia Dean, (Mrs. Hayne) to that city, stating that she treated a large audience with disrespect in not responding to its complimentary call at the close of the performance, and that she also broke her engagement with the theatre, playing but six out of the twelve nights stipulated.

The Gazette states that the New Orleans and Galveston steamers, on arriving at the latter city, will hereafter be governed by the following rules:

1. No one will be permitted on the levee with the allowed to board the vessel until the passengers and their baggage shall be landed.

2. No papers will be brought for distribution except a package for each of the city papers, the Tremont House and E. B. Nichols & Co., the agents.

3. Persons representing each daily paper will be allowed to go on board immediately on arrival, to get their appropriate files—friends of lady passengers will be allowed to go on board to receive them.

The Galveston News has the following letter from Sabine City, dated the 25th ult., from which it would seem they have had some very cold weather in Texas:

On Sunday, the 21st inst., two boys by the name of Lewis Kimbell and Amanda Hunt, nearly well, finding a skiff in Sawyer's Lake, bound at the time and returning at night or the next day their friends might be found on the shore anxiously awaiting their return. Early on Monday morning the citizens turned out in search of them, but without success. The Monday Weekly sloop, hands set out and searched the prairie and marsh for two or six miles around, and at night on the return of some of the party, the cannon was fired a quarter of an hour, several guns and rifles were fired and when about three hundred yards of their home, and proceeding about one hundred yards further, they found them both dead within a few feet of each other. It appeared that they had become bewildered and separated; that they could struggle no further, and getting into wet boggy ground, stopped to rest, and fell asleep to wake no more.

The editor of the Jefferson Herald returns thanks to thirty or forty ladies who made and presented him with a bed quilt.

A new steamer, the River Bird, built in New York for the local trade in China, made a very successful trip up the Pearl River. She ran twenty-six miles with a heavy tow on, in one hour and forty minutes, under easy steam. Her register is 800 tons.

CHRISTIANS SETTLED.

How necessary for Christians to be settled, established, strengthened in the doctrine of their faith. For this the apostle prayed: "The God of all grace establish, strengthen and settle you." If a Christian is not settled in the knowledge of the essentials of religion he will lose his former strictness and wander, from one opinion to another. The unsettled Christian belongs to the tribe of Reuben—"unstable as water." He is like a ship without ballast, overturned "by every wind of doctrine." Such professors are not pillars in the temple of God, but are reeds shaken by the wind. To be unsettled shows a want of judgment. If the head were not giddy it would not reel so fast from one opinion to another. It argues lightness; feathers will be blown every way, so will feathery Christians.

Now that Christians may be settled in the doctrine of evangelical faith, in these unsettled times, let them remember that the design of the Gospel preached, is to bring about a settlement in religion. The word preached is a hammer, every blow of which is to fasten the nail in the building. The word of the preacher is to fasten the believer to Christ. The word preached is not only to illuminate the mind and conscience, and put the believer in the way to heaven, but it is at the same time to keep the believer in the good way. Now if the Christian be not settled, the Gospel does not accomplish that for which it was sent.

The Christian that is settled is always possessed of zeal in the cause of Christ. He will labor for the Church. Settled Christians walk close with God. They have spiritual communion with the Father of Mercies. Those who are not settled in the doctrine of faith will never suffer for the truth of God. Sceptics in religion will never be martyrs. There are thousands in the Church of Christ who are hanging in doubtful suspense, ever consulting what is most advantageous for this world, but never that which is safest for the world to come. These unsettled believers will never suffer—for the truth; they are like the soldier that leaves his own flag and runs over to that of the enemy; they fight on the side of the devil for pay, but they will not work for God because rewards do not come in to their liking. They are not content to work in the vineyard of the Lord, and wait for an "eternal weight of glory."

The unsettled Christian can never thrive; can never grow in grace; no more than the plant that is being moved from one place to another. The Christian ought to be settled, because there are so many things to unsettle him, and make him fall away from the hope of the Gospel. There is persecution. The Gospel is a rose; it cannot be plucked without a prickle. The legacy which Christ has left to the Church is the cross. The Cross. And when shall the offense of the cross cease? Never. So long as there is a devil and a wicked man in the world we need not expect a charter of exemption from trouble. Oh! how many fall from grace because of persecution.

Pride is the cause of thousands of unsettled Christians. It is said that vessels overturn when the sails are too heavy; so the sails of many Christians become swelled with pride, and overturn and are lost amid the swelling tide of the ungodly world.

For the Church to be well settled she must be well grounded. "If ye continue grounded and settled." The Greek word for grounded alludes to a building that has its foundation well laid. So Christians should be well grounded in the essentials of religion. We should be grounded in the knowledge of those things that are necessary. We cannot worship God acceptably if we are ignorant of the rules and elements of religion. An acquaintance with these will much enrich the mind. This knowledge is the golden key to open the door to the chief mysteries of religion. It gives a whole system of divinity exactly drawn in all its lineaments. This knowledge is the holy seed of which grace is formed. "It is semen fidei—the seed of faith. "And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee." It is radix amoris—the root of love. "That ye being rooted and grounded in love." A tree that it may be well settled must be well rooted. So if the Christian be well settled in religion he must be well rooted in its principles. Those who wish to stand in shaking times, must have a principle of knowledge within—"first grounded and then settled."

THE FOUR NEW REGIMENTS.—A letter from Washington says: It is now deemed quite impossible to pass the bills for four new regiments and three thousand volunteers to chastise the Indians of the plains; but a new proposition is now maturing, with the approval of the Executive, which it is believed will find more favor. It is proposed to add to the military establishment two new regiments of infantry, and one battalion or regiment of 500 or 1000 mounted rangers. The rangers, if 1000 are raised, will be divided, one half of them going to the frontier of Texas and New Mexico, and the remainder going to the plains, where they will establish a line of posts along the route and route to Salt Creek, and between that and Fort Riley, and making a good military road.

The Washington Star thinks that the Kinney Expedition will never leave the shores of the United States, the principal obstacle being the fact that the Company has not funds to carry out its filibustering designs. The Star further says:

We learn on authority on which we place confidence that the officer in command of the British Squadron in the Caribbean sea, has been instructed by his Minister at this place, not to grant any portion of the proposed expedition from this country for an armed occupation of the Mosquito coast of Ireland on the shores of Central America. The British Minister has also called the attention of the Government to the matter, and the subject is now under consideration. Mr. Crampton looks upon the enterprise as involving an interference of the (so called) Mosquito King's territorial rights or rights of sovereignty. The instructions in question have been sent out by the last steamer from New York bound for San Juan del Norte.

Our Friday last, says the Macon (Ga.) Messenger of that date, a negro man named John was executed in the city jail, for the murder of Michael Sweeny, committed about a year ago. The negro was a runaway from Pulaski county, and Sweeney was killed whilst attempting to arrest him.

ANABAPTISM AND PROSELYTISM IN ALABAMA.

The Episcopal Minister at Marion, Ala., has recently re-baptized several persons, some of whom were first baptized by the Methodists and Presbyterians, then immersed by the Campbellites, and finally baptized by the successors of the Apostles. This looks like removing the ancient land-marks (or rather water-marks) entirely.

New method of proselyting:—During the Christmas holidays, the "rector" and some members of the Episcopal Church at D. were diligent in persuading some young Methodists to dance, and expressed the greatest delight when they succeeded, telling them if they were turned out of the M. E. Church, they might join the Episcopal.

On being repulsed by one of the lambs of the flock who said her mother had forbidden her to dance, the "successor of the Apostles," told her to tell her mother she was rather too prous.

On telling another young lady that he thought she was "none too good to dance," she very tartly replied, that she thought she was.

These items may be relied on, and need no comment.

FOLLOWER OF WESLEY.

NOTE BY EDITOR:—The first paragraph of our Correspondent, it is likely, alludes to the same event which the Southwestern Baptist treats as an avalanchification.

"Rev. Mr. Pinkerton, pastor of the Campbellite Church in Marion, Ala., together with four of the members, went over some ten days ago, to the High Church Episcopalians. Having been sprinkled in infancy, immersed at maturer age for the remission of sins, the climax was effectually finished with a final sprinkling, accompanied with episcopal crossing. This certainly was something more than a mere "slip" or a "slide" either, and may properly be termed avalanchification, since by the momentum of its power it swept in the same direction a member of the Baptist Church, and a colored man who had once been a Baptist, but, when caught by this avalanche, was a Pedobaptist. This was regarded, at the time, as an occurrence of some importance, but it has ceased to excite astonishment, and the town of Marion is still standing."

The Monroe (Ouachita parish) Register of the 24th ult says:

On Monday, the 22d ult., during the absence of the Receiver of Public Moneys to dinner, his office was entered and the iron safe in which the Government money is kept was opened and about $8,000 stolen therefrom. Every exertion is being made by the Receiver and others to detect the thief; but as yet no certain clue has been discovered. A reward of $2,000 has been offered for the detection of the thief and the recovery of the money, or $1000 for the recovery of the money alone.

A French brig of war, the Obligado, recently visited Guaymas, with a message from the Governor of Sonora to the Emperor Napoleon, expressing his entire disapprobation of the expedition of Raousset Boulbon in July last, and stating that the unfortunate circumstances attending it should in no manner disturb the friendly relations existing between the two countries; that, on the contrary, he felt under heavy obligations to the Mexican Government for their generous and humane treatment of the prisoners.

Large Fire in Vicksburg.

VICKSBURG, Feb. 5.—A destructive fire occurred here at about three o'clock this morning. It broke out in a building on Washington street, and before its ravages could be checked had destroyed the Parnna Saloon, Dillshanty's gunshop, Blerm's clothing store, Maddy's dentist office, and Helmer's clothing store, besides damaging Genulla's Saloon, Winston's clothing store, and other buildings in the neighborhood. The amount of loss has not yet been ascertained, but must be quite heavy, as there was no insurance of consequence on the property.

ARRIVAL OF STEAMSHIP CAHAWBA.

IMPORTANT FROM HAVANA.

The steamship Cahawba, Capt. Shufeldt, from New York, via Havana, crossed the bar at 2 P. M. on Tuesday, and fired her guns as signal of arrival shortly after 1 A. M. to-day. Our readers will readily understand that it was not until some time after this that we received our papers and intelligence by her.

The Cahawba left New York on the 25th ult., and arrived at Havana on the morning of the 31st. She resumed her voyage on the following morning, having been prevented from doing so earlier by a strong norther.

There was nothing new in Havana. A considerable number of visitors from the States are spending the winter in that city and other places on the island.

Soon after leaving the Moro, the Cahawba passed two English line-of-battle ships, standing into Havana. One of them bore the flag of a Rear Admiral of the White.

On the 27th ult., at 3 A. M., in latitude 34.54 north, longitude 74.16 west, in a severe gale of wind, the Cahawba shipped a very heavy sea, which carried away the starboard forward life-boat from the davits, but did no other damage.

Capt. Shufeldt reports that the ship Medora, in twenty days from Boston, arrived at Havana on the 31st ult.

The Diario de la Marina contains the following news from Spain:

Gen. O'Donnell lately, made a very impressive speech, which was well received, urging the necessity of raising 70,000 troops with which, in case of an emergency, to defend their fortifications at home or abroad.

Gottschalk, the celebrated Creole pianist, is producing a great sensation through the Island of Cuba. His reputation is deservedly great, and his concerts are numerously attended. He was last at Remedios; the Governor received him at his own mansion, or rather would not allow him to take quarters elsewhere. He was expected soon at Havana.

It appears the whole Island is in high glee; balls, soirees, dansantes, chumbanes, etc., etc., keep the Island in delightful excitement.

Col. Iturs has organized a battalion of cazadores, who, the papers say, begin to go through the manuever of the Manuele rifled with admirable precision.

Not an item of political news can be gleamed from our files.

The late rumor that Santa Anna had turned slave-dealer, and was selling Yucatan Indians captured by the Government troops, at so much a head, turns out to have considerable foundation. A correspondent of the New York Herald writes from Campeachy, that on the 21st of December last there were in that port upward of forty Yucatan Indians, which were about being shipped on board the Mexican schooner Jaquito, to be sent to Havana and there sold as slaves. He also sends the protest of some of these unfortunate Indians, then in prison in Merida, who are also to be sold into the same bondage. A translation of this protest, together with a letter on the subject from Senor Bonilla to the Governor of Yucatan, is published in the Herald. These documents are sufficient to warrant the belief that, to raise money, Santa Anna has entered into extensive arrangements for selling the Indians of his territories to Cuban and other customers.

COTTON AND SUGAR.—The receipts of cotton yesterday via the river were by the C. D. Jr. from Vicksburg, 1269 bales; St. Charles, from Red River, 1100 bales; Prabon, from Red River, 822; from Texas, by the Star, 699; Whitemen, 698; Lexington, 51; Dr. Dickson, 1000; total 4839 bales. Of sugar 741 hogsheads, and [illegible] barrels, and 226 half barrels molasses.

These receipts show a great falling off for the first of the week.

The Thibodaux Minerva of Saturday last says:

A regular line of stages between the Lafourche crossing of the Opelousas Railroad via Thibodaux and Terrville, and from thence by steamer to Franklin, commenced running on Sunday last. Our young city has been alive with the rustling noise of our Attakapas neighbors ever since. We are not in possession of their regular days and hours of departure, else we would give them. The best contrary to what we announced in our last, still come to us by the old crayfish route via Donaldsonville, though we learn that a change will soon be effected.

Four booths or shops have been opened in the French camp near Boulogne, by permission of the General of the "Army of the North," for the sale of books and tracts among the soldiers. The bridge over Rock Island, at Dixon, Ill., which is one of the most extensive structures on the line of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, has been carried away by a freshet, which has also caused an inundation of the surrounding country.

During the last two weeks of November, 26 vessels, with 14,020 tons of guano, sailed from the Chincha Islands. Of these, six vessels with 3,237 tons were for the United States; ten vessels with 6,744 tons for France, three vessels with 1802 tons for Russia, and [illegible] with 1199 tons for Spain.

DEATH OF BISHOP CAPERS.

It becomes us to say with the Psalmist, "I was dumb with silence, I opened not my mouth because thou didst it."

Bishop Capers died on Monday, January 29th, at his residence at Anderson Court House S. C. This intelligence, briefly announced in our last issue, is confirmed. His particular illness had not been known: surprise therefore mingles with grief.

There is no post of honor and usefulness in American Methodism which he has not filled and illustrated. In 1808 received as a travelling preacher into the South Carolina Conference: in 1811 he was ordained deacon; in 1813, elder; in 1828, sent to England as the representative of the American Methodist Episcopal Church to the British Conference; and for several years he was one of the general missionary secretaries: long has he been a member of every General Conference: in 1834 sent to Savannah, and was superintendent of Missions to slaves near that city: in 1835 to Columbia, in view to his filling a place in the South Carolina College: in 1837 commenced the Southern Christian Advocate, and continued in that office until 1840.

He told us pleasantly, that in the starting of the Advocate, he was Editor, Clerk, man-about-the-office—every thing, but carrier.

A writer in the Charleston Standard says:

During one of the years that Dr. Capers was stationed in Savannah, the yellow fever raged to an appalling degree; he was often urged to quit the city, but he could not be induced to do so. When the fatality was greatest, and hundreds were falling on all sides around him, like a good soldier he stood firm at his post, and would have been, had the Lord so willed it, faithful unto death. Nothing daunted by the terrors of contagion, he visited the sick, administering spiritual comfort and necessities to all persons alike who required his services, whether they belonged to his immediate flock or not. He preached, by invitation, frequently in Dr. Kolloch's church, in Savannah, and at the death of that distinguished minister, who fell a victim to the prevailing epidemic, he was called upon by his bereaved congregation to preach the funeral sermon of their late pastor, which he complied with. By thnt and other unmistakable evidences of his piety and fitness for this divine mission, he had endeared himself so much to the congregation of the late Dr. Kolloch, that they tendered to him the pastoral charge of their church, with a very large salary; but so imbued was Dr. Capers with the spirit of the church in which he was brought up, so attached was he to its peculiar system, that he could not be prevailed upon to break off his connection with it. The offer to him of Dr. Kolloch's church, coming from a Calvinistic congregation to a minister whose doctrinal views were totally different from their own, of course greatly enhanced the compliment.

In 1823-24 he was stationed in Milledgeville, Ga., superintendent of the Asbury Indian Mission, and from the year 1827 to 1830 the presiding Elder of Charleston District.

His account of a trip into the Indian Nation, in Western Ga., and East Alabama, about 1821-22, for opening a Mission among the Creeks may be found in the old Methodist Magazine. We have often read it and admired its classic style and Pauline spirit.

His election to the Episcopacy 1846, was the crowning honor bestowed on one who had done great services and suffered great privations for the Methodist Church. Our affectionate reverence for him—the high estimate we hold of his gifts, grace and usefulness—can find no adequate expression here. The friend of the black, the red, the white man—apostle to all, and the servnnt of God. What lacked he in serving his generation! In what field of ministerial usefulness, glory and suffering are not his footprints seen? And now he is net—for God has taken him.

An appreciative friend furnishes, from an authentic source, an interesting communication:

COTTAGE HILL, Ala., Feb. 7, 1858.

Mr. Editor: I notice with regret a confirmation of the report of the death of Rev. WILLIAM CAPERS, D. D., one of the Bishops of the M. E. Church, South. The following items of biography have been gathered from one to whom the venerable Bishop was long and intimately known.

Bishop William Capers was born January 26, 1790, in Sumpter county, South Carolina. His father was married three times—had in all seven sons and two daughters—three of whom, Gabriel, William and John, were by the first wife. John was an itinerant preacher sixteen years, and died in 1824. Gabriel still lives in this neighborhood, in his sixty-eighth year, in good health. The Bishop's father, Major Capers, was an old revolutionary officer, and continued in military life until a few years of his death. He was one of the first who opened his doors to the Methodists. Bishop Coke and Asbury were among his guests, and through their instrumentality he was converted. He subsequently became a class leader and steward, and was greatly gifted in prayer and exhortation. When Mr. Hamet came over to this country, the Major was amongst his admirers. When Bishop Asbury refused to return Mr. H. to Charleston, and Mr. Hamet set up for himself, the Major left the Church with him, but after the death of Mr. H. became again a Methodist. He was instrumental in having a clause inserted in the deed of the church property which was bought by the Hametites, by which, in the event of Mr. Hamet's death, it was to go to those who preached the doctrines contained in Mr. Wesley's Notes. When Hamet moved to Georgetown, he followed him, having in the meanwhile married the second time, in that neighborhood. Upon the death of Mr. H., some difficulty was interposed by his adherents to the property's succeeding to the Methodists. A suit was about to be instituted, but Bishop Asbury interposed, and shortly after, the property in Charleston came into the hands of the Methodists, which is known as the Trinity Church.

Major Capers died in 1812; when dying he called his children about him and prayed, "Father, I ask thee not the honors of the world for my children, nor its riches, but to make all my sons faithful Methodist preachers, and my daughters zealous Christians." Two of his sons who knelt by him were already in the ministry, William and John, and all of them subsequently became preachers, excepting one, who entered the army, and one who died in his minority.

William was sent from home to school at the age of ten to the High Hills of Santee, in Sumpter, S. C., to Dr. Roberts, a Baptist Minister. There he continued for five years and was fitted for college, and at the age of fifteen entered the Sophomore class in South Carolina College, Columbia. He continued there two years, when his health became so bad he had to discontinue study altogether. At that time an event transpired which had a great effect upon his already shattered health, if not upon his whole life.

A native African, who went by the name of Lamb, the son of a king, had been brought to this country when a young man. He was possessed of rare natural endowments—could write in his own language, and had cultivated himself so as to be able to write English in good style. This man planned an insurrection which was, he said, intended to be bloodless. His plan was, to seize Judge Nott, (father of Dr. N., of Mobile,) Judge Desnassure, Col. Wade Hampton, Col. Taylor and a number of others of the first citizens, to march them in front of his army, and proclaim that if there were no resistance to their designs these should be kept harmless; otherwise, they should be promptly slain: vessels were to be seized at Charleston and elsewhere, and all who desired might return to their native country. This was discovered, and Lamb was executed. At his request a vast concourse of slaves were called to witness the execution. In his last speech he told the multitude never to attempt insurrection again — that Heaven was against them.

William, in company with the other students, was present on the occasion. The eloquence and sublime sentiments uttered by the African so affected young Capers that he determined to rescue him at the risk of his own life, and he actually moved to do it when his fellow students, Governor Murphy, formerly of this State, Stephen D. Miller, since Senator of the U. S. from Carolina, and others, seized him and with great difficulty and actual force only prevented him from attempting his purpose. The excitement so affected his already shattered nerves that he became deranged, and continued in that way some five months.

This transpired in his junior year. He never returned to College, but in the third year of his ministry the honorary degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by the South Carolina College. At this time he was stationed in Columbia, and Dr. Jonathan Maxey, a Baptist Clergyman of distinction, and the first president of the College, was often to be seen in attendance upon the ministry of his former student.

After the recovery of his health, he commenced the study of the law in the office of Judge Richardson, in Statesburg, where his father was residing. While a student of law, he paid a visit to his married sister, who, with her husband, a short time previous, had embraced religion and joined the Methodists. There he attended church and heard the Rev. Wm. Gassoway, then an old man of 90—one of the most remarkable of the old school of Methodist Itinerants. The next day he returned home, and told his father the burden of his heart, and that he intended to seek religion. The old man was at that time—after the death of Hamet—out of the Church. When he heard his son's purpose, he burst into tears, and both father and son began praying together. Presently the father was overwhelmed with a blessing. A week after, William was converted, quit the law, took his saddlebags and went with old Brother Gassoway. He attended with him his appointments and camp meetings.

About three months after, Conference met. Brother Gassoway came up with a recommendation for the young exhorter to the Annual Conference. It was debated whether, one whose probation for membership in the Church was not out, could be received into Conference on trial. Bishop Ashury threw his influence in favor of the son of his old friend, and he was received.

The first time the Bishop saw the Major after this, was at a camp meeting in Sumpter County; putting his arms around his neck, "Ah, Brother Capers," said he, "I have been expecting to hear this blessed news for some time; for I have remarked that the blessing of God accompanies those who open their doors to Methodist preachers: when the old sheep go astray, the best way to secure them is to catch the lambs."

The young preacher was appointed first to the Wateree Circuit, which was in 1808. The second or third year of his ministry he was sent to Charleston, where he has often since been appointed.

In consequence of a certain pamphlet, written by Bishops Coke and Asbury upon the subject of slavery, an act was passed by the Legislature of South Carolina, which authorized any company of persons to enter any Methodist church where negroes were assembled and to whip them, no matter how many whites might be present. At this critical period in the history of preaching to the slave, old Major Capers was a valuable friend; and it must be admitted that his son William, from his position as an eminent minister, his family influence, and his popularity, contributed more than any other person towards breaking down the wall of prejudice which formerly existed against giving the Gospel to the colored man.

Immediately upon the visit of Dr. Reece to this country from the Wesleyans, the General Conference determined to reciprocate the friendly mission by sending a delegate to the British Conference, and authorised the Bishops to select a man to represent American Methodism in England. It is reported that Bishop McKendree observed upon the occasion of making the proposed selection, that we had just had one of our great men in England to settle the Canada question, and nobody had found it out; now he wished to send one that could make a noise. He and one other of the Bishops, felt secure of the vote of Bishop Roberts in favor of Dr. Capers, which would constitute a majority of the Superintendents. The remaining two Bishops were not in favor of sending a slaveholder as a representative to England, but thought Dr. Fisk the proper man. However, when the Board of Bishops met, Bishop Roberts was sick and could not be present. After balloting for two days, it was agreed to leave the place to be filled by the ensuing General Conference, when Doctor Capers was elected by a majority of ten, though he received but one vote north of the Potomac—that of Lawrence McComb. "Law. Coomb," as they called him, said he would vote for Capers, "nigger or no nigger."

Dr. Capers's visit to England was eminently successful—he preached constantly to houses crowded to the utmost capacity. The writer of this some few years since had the pleasure of spending a few moments with Doctor Buntiag, who was then, as now, quite infirm; the only person the venerable Doctor inquired after was Doctor Capers. Of all the preachers he had seen in America evidently Doctor Capers had most favorably impressed him.

In the General Conference of 1844 the proposition of Doctor Capers was, that the Church should remain one, only that the Bishops should separate; that is, one part preside over the slaveholding Conferences, and the other exclusively over those in the free States. This proposition, which both parties may now in cool blood see was eminently wise, if not then thought practicable, was rejected; the plan of separation was adopted as reported by the committee of nine, of which Doctor Capers was one.

In 1846 he was elected a Bishop of the M. E. Church, South, in which position he has ever since continued effective, though of late in feeble health. Only a few days before his death he preached with his usual power at Macon, Ga.

The influence of Bishop Capers, as a citizen of South Carolina, was probably equal to his influence as a member of the Church. It will be remembered that in the great crisis of the Compromise difficulties of 1851 he did not hesitate to exert that influence for the maintenance of the Union. Coming as it did from one so well known and beloved throughout the State, and one, too, who had never before interfered, by word or deed, in politics, his "Letter to the People of South Carolina" is thought, by those who are well advised of all the facts, to have contributed greatly to the favorable determination of that great question in his native State.

Of his well-known ability as a preacher we would not now pretend to make an estimate; but on one particular occasion, that of the Putnam Camp Meeting, in Georgia, it was attended by such a display of the power of God that not less than 7000 persons were struck down as one man, and hundreds live who can attest the power of that day.

Bishop Capers has left a widow, five daughters and five sons (the larger part on whom are married) to mourn, with the Church, the loss of one of the noblest and purest of earth.

TUSCULUM.

REV. J. W. LAMBUTH.

Through the kindness of President Thornton, of Sharon Mississippi, we have been put in possession of his Correspondence: the letter is not of later date than one already published, and has been anticipated in its details. We make a few extracts:

"Say to my brethren I am in China, have learned to speak and read a little in Chinese, and I shall exert myself to the utmost, to turn the Heathen from the error of their way, by proclaiming among them the Gospel of Christ. * * * * * * * * *

The example of the Foreign Merchants who profess no religion, but live in sin in its worst forms, does more injury and goes further to militate against Missionary operations, than any one could possibly imagine, who knows nothing of the Chinese Character. When you try to teach them morality, they refer you immediately to Foreigners and speak of the immoral conduct of our own people. My dear Brother you cannot imagine how strangely I feel, in a land where at every step degredation and distress meet the eye. Beggars on every hand, and millions who have not the least conception of God, and Temples dedicated to Heathen gods. You can form no idea of the dense mass of human beings here, in China, just existing, and that is not only to be seen in one place, but in many. They place their dead in a coffin and leave it on the top of the ground any where. Graves meet the eye everywhere, for China, as far as I can see is a complete burying-ground.

I am now with Brother Cunningham, who lives in Brother Taylor's house. Brother Jenkins' house is so badly injured by balls proceeding from the Rebel party, and so near the Camp of the Imperialists, who are besieging the city, as to render it unfit in many respects and unsafe to take his family. Many of the Missionaries have been compelled to leave the City, on account of the balls and bombs, flying in every direction among the houses. Therefore room is hard to find among those on the outside of the city, who have taken upon themselves the difficult task of teaching the Heathen. The rebels and Imperialists are still fighting and keep up a continual cannonading, day and night, but little damage is done.

Friday night, September 20th. The mail leaves to-morrow. Mary and myself are both well and feel ourselves under God's protection and guidance. Last night we were much disturbed after retiring, by the report of guns all around us, and until late to-day they were combatting with one another, not over two hundred yards from the house. I witnessed their action and, as far as I have heard, one man only has been killed during the day. It appears that almost every man bears a flag, which is decidedly a hindrance. Remember us both to your family, to Brother Pugh and all friends around Sharon. Remember us both, also, in your prayers to our Father in Heaven."

ALABAMA BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Montgomery Advertiser and Gazette, of the 13th ult., says:

The third anniversary of this useful and flourishing society was held on last Sunday night, at the Presbyterian Church. The annual report of the Secretary, Mr. Richard Jones, was read. It was a paper of great interest, detailing the operations of the Society for the past year, and presenting its contemplated movements for the future. We learned from the report that the families in Montgomery county, destitute of the Bible had been supplied, and that its benevolent operations had been extended in other sections of the State. Elegant and effective speeches were made by Mr. F. L. B. Shaver and John Whiting, Esq. A collection was taken up for the benefit of the Society. There was a great deal of interest exhibited in the exercises, and the audience was evidently pleased and impressed. We view the prosperity of this noble institution with great gratification, and every patriot, philanthropist and Christian cannot but rejoice in the field of usefulness now opening before it.

There was an extensive excitement at Louisville, on the 30th ult., on account of the ferry boat for the Jeffersonville and Cincinnati train, with 200 passengers, becoming locked in the ice in the Falls that morning. She grounded and the ice gorged around her in such a manner that for some time it was thought that all on board would be lost. Finally, however, all were rescued by the firemen. The boat, it is thought, would prove a total loss.

Telegraphic dispatches from Chicago, of the 29th ult., say that there has been another fierce storm of snow and wind in that vicinity, and as a consequence, that the trains on the Chicago and Mississippi Railroad, with a large number of passengers and several members of the Legislature, were frozen upon the prairie, in snow some eight feet deep. The passengers burned the cars and by rubbing the ears of a consignment of oysters, preserved themselves from starvation. By last accounts they were still there. Relief, however, had been sent them.

We learn from Capt. Cannon, of the steamer R. W. McRea, arrived yesterday, that the Ouachita river was very low, and that the boat was unable to get beyond Alabama landing.

NEWSPAPER CIRCULATION.

The Picayune and Delta have been contending for the official printing on the ground of their comparative circulation. The Crescent meditates this week and gives information which has opened the eyes of some people:

Our cotemporaries of the Picayune and Delta will not allow the subject of their comparative circulation to rest, but keep forcing it before the public as though it was a matter of public interest. We had supposed that the annual warfare in the month of December, with some loud exultation by the successful party, and some lamentations on the part of the vanquished, in January, would have introduced a peaceful interregnum of eleven months duration. It was our mistake—for the strife is greater since the new year came in than before, and has extended itself northward in the shape of defiant and contradictory telegraphic despatches as far as New York, if not farther.

The Picayune, of Sunday morning, says:

The Picayune has not only the largest circulation in the city, but the largest of all papers published in the South.

The Delta, of the same date, says:

Our business friends will remember that the circulation of the Double Sheet Sunday Edition of the Delta is larger, by thousands, than any other paper published in New Orleans or the South.

These two statements are directly and positively contradictory. One or the other of them, therefore, must be incorrect. Hitherto we have failed to take any part in the contest, nor do we now intend to attempt mediating between the belligerents, or endeavoring to solve the mystery wrapped up in the fact that there are, in New Orleans, two given quantities, each one of which is greater than the other! We simply intend stating the fact, that both the Picayune and Delta are incorrect in their assertions, and that there is, to our own knowledge, a paper published in this city having a larger circulation than either.

The NewOrleans Christian Advocate is a religious journal, devoted to the interests of Methodism, published weekly, on a sheet similar in size to the Daily Crescent. It commenced with a large list, which has been gradually, but steadily increasing, until it has reached a circulation of six thousand one hundred and twenty copies. This was precisely the size of the edition printed on Saturday morning last, and, as the subscription list is steadily and regularly increasing, it is every way probable that within a short time the Advocate will circulate more copies than both the Picayune and Delta. The Advocate is very ably edited by the Rev. H. N. McTyeire, of this city, under the auspices of the Publishing Committees of the Louisiana and Alabama Methodist Conferences, and is every way worthy of the great popularity and circulation that it enjoys.

The facts which we announce in regard to this journal have been drawn from us by the long continued strife of our two neighbors concerning their respective circulations, and will be found, we believe, sufficient—if any thing can be—to effect a temporary relaxation of their wordy warfare, which is getting to be very tiresome. The Advocate has said nothing concerning its circulation, to our knowledge: but has pursued the even tenor of its way, endeavoring to make its columns as interesting as possible, and provide its patrons with the latest and most reliable intelligence. It is an example well worthy of imitation by other papers.

ODDS AND ENDS.

Mr. Editor—This evening the New Orleans Christian Advocate, of the 27th inst., reached me, in which I noticed an instance of canine sagacity and courage in affording succor to a boat load of persons among the breakers. I will now give you an instance in which our whole town was saved by the sagacity and perseverance of a Newfoundland dog.

On the 21st inst., (Sabbath,) the wind rose very high, and continued blowing a perfect gale through the evening and night. About midnight, while deep sleep rested upon our citizens, the house of my neighbor, Mr. M. A. Mynatt, took fire. The dog seems to have been on the look out for danger, for he set up a loud barking, and running rapidly back and forth between the burning house and the door of a servant's house. This unusual behavior in the dog caused the servant to rise, and on opening the door discovered the fire, just taking good hold upon the roof of the adjoining house. The alarm was spread, and in a very few minutes the flame was extinguished.

Everything is very dry here, for we have not had rain enough this winter to make the streets muddy. The wind was very high, and the relative position of the house such as to have burned the whole town; for had the fire gotten fairly under way, no human effort could possibly have arrested it. So that the preservation of one of our most flourishing inland towns is fairly attributable to a dog. I think you will say of him as you once said of your London correspondent, X. Y. Z., "he is some." To say the least, he deserves kind treatment at the hands of our citizens.

I do wish you would use a larger type, because I cannot read a considerable portion of your paper as now printed. My eyes have been employed for sixty years, and are getting quite dim. I hear others expressing the same wish.*

I hope you will not forget to write that tract, "Do they wish to join us?"

Your friend and brother,

E. V. LEVERETT.

*The smaller the print the more news. Judicious planters press their cotton into small bales—but they are heavy and better for transportation. Our columns devoted to secular news only supply this small type. Large type, unless the size of the paper were doubled, (a thing impracticable just now,) would afford our readers a very meagre view of that commercial and general intelligence we now spread before them. And mark this—if they go to the political and secular papers for the same information they will meet it in the same or smaller type.—ED.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.

The Gazette gives this excellent municipal item:

"Our City Council at its last meeting established the price of licenses for retailing liquors at five hundred dollars per annum. It also appointed a committee to procure an amendment to the city charter, from the next Legislature, empowering the corporation with authority to raise the license to three thousand dollars."

SHARON, MISSISSIPPI.

Our friends in Madison county, Miss., are in good spirits, for cause, too, at their educational prospects. Madison College, for young men, is already an establishment. Rev. J. W. Shelton's engagement we have already referred to, and in terms of commendation, which we are disposed to add to rather than take from. See the ADVERTISEMENT.

One of the trustees writes us that good boarding, and for any number of students, may be had for $10 per month, including washing, fuel, lights, etc. He communicates what follows of its excellencies. There is one, however, which it seems to us, and will seem to all our readers, rather against Sharon and vicinity—there are not many copies of the New Orleans Christian Advocate taken there. With all their schools, are they not a reading people? The advocates of home institutions and Southern education, do they go elsewhere than homeward and Southward for their periodicals?—

"A charter that does honor to the mind that dictated, and the Legislature which granted it, protects us against grog shops, billiard tables, gambling saloons, and every other dissipating influence; while fashionable resorts, such as ball-rooms, circuses and the like, well calculated to decoy youth from the quietude and application necessary to successful study, are unknown among us. A drunken man in our streets is almost a phenomenon; unless imported from some other region, and seldom is the ear outraged by the profane oath of any citizen of our village or vicinity. So that under the protection of law, and the higher protection of public sentiment, we feel secure against ordinary public vices and nuisances, and fully justified in re-asserting that Sharon is unsurpassed as a location for educational purposes by any portion of the State."

LONG CREDITS.

One good result of the hard times, about which so much has been said and written, has been to cause our moneyed and commercial men to examine into the state of their affairs, and particularly to open their eyes to the evils attendant upon giving long credits. None of the numerous crises in money matters which have visited our country, have probably ever caused so close and extended an examination into all the ramifications of business as this last one, and it is generally, if not universally, acknowledged that the habit of giving credits of twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months, has been at the bottom of one-half the disastrous failures and suspensions of the last year.

When money is abundant and the spirit of competition strong, merchants who are possessed of one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars of available capital, in order to increase their sales and profits, allow country customers to purchase on almost any terms and find themselves, at the end of the year, with a great amount of assets but no available means. They have trusted out, not only that which they really owned themselves, but a great amount for which they had been trusted. The country customer, following in the steps of the city merchant, sells on time all that he really possessed, and a greater or less amount of that which he had obtained on credit. Money becomes scarce, the country merchant is unable to make his collections—the city trader is put off—creditors become pressing, and a series of failures are the inevitable result. This state of affairs has exhibited itself, during the last year, in every city of the Union, and has completely demonstrated the truth of those charges made by the English press, that the commercial affairs of this country are not conducted with regard to the capital possessed by different mercantile parties, but with regard to the amount of credit that can be obtained. In such a state of affairs all the old and acknowledged laws of trade are overlooked, and fortune is the sole security of the merchant. If the season is a prosperous one, business good and money plentiful, his debtor will be able to pay him and he able to meet his liabilities with his creditors. If the season is bad and money tight, a regular series of failures is the inevitable consequence.

Probably no city in the Union is so much given to allowing long credits as New Orleans. Our cotton houses make cash advances on crops not in the ground, and our dry goods merchants allow their customers to carry off heavy stocks of goods to be paid for in twelve or eighteen months, though the accounts frequently remain open for a couple of years. Such a system of business is in fact no system at all, unless the seller is backed by a bank, by strong friends, or on immense capital. If a man has trusted out three or four hundred thousand dollars, and has but sixty or a hundred thousand of his own, the very first monetary crisis is such as to effect his ruin. There is no particular learning wrapped up in this. The facts of the case are all patent, and have been demonstrated time and time again, during the last year. Parties who had a sufficient capital to do a respectable business on a sound basis, have been ambitious of equaling others possessed of a larger capital, and have found themselves, in the end, utterly shipwrecked—merely because they would not abide by that which was safe and sure, but must venture to shake hands with possibilities and expectations.

After the present monetary troubles have been outlived, we trust our business men will abandon their system of selling at long credits because they can thus dispose of a greater bill, and content themselves with smaller sales and sure payments. If, in some cases, the profits are not so great, the risks are certainly much less; and when one man makes a fortune by this gambling in luck, one hundred lose all they are possessed of. It would be well if, for a time at least, credit could be wholly done away with here. As such a result can not be looked forward to, the next best thing is to reduce the system to as short a period as possible and accordingly give a greater stability and independence to all parties. By so doing, the panics and troubles of past years will be measurably provided against.

CORN AND SUGAR.—The receipts of Cotton for the twenty-fours up to 6 o'clock last evening were: By the N. R. W. Hill, from Memphis, 3336 bales; by the Belle Gates, from Shreveport, 1000 bales; by the Frank Lyon, from Ashton, 722 bales; by the Afton, from Yazoo City, 1422 bales; by the David Gibson, from Fort Adams, 481 bales; by the Bella Donna, from Williamsport, 381 bales; by the Jean Wobre, 149 bales; from Grand Ecore, by the Swamp Fox, 1008 bales; from Alexandria, by the H. M. Wright, 672 bales; from St. Martinsville, by the Huron, 267 bales; by the Carrier, 68 bales; by the Gem, 187 bales. Total Cotton, 10,132 bales. Sugar 2125 hogsheads; Molasses, 3337 barrels and 406 half-barrels.

OCEAN STEAMSHIPS.

The history of steam navigation from the time of Dr. Lardner's prediction that no vessel could be constructed of sufficient capacity to carry both coal and water, sufficient in quantity to take her across the Atlantic, is pretty well known. Despite his prophecy, vessels have been constructed able to run between English and American ports in nine and ten days, and a great portion of the commercial interests of the world are connected with their voyages. The necessities of the European war have led to a withdrawal of many ships belonging to the Cunard line, and the accident that occurred to the Arctic, left the Collins line with only three vessels possessing the proper qualifications for trans-Atlantic steamers. Thus the navigation of the Atlantic has been materially lessened, and we have been compelled to await the reception of European news for periods almost equaling those when sailing vessels were the only ones that ploughed the Atlantic ways.

The nineteenth century is not satisfied, however, with this state of affairs. More enterprise, and more energy are required. The time of communication between England and America must be lessened, instead of increased, and he who lives in New Orleans must hear from him who writes in Liverpool as soon as the salt waves between the two cities can be crossed. It is gratifying to learn that the commercial interests of the country need only be known in order to be responded to. As soon as it was understood that the Collins line was so far crippled as to be unable to preserve its regular voyages, and the Cunard line so weakened as to be able to make only semi-monthly trips, Mr. Vanderbilt, the great New York steamship owner, steps forward and volunteers to create a trans-Atlantic line on his own account—running regularly between New York and Liverpool, at less prices than have ever before been demanded. Now, Mr. Vanderbilt is not a knight errant in the business he has undertaken, but a cool and calculating man, well acquainted with every thing pertaining to the business of steamships. There is every reason to hope that his intention may be speedily carried into effect, and that the present European war may result in the creation of another American line of ocean steamships, if nothing else. We append the letter of Mr. Vanderbilt on the subject:

NEW YORK, Jan. 18, 1858.

"Dear Sir: Your favor of the 16th is received. I am greatly obliged for your kind expressions relative to the matter of the proposed weekly line of mail steamers between New York and Liverpool. The Cunard line being in good part withdrawn, by reason of the existing war, and a frequent and rapid communication with Europe being so essential to the interests of our commerce, I determined on my proposition to the Postmaster General. It was in substance this: That I would run a semi-monthly line, which, by alternating with the Collins line, would form a weekly communication, and that I would perform the proposed mail service for the sum of $150 for the voyage out and home.

I have well considered the subject, and am well satisfied that if my proposition be accepted, the enterprise can be accomplished with great advantage to the country, as well as to myself. I would not ask for the proposed $150,000 per voyage, were it not for the unjust compensation now allowed to the Cunard line by the British government, and the still more stupendous pension afforded by our government to the Collins line.

The effect of the protection thus afforded to the foreign lines, (while they are drawing such enormous sums from the Treasury,) is to entirely annihilate the enterprise of our own citizens, and render it impossible for private individuals to think of entering into competition against such overpowering monopolies.

Whenever the British Government or our own Government withdraws its fostering hand, and ceases to give this policy which blights individual enterprise, which defies every effort of individual competition, I shall cheerfully consent that my proposed compensation may be withdrawn. The ocean is, in my judgment, free, and there is nothing so dangerous to individual enterprise, or so insignificant in the benefits it confers on commerce, as should render the National Legislature unwilling to permit that description of enterprise to rest upon the field from which aggregated and protracted capital have hitherto almost wholly excluded it.

I have had some experience in ocean navigation, am satisfied that ours and economy which attends individual enterprise, is essential to its success, while extravagance and peculation which eats up the subsidized corporations, require larger protection from the treasury for their support.

I have never till now been in a situation to propose the establishment of a European line of steamers, and for the reason I have not done so. Should an opportunity be afforded me, I will attempt it; and should I incur pecuniary loss, I shall nevertheless feel sustained and gratified, if I shall be enabled to aid and advance the interests of American commerce and individual exertion, and promote the convenience of our citizens.

I am your very obedient servant,

C. VANDERBILT."

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.—The Washington Sentinel states that there are now but two men employed on the Monument, which has attained a height of 170 feet, and the receipts by the Association are extremely small. Two blocks of marble from Japan, one from Loo Choo, weighing more than three tons, are to be placed in the Monument. They were brought to the Washington Navy Yard, and the Board of Managers received the first intimation of their arrival through communication from the Secretary of the Navy. The Sentinel says:

Last session a select committee was appointed by each branch of Congress on the communication of the Board of Manage s, asking the National Legislature to finish the Monument; the plan of building it by individual subscriptions having proved a failure. The application, we learn, has been duly considered, and that both committees are willing that Congress shall appropriate the necessary funds for that purpose; but there is a division of opinion as to the manner of the expenditure—whether it shall be by Government officers, or by the present Managers of the Association.

TERRIBLE RAILROAD COLLISION IN A SNOW STORM.—The Buffalo Republic has the following account of a violent collision on Saturday, the 27th ult., during a severe snow storm, between two freight trains on the New York Railroad, near [illegible]:

The engine of the freight train [illegible] been stopped in consequence of the fire-pan filling [illegible] snow and ice, during the storm. The train standing [illegible] partial cut in the wind and snow, blowing a gale, [illegible] was not discovered by the freight train until nearly upon it. The engineer blew a terrific blast from his whistle, but the alarm was of no avail—they ran into the freight train, breaking the passenger car, killing a man by the name of Quigley, and breaking the arm of another man. No other injuries.

When the whistle was sounded Quigley ran to the rear, and was in the act of looking out upon the coming train, when the locomotive caught him as it swept by, cutting his head off, and casting it some distance to the side of the track. He was in the employ of Hiram Markham, as trackman. The broken car was removed from the track, the boiler was supplied with water, and both trains were soon under way. The conductor of the freight train had sent back his flagman, but the air being filled with snow they were not seen.

POVERTY AND PRIDE.—We find in the New York Mirror the following sad picture of the struggle between pride and destitution in that city:

First go to the luxuries—the superfluous—the silver spoons—the spare clothing—the jewelry—to the bridal ring; and then the bedding, the carpets, chairs, and so on through the whole inventory of articles that can be dispensed with, while life is retained, to accommodate this inborn and ineffaceable American pride. In the pawn-shops are provided with seats, so that the anxiety attending bartering may be done without exposing the victim of that "peculiar institution" to public gaze. The amount of business at these establishments during the last three months exceeds all precedent. Watches, gold pencils, and silver spoons have been pledged by the bushel, and every saleable and unsaleable article of furniture and clothing. A friend of ours, saw a poor woman at Simpson's one day last week, pawning her under clothing to raise a shilling to get to market. Another had cut up her bed and made it into a shawl, which she had pawned for a similar purpose.

HORRIBLE PARRICIDE.—A few days since, in Logan county, Va., a man of the name of Markham got into an angry altercation with one of his sons, called on him for assistance. The man refused aid in an impertinent manner to the father, calling upon another son to take a gun in hand, started to chastise the disobedient son. He fled round the house, the father pursuing him, and after disappearing from the sight of the son who was behind, he heard a blow of so slaughterous a sound as to cause him to run at once to see the cause. On running around the corner of the house, he found his father lying on the ground with his back-bone literally cut in twain by the axe, and in the agonies of death; in fact, he died in about thirty minutes. The murderer (the son who killed) was apprehended, and on the introduction of the axe upon an examination before a Justice of the Peace, he admitted it to be the weapon with which he killed his father. The name of Markham, says the Telegraph, has been for years notorious on the western circuit, by its connection with bloodshed and homicide.

There is a bill before the Legislature of New York providing that "Any person who shall offer for sale any milk produced from cows that are diseased, unwholesome, deleterious or unnatural food, shall be liable to a fine of $100, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months. Any person who shall sell or offer for sale adulterated milk, shall be liable to a fine of $50."

On the 30th ult. the down train on the Mississippi Railroad ran off the track near Bend. The baggage and two passenger cars were thrown down an embankment, and a number of persons injured, but fortunately not seriously. The brakeman was badly wounded.

MARRIAGES.

MARRIED.—On Sabbath evening, 4th inst. in Algiers, by Rev. James D. Parker, Mr. JAMES AIKMAN, Jr., and Miss MARTHA JANE WILKINS.

MARRIED.—January 31, 1855, by Rev. L. A. Reed, at the residence of Henry Hall Esq., of Donaldsonville, Mr. WILSON YOUNGBLOOD to Miss DEBORAH ANN HULL.

DEATHS.

DIED.—At the residence of Barna Ivey, in Barbour county, Ala., November 27, 1854, SARAH, wife of Malachi Ivey, aged 25 years, who only daughter of William and Jane Curry, formerly of Edgefield district, South Carolina. She was a member of the Baptist Church since 1844—baptized by Rev. J. M. Childs. She lived a worthy life and died a peaceful death.

DIED.—In Marengo county, Ala., 26th of January, Capt. CALEB REMBERT. He was born in South Carolina, April 7, 1787; married in 1811 to Magdolin May Mickau. Some thirty years since he embraced religion, and joined the M. E. Church, of which his wife had long been a member, and in 1835 he moved to this State and settled where he died. Capt. Rombert was emphatically the Christian gentleman, neat in his person, dignified in his manners, amiable in his disposition, affectionate and forbearing in his social relations, domestic in his habits, punctual in his dealings, benevolent to the poor, and foremost in every good work. One trait in his character I wish to notice. As steward of his circuit, (in which capacity he served the greater portion of his life,) when he said to the man of God, we will give you three, six or eight hundred dollars for your support, three six or eight hundred dollars it was, and not, as is too often the case, half of that sum; for he felt that to be not only an honorable but a sacred debt.

The streams of his benevolence flowed silently but surely, for he acted on the scriptural principle, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth."

Some days before his death, the writer conversed with him of his future prospects. He expressed a firm confidence in his Saviour, and had no fears of death, and I could see that he was fervently engaged in prayer. I intended to converse with him more fully, but when I visited him again he was speechless. I then watched by his dying couch, believing God would enable him to give his dying testimony. In the struggle which ensued before death, and lasted for several hours, though he had not been able to speak for several days, he seemed to collect all of his energies, as though he had got a view of the promised inheritance. He said, "Heaven at last! heaven at last! All is right"

Though cold is the billow, and dark is the wave,
With Jesus beside me, the surges I'll brave.
For the heavenly music has ravished me so,
I must join the band. I'll go—yes, I'll go.

A. J. CRAWFORD.

A SWEET DEATH.—What a strange heading for an obituary notice, and yet it is true as strange.

We stood by the bedside of a devoted and sincere votary of the cross, as she passed away from the associations and companionships of this life, and although she was a suffering child of sorrow, lingering for weeks and months, yet her death was a sweet and holy one, as she breathed out her mortal life into the arms of her Redeemer.

Mrs. REBECCA HANNER, who lately died at the residence of her father, Mr. J. Fulton, in Carrollton, La., was a woman of rare excellence of character, made so by a naturally amiable disposition, the accomplishments of a polished education, and all the adorning graces of our holy Christianity.

Tho lived a Christian—she died a saint. God called her, and we gave her to the companionship of angels and the happiness of Heaven.

She revels a redeemed and crowned angel amid the brilliant fortunes of eternity, while the father and relatives go about the streets as mourners. Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. A short, but glorious history. Nothing more need be said, for the choicest language would only mar the heavenly picture.

J. W. H.

Mrs. Louis B. Mooney, wife of the Rev. T. Moody, of the Alabama Conference, died in Tuscumbia, Alabama, September 28, 1854, aged 32. She had been a member of the M. E. Church 20 years, and for 15 the wife of an itinerant preacher. She was not what might be termed a showy christian: her mental and physical constitution precluded that; and she was often heard complaining of her fearfulness and want of zeal in the cause of God; yet she bore the trials peculiar to a circuit preacher's wife with commendable patience—was a tender mother, and a loving wife; and when, after long months of painful suffering, she drew near the end of her pilgrimage, God put peculiar honor upon her, and she, who had never done so before, spoke her raptures in hallelujahs; and from that time she dwelt in Beulah until she was taken to paradise.

J. BARKER.

DIED.—Near Belmont, Alabama, at Mr. J. PHARIS's, infant Son of AUGUSTUS COLLMAN, aged two months and twenty-four days. This is the second child God has taken to heaven, from the embraces of father and mother. How hard to give these pledges of affection up, and how hard to witness their sufferings! It is indeed breaking the very hearts strings—almost makes the parents wish the babe had never been born. Often these lovely jewels know nothing but to suffer while here they stay. Oh! Merciful God why is it thus; Thou knowest, and because thou dost suffer it to be so give grace to sustain the bereaved. Disease gradually sucked away its existence, amid much suffering. It fell asleep, at last, in the embraces of him who said "I take these little lambs and lay them in my breast." Look up parents, you have children in heaven. It may be God will send these bright spirits after you, when you shall go hence.

MINUTES OF THE ANNUAL CONFERENCES.

The Book Editor earnestly requests the Presidents of the annual Conferences to forward to the Publishing House, without delay, the Minutes of the session of the Conferences at which they have lately presided, as he desires to prepare them for the press as early as possible. The Minutes of several of the Conferences have been received; but we cannot proceed to their publication until the Minutes of the rest are forwarded.

Our Other Church papers will confer a favor by copying this notice.

PRONUNCE.—The receipts of cotton and sugar on the river for the twenty-four hours ending at 6 o'clock last evening were, by the Piota, from Red River, 451 bales cotton; by the Storm, 710 bales; from Shreveport, 710 bales; by the R. W. McRae, from the Ouachita, 1469 bales; by the Laurel Hill, from Bayou Sara, 161; by the Latona, 8 bales. Total, 2803 bales, 1042 hhds. sugar and 2551 barrels molasses.

General Intelligence.

COTTON STILL IN DEMAND.—According to our daily commercial records, not less than thirty-two thousand bales of cotton have changed hands in this market during the last three days! Although the bulk of these purchases are said to be for Europe, it is a little singular that foreign freights have continued comparatively dull, and the quantity of cotton offering for shipment by no means proportionate to the heavy sales making for some time back.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—Between 4 and 5 o'clock, yesterday morning, a fire broke out in a rear building of Mrs. Weston's, on White street, above the cemetery Thalia, and before the flames could be stayed, they swept through from White to Hercules street, destroying about a dozen frame tenements—constituting at least half the square. On Hercules street, the residences of the Rev. Mr. Pauley, Mr. M. Aspell and Mr. Morgan, were destroyed, and the back parts of Mr. Frazier's and Mr. Vinton's residences considerably damaged. On White street, Mr. Cozzo's grocery at the corner of Thalia; Mrs. Weston's two tenements, Mr. Walgamot's two tenements, and the tenement stables and laundry of John Pulsun and his wife, five negroes were destroyed, with a great portion of their contents. Seventeen families living in Mr. Walgamot's back buildings, lost every thing. The houses on the opposite side of White street were severely scorched, and saved only by the heroic exertions of the few firemen on the spot. The houses destroyed were worth about $12,000, and were insured mostly in the Mechanic's Insurance Office. The fire is supposed to have been the work of an incendiary, having started in a vacant out-house, into which a family was to move in a day or two. There are loud and general complaints, not only among the people burnt out, but throughout the neighborhood and the fire department, that no alarm of the fire was given either by the ringing of bells or watchmen's calls. The only bell rung was that of a neighboring engine-house, which could be heard at but a very short distance, while the bell on Dryades Mark't, only a square from the fire, was never rung at all. There were plenty of engines on the spot, in time, and abundance of water to have stopped the fire quickly had there been men there to man the brakes. Watchman Ehl, of the Dryades Market beat, has been reported for his negligence.

The Alice W. Gloizo reached her wharf yesterday with a fair load from Port Barrake, twelve miles below Washington. Her captain reports the water in the bayous very low and difficult of navigation. The steamboat was at Port Barrake loading for New Orleans. The Alchafalaya is in good boating condition.

The steamer Jean Wobre, from Bayou Lafourche, reports about three feet water in the bayou and falling fast.

The steamer Alfin, Capt. Wallace, arrived yesterday from Yazoo City, with a load of 1422 bales cotton. From her officers we learn that the Yazoo River is very low and falling fast, with about three and a half feet water on the principal bars.

DEATH OF A SHIP'S CREW.—We learn from the Sandwich Advocate that Capt. Caleb Perry, of the coasting schooner Sylvia L., of Sandwich, together with his entire crew, died of cholera between the 5th and 15th ult. The vessel was on her passage from one of the river plantations in Georgia to Savannah, with a cargo of oysters, of which all hands partook freely. Mr. Solomon Newcomb, aged 39, died on the 5th; Capt. Caleb Perry, aged 29, on the 14th; and in the interim, Mr. Henry C. Butler, aged 18, another of the crew, a native of Connecticut, and the cook belonging to Chicago, Ill. All except the two last belonged in Monument, Sandwich. The owners of the vessel have placed her in charge of Mr. Keene, to be returned to Sandwich.

THE KINNEY EXPEDITION.—The New York Post announces upon "pretty high authority" that the Kinney Expedition has been projected for the purpose of establishing a convenient basis for future operations against Cuba. The new territory, it is thought, may form a convenient rendezvous for vessels to be fitted out and equipped for the invasion of any neighboring territory, without fear of violating any treaty stipulations or encountering any of the embarrassments which have spoiled so many filibustering expeditions from the United States within the last five years.

AN OWNER OF REAL ESTATE ARRESTED FOR HEADING.—Peter Swansburg, the owner of a lot and two houses, one of which he rents to several families, payable quarterly, was arrested at Albany, N. Y., recently, on the charge of obtaining, under the plea of poverty, a supply of fuel from the overseer of the poor. He was, however, subsequently let out, on refunding the value of the fuel.

The use of coal in England in the thirteenth century met with great opposition. A lecturer upon the subject, in Boston, says its use was prohibited by parliamentary law, under the impression that it produced disease. All milder punishments failing to stop its use, a law was passed making it a capital offence to burn coal. In the reign of Edward the First, a man was actually put to death for using it.

MORE NEW STATES.—The House of Representatives has passed the bill authorizing the people of Oregon to form a State constitution and prepare for admission into the Union. This bill will be accepted, and Oregon will doubtless be admitted during the next Congress. The admission of Minnesota cannot be delayed more than two years. Kansas, Nebraska and Washington territories will soon follow, and then our Union will consist of thirty-six sovereign States.

Gen. Houston, or "Sam," as he is familiarly called, attracts great attention in the Senate Chamber. It is said, by writing with an enormous quill in full feather, probably taken from an American eagle.

The British Admiralty Chart of the Arctic Sea lately issued gives to the land discovered by the Grinnell Expedition the name of "Grinnell's Land." In a former chart it had been called Prince Albert's Land. The correction is a handsome acknowledgment of Mr. Grinnell's benevolent enterprise.

A poor crippled dwarf, who drives about in a small carriage drawn by dogs, was arrested a few days ago in Richmond, Va., on a charge of peddling books without a license. The Mayor dismissed him without inflicting the fine but assured him he would not again be permitted to escape if arrested. Shop officials unanimous in city laws. Forbid an unfortunate cripple the means of honest livelihood!

On the night of the 27th ult., the dwelling house of Mr. John Crum, in Dauphin county, Pa., was destroyed by fire, and the charred bones of Mr. Crum were found in the ashes next day. The other members of the family were absent on the night of the fire, and it was supposed he had been murdered for the money and the building fired to conceal the bloody deed.

At Hornellsville, New York, on the evening of the 31st ult. J. Beers, the keeper of a bowling saloon in that place, was instantly killed by a blow on the head with a bottle in the hands of an Irishman named Stephen Hagan. A negro by the name of Henry Mills was also implicated. Both were arrested.

On the 31st ult. a collision occurred in Boston between the barks Wm M. Harris from Galveston for Boston and Celestia from Baltimore, off Cape Cod. The former was badly damaged and was abandoned by the crew, who were taken on board the Celestia. The abandoned vessel had a cargo of 500 bales of cotton.

SUSPECTED SLAVE VESSEL.—The United States District Attorney at New York, on the 31st ult., from information that a Baltimore clipper had just started from her mooring in the river for sea, and that suspicion existed of her being intended for a slave voyage to the Coast of Africa, dispatched a steamboat, having on board United States officers, with a view to overtaking the said vessel and making the necessary investigation.

The Baltimore Sun says that over 80,000 tons of guano, mostly from Peru arrived at that port last year, of which 17,000 tons remained in store on the 1st of January. Farmers are now purchasing for spring crops.

BREACH OF CONTRACT.—Wm. P. Furniss lately brought an action in the Supreme Court, in New York, against Wm H. Brown, the ship-builder, for breach of contract. Brown, he alleged had sold him half of the steamer Rhode Island, for $25,000, engaging to fit her up in a seaworthy condition for the California trade. She was sent to sea, and in a few days swamped. On Monday the jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff for $25,000 together with $11,813 50 in interest since November 10, 1849—making a total of $36,963 40.

In New York, a few days ago, a lady with a large shawl, was detected in concealing 4 hats. The price of which she had endeavored to beat down. On the clerk suggesting that she had better have it weighed before leaving the store, she left in a hurry.

SUDDEN DEATH.—Wright Southgate, Esq., cashier of the Exchange Bank at Norfolk, fell dead on Monday, the 28th ult., while in the discharge of his duties.

Particulars of Foreign News by the Africa.

THE SIEGE OF SEBASTOPOL.

Affairs in the Crimea are said to remain in about the same condition as at the date of previous advices. The latest intelligence is up to the 10th inst.

Omar Pasha was on the 5th at the head of the Allies when more news was concluded between him and Lord Raglan, and then Cathcart, and on the 6th he returned to Varna. Reinforcements continue to reach the cities and over 30 of the French imperial guard and English infantry are now on their way to the Crimea.

Lord Raglan has sent to India for the 5th English lancers.

The Turks in the Crimea are to be pushed strong before the end of January.

Russian interruptions are daily occurring by forced marches through the country.

The weather was severe and the roads impassible, though snow had fallen, but the freezing ground retarded the works of the besiegers.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

We are without anything respecting the invasion of Dobrudscha, excepting the following from the Wanderer of Vienna:

The Russians crossed the Danube at Tultscha, and favored by the obscurity of the night they reached the right bank in their boats, and surprised some of the weak garrisons, and after making great carnage recrossed the river laden with booty and taking with them a number of prisoners. There was called for the Tsar on the part of the Russians, as the Turks fought with desperate courage. Among the slain is a Pasha; but the enemy is also severely mauled. The inhabitants of Tultscha, seeing that the occupying with their wives and children, and if not before, with long after the departure of the Russians.

The Danube Gazette contains a telegraphic despatch from Vienna, stating that Prussia has concluded an alliance with Austria and the Germanic Confederation, assuming an aggressive attitude relative to the occupation of the Principalities by the Austrian troops, and their occupation of the Dardanelles, and threatening, as a matter of course, hostilities.

Vienna letters also boast of Austria's good faith and determination to proceed to hostilities.

Prussia, it will be remembered, has formally refused to mobilize and place part of her army in Prussian Silesia to cover the left flank of the Austrian forces now in Gallicia, and going as a reason her confidence in the pacific intentions of Russia.

Prussia further accuses Austria of having gone beyond the stipulation of her convention with Prussia inasmuch as she has concluded separate treaties with other powers, which virtually do away with that of April 20th.

The object of Prussia is to prevent Austria from taking an active part in the war.

Both from Berlin and Vienna it is stated that great efforts are made to obtain the consent of the Western Powers to an armistice.

The Prussian Cabinet is urging, with peculiar earnestness, the necessity of suspending hostilities until the belligerents have pursued further the present endeavor to arrive at an understanding. These are mere rumors, but nothing else is at present within the reach of the public.

An approaching congress of nations is more and more confidently talked of. The London Daily News says: "We may be induced to repose some confidence in the result of that congress's deliberations if the United States are invited to take part in them, and accept the invitation."

Private letters from Vienna say that Prince Gortschakoff has instructions to accept every basis, and accede to all the Allies may demand, except the relinquishment of the Russian fleet, and the occupation of the Russian territory.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. Richard Cobden has addressed his constituents at Leeds, stigmatizing the attack on Sebastopol as a colossal mistake, and arguing that the main question should now be how to get out of it. Other speakers addressed the meeting almost unanimously in favor of the war.

Mr Buchanan transacted business on the 30th inst., at the Foreign Office.

Malicious reports are in circulation that the Government has offered Gen. Sir De Lacy Evans an appointment in India, so as to get rid of his contemplated disclosures in Parliament.

Seven hundred men of the 82d regiment embarked from Liverpool in the steamer Indiana for the Crimea.

Four hundred of the London Rock Brigade have been sent to the Crimea to unload ships.

The late of the British ship Bernice, missing since 1852 from Shanghai, is discovered. The Europeans on board were murdered by the Lascar crew, and the ship burned. The assassins have been captured and executed.

FRANCE.

Messrs Baring Brothers & Co announce that they will repay English deposits on the French loan. The total amount of the loan being taken in France. English applicants took six millions sterling, and the French eighteen millions sterling, one hundred and seventy-seven thousand persons have taken shares indicating that the early more popular in France than some writers supposed.

Eighteen hundred of the Imperial Guard were embarked at Marseilles on the 14th, in steamers for the Crimea.

The closing prices for French funds were for three per cents 68.70. Four and a half per cents, 95; and Bank shares, 2980.

SARDINIA.

Sardinia is reported as being willing to undertake to send 15,000 men, recruited from all Italy, to the aid of the Allies to the East—the reason assigned being that for what it can raise in supernumeraries to engage their attention, the Italians are growing restless.

The Debats avers that Piedmont has assented to the treaty of the 10th of April and not the treaty of December.

The Opinione of Turin of the 15 h inst. states that the departure of the Piedmontese troops for the Crimea will take place on the 28th of February. According to that journal, the contingent is to consist of 20,000 men, 15,000 of whom will embark on that day, and the additional 5000 are to form the reserve.

GERMANY.

The Senates of Hamburg and Lubec have issued edicts forbidding foreign enlistment, and it is said to be resolved that Bremen, Mecklenburg-Schwerin and Gerolitz will issue prohibitions of the same description. The army of Bavaria has almost completed its war complement.

SWEDEN.

Letters say that the Swedish army is immediately to be placed on a war footing by the addition of 50,000 Swedes and 15,000 Norwegians.

RUSSIA.

Russia is preparing for a spring campaign. Gen Siewen is charged with the organization of a Baltic army, having Mitau for headquarters.

A six-fold land tax, payable in twenty-four instalments, is to be imposed on Polish proprietors.

DENMARK.

The bill altering the constitution has passed the first reading in the Legislature.

SWITZERLAND.

A conference is about to be opened, with a view of adjusting the existing difficulties between Austria and Switzerland.

SPAIN.

The new constitution was submitted on the 13th to the Chambers. The main features of it are: That sovereignty emanates from the nation; that the religion of the nation is Roman Catholic, but that toleration will be allowed; that the press shall be free; that confiscation of property and the death penalty for political offences, are abolished. The National Guard is established. The legislature shall consist of two Chambers—Senators are to be elected for life, on property qualifications, upon representative for every fifty thousand citizens. The Cortes shall meet annually in October for four months, the Crown shall regulate the strength of the army, and appeal to royal marriages, and appoint a regency when occasion requires.

In addition to the above, a telegraphic dispatch from London, dated 11 A. M. Saturday, received in Liverpool by the steamer left says: "There is literally nothing new or important."

On the 28th ult., the morning train from Portland to Bath and Augusta, Me., ran off the track about three miles from Freemansett river, in Falmouth. The engine was precipitated down an embankment into a small stream, carrying the engineer, Mr. Small and the fireman, Mr Ames with it. Mr Small was fastened before he could be extricated and was drowned, while Mr Ames was instantly killed. The passengers escaped uninjured. The engine has since been placed upon the road. It is not stated whether any blame is to be attached to any body, but it may be stated as a fact that a train never has passed over this line without meeting with some accident as the result either of immoderate rapid speed or of unintelligency in the conductors, after running to the road.

Departure of the Pacific.

NEW YORK, Feb. 7.—The Collins steamship Pacific sailed at noon to-day for Liverpool, with the United States mails, 303 passengers, and about $3,000 in specie.

Breaking up of the Ice in the Mississippi—Steamers Injured.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 7.—By the breaking up of the ice above the city, several steamers were badly injured. The Banner state was crushed in the ice, and a part of her cabin completely wrecked. The Arabia had her guards badly damaged. The Martin No. 2 had a hole punched in her hull. The Alhambra was sunk, and several barges and flatboats were broken to splinters.

MARINE DISASTERS.—A correspondent of the New York Herald, writing under date of the 20th ult., says:

The bark Argyle is ashore on Squam Beach. She is from Glasgow, bound to New York, with a cargo of pig iron, cement, silks and dry goods. The ship struck at 12 o'clock on the night of the 20th. It is now 3 P. M. of the 22d, and the ship is lying on her beam ends, her masts have fallen, and her top with the masts, sails and rigging, have been cut away and washed inside of the bar. One man swam from the wreck and was saved. There were ten men composing the boat's company with one passenger, the pilot, master and four of the crew were drowned, and the men on the wreck when I left, which was 1 o'clock, P. M., were in possible to save life and property.

The same writer states that the schooner Solomon Andrews which sailed from Charleston for New York on the 20th, with a cargo of rice, had gone ashore on Deacons Shoal, and would prove a total loss. The captain, crew and two passengers were taken off by boats.

The brig R. D. Morton, of Camden, Me., bound to Philadelphia, from Savannah, foundered in the neighborhood of the Solomon Andrews the same night. The crew, seven in number, were taken off by a schooner and carried into Ocracoke.

The brig Molunkus, Captain Bailey, of Eastport, from Havana for Boston, with a cargo of four hundred hogsheads of molasses went ashore on Sunday, the 28th ult., on Block Island. The captain and crew went ashore to obtain assistance, and while there the vessel got off herself, and was not heard of again until Monday, when she was fallen in with by a boat's crew of Islanders, and carried into Newport.

WIFE SHOT BY HER HUSBAND—Accident.—We learn, says the Columbus Enquirer, that a man living in Russell county, Ala., went to the house of Mr. George Moore, who lives about three miles west of Girard, and while there, a serious altercation ensued between the parties, during which Mr. Moore took down his gun and was in the act of shooting his antagonist, when Mrs. Moore ran in between them, to prevent her husband's designs. But she was too late to effect her object; the gun was discharged, wounding her so seriously, that her life is despaired of. The particulars of the affray, which has terminated so horribly we are not in possession of.

BUOYANT AND BALL PROOF.—A Mr. Clarkson has invented a new life preserving device, by which, a new material which he has invented, consisting of a combination of cork, and wood, which he states, possesses many advantages over wood and iron, pure and simple, being lighter, stronger and more elastic. His invention he says will be most useful in warfare, as he can construct boats that cannot be swamped; and with portable sides, easily moved and carried, which might protect boats' crews, and which cannot be penetrated by Minie balls fired at a distance of twenty yards, pieces of strong wood or timber being broken in pieces when subjected to similar trial.

FIRE IN VICKSBURG.—The Vicksburg Whig, of the 6th, gives the following particulars of the recent fire in that town:

About 2 o'clock yesterday morning our city was startled by the cry of fire in the rear of the house occupied by John Delahunt as a gun and sheet iron factory, on Washington street, opposite the Washington Hotel. His building was entirely consumed, together with his tools, stock in trade, furniture, and, we believe, every thing belonging to his family. From thence the fire spread to the two adjoining brick houses, and they were entirely destroyed before the progress of the flames could be arrested.

The first of these buildings was occupied below by B. Bloom, as a clothing store, and the second story by Dr. Manly, dentist, and B. Hagey, magistrate. We learn that the clothing was principally saved, but every thing else in the dentist and magistrate's office, Casey and the docket of S. L. George, a former justice.

The next was occupied as a coffee-house, billiard room, etc., by L. Patsanna. The contents were almost all destroyed.

The house occupied by Mr. Dubuisot was owned by Mr. Delahunt, and it is said it had been insured for $1500, but was not occupied by Mr. Patsanna, and were not insured.

The house of Mr. Murphy Griffin, of Salisbury N. C., was consumed by fire on Saturday, the 27th ult., and three persons were frightfully burned, one of whom, a girl nine years of age, has since died.

CONGRESSIONAL.

WASHINGTON, Feb 1, 1855.

SENATE.—Mr. Mallory submitted a resolution requiring the Secretary of the Navy to communicate to the Senate the results of the recent test of the dock, railway and basin at the Pensacola Navy Yard, and also whether said dock, railway and basin have been accepted by the Government. Agreed to.

Mr. M. submitted another resolution inquiring into the propriety of the expenditure by a board of officers, under the direction of the Secretary of War, of an appropriation in gunnery practice and the preparation and use of shot, shell and other projectiles. Agreed to.

Bills were reported incorporating the Metropolitan Mechanics Institute and the Columbia Wood Gas Company of the District of Columbia.

The Army Appropriation bill was taken up, and the amendment providing for the raising of four additional companies to suppress Indian hostilities was agreed to, and two and a half millions were appropriated for that purpose.

HOUSE.—Two territorial bills, in addition to the eleven noticed yesterday, were passed.

The bill authorizing the construction of a line of telegraph (by private enterprise) from the Mississippi or Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, was passed in an amended form. Yeas 110, nays 70.

It merely gives the right of way, and extends the laws of the United States over the line for its protection, but does not confer the two millions of acres of land, as originally proposed.

The House took up the bill for the establishment of the office of Survey-General in Utah and to grant lands in actual settlers, the question pending being on concurring in the report of the committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, striking out the enacting clause.

This motion was disagreed to—yeas 91, nays 97—but the bill was afterwards indefinitely postponed, when

Mr Disney offered a substitute for the bill, merely providing to establish the office of surveyor-General in Utah and granting lands for school and university purposes, omitting grants of lands to actual settlers.)

The bill in this form was subsequently passed.

The reason it was plainly indicated by the remarks of members, for refusing grants of lands, was on account of the domestic institution of Utah, which tolerates polygamy.

Mr. Thompson gave notice of his intention to move to go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill to reduce the tariff, on Wednesday next at 1 o'clock.

After some unimportant proceedings on a private bill, the House adjourned.

Allison on the Russian War.

...ddress at the opening of the Mechan... at Boulam Harbor, on the 3d o... Sir Archibald Alison, the distin... historian, made the following reference to the Russian war:

"It was the interest of the war that it was of very less importance that they should know the nature of the enemy with whom they had to contend. He was not an insignificant enemy. The Emperor Nicholas has over 70,000,000 o... souls, all devoted to war. Commerce, agriculture, science, literature, philosophy were in their infancy; all the talent of the Empire was devoted to war. Every young man of ability was sent to the military schools; in these schools 30,000 young men were educated to the science of war, the ablest of whom were selected for the duties of diplomacy. At the head of the Empire they found a man of vast energy, unshaken courage and great determination. He devoted the energies of the great Empire to the objects of external aggression, and was actually supported by the whole Russian nation; every man, from the Emperor down to the serf, was impressed with the idea that Russia was to be the conqueror of the world. The Emperor was now making war on the idea that he was merely giving vent to the national feeling. To him might be applied, with the alteration of a few words, the lines of one of the greatest poets of the last century:

> No charms he finds pacific sceptres yield,
> War sounds the trumpet, he hurries to the field;
> Ocean nothing, he cries, while anglers marine
> On Scamander's towers, till Russian standards fly,
> And all is mine beneath the Eastern sky.

Now, how was it that in the contest with this great Power they had made so sudden a transition from the exultation of victory to almost the despondency of defeat? They saw a great deal in the journals endeavoring to throw blame on this and that Ministry, on this and that General. Somebody stood there to vindicate one Ministry or another—to vindicate one General or another. But he stood there to point out to his fellow-countrymen the errors—he might almost say the national crimes—which were now meeting with national punishment. They were now in a state of anxiety here on account of the state of the army in the Crimea. Why was it that the noble army which had done so... great things, had been exposed to such defeats? Just reason it was one half its proper size. Let them open the papers, and they would find the reason why the English were in a much worse position than the French; our army, of 30,000 men was obliged to do the work of 60,000 men. While the French were only obliged to go into the trenches once in every four days, the English soldiers must go in every other night. This of course weakens their frame, and they are unable to bear the cold, wet, and storms which prevail in that inhospitable climate. If England, when the war broke out, had had 100,000 regular troops, 10,000 cavalry, and 8,000 militia, they would have gained a decisive victory in the first campaign. Suppose they had had 100,000 to transport, they might have sent 40,000 to the Baltic, and taken Cronstadt, and 60,000 to the Crimea and taken Sebastopol. Why, if 6,000 cavalry instead of 700 had been at the battle of Alma, they would have converted it into a total route, and the Russian army, broken and disorganized, would have been unable to defend Sebastopol.

At the battle of Balaklava, after the lapse of 400 years on the very anniversary of the battle of Agincourt, if there had been 5000 English troops, the valuable road from Balaklava would have been preserved, and supplies would have been carried up with perfect safety. 5000 English horses would have marched triumphantly through 10,000 Russians. The battle of Inkermann, destined to be immortal in the world, and to take its place with the battles of Marathon and Platea; at that battle, if we had 30,000 more English troops, while with the right wing we hurled the Russian battalions down the heights, with the left wing we would have taken Sebastopol, and the two Grand Dukes would have come up to the theatre of action only to see the total destruction of their father's hopes. Now mark what a dreadful state their army had been brought into in consequence of the incessant clamor for reduction. If they contemplate the good effects of war, they have only to call out their armies, and let the officers who have been trained in every luxury, and the soldiers accustomed to every comfort, enduring patiently every hardship and submitting to every privation, and ready every moment to lay down their lives for the country. But can also the good effect of the war on the nation. Let them look around and they would see people of all classes, from the Queen to the peasant, even including the captive in his dungeon, sacrificing certain comforts and doing every thing in their power to provide for the widows and children of those who had fallen in the service of their country. He would say one word of consolation for those who were left bereaved—the memory of those who were so dear to them were cabalmed in the recollection of a grateful country, their names would never be forgotten, and to them they might apply the beautiful lines of the poet:

> By fairy hands their knell is rung,
> By forms unseen their dirge is sung,
> There honor comes a pilgrim gray,
> To deck the turf that wraps their clay;
> And freedom shall a while repair,
> To dwell a weeping hermit there.

Seizure of the Steamship Massachusetts.

We find in the New York Times, of the 29th, the following particulars concerning the seizure of the steamship Massachusetts, as she was leaving for this port, and a letter from Capt. Goodrich, which we append:

On Saturday last Deputy Sheriff Joseph Lynden, with the United States Deputy Marshals, proceeded on board the steamer Massachusetts to make a search for arms supposed to be in her. Her holds, fore and aft, were searched, as were also the ladies' cabins, upper and lower; but nothing was found to justify the reports that have been circulated in reference to the vessel. Several boxes were discovered in the ladies' after cabin, which were found to contain pack, dray and saddle harness, martingales, surcingles, gearing, and other articles of a similar character. Single saddles, and holsters for pistols were also found, but nothing which the officers were in search of. The Massachusetts had on board water and provision for twelve days, sufficient to last her until she reached New Orleans, as reported.

Captain Goodrich states that he designed to proceed to New Orleans with the steamer, and to run her between that city and Texas, for the transportation of cattle. He denies that the steamer was to have been used for any such purpose as the one alleged.

We subjoin the following letter from Captain Goodrich:

SIR: A publication appeared in several papers yesterday to the effect that my vessel had been seized by the United States Marshal, and that she had on board arms and ammunition, and was going to the Island of Cuba. My steamer, the Massachusetts, was seized, it is true, upon the representation of the Spanish consul; but that she had any weapons or ammunition aboard, or intended to sail for any other port than New Orleans, is entirely false. I have emptied counsel, and offered at once to have my vessel thoroughly searched. After much delay, and a heavy expense, which I cannot well afford, an examination by the Deputy Surveyor has shown the utter falsehood of the libels upon her. Is there no way in which an American master can be protected from such outrages upon the part of our Government officers at the dictation of an agent of a foreign Government? Or is it no longer possible for an outward bound vessel to proceed upon her lawful voyage until she obtains the consent of the Spanish Consul? They treat our vessels bad enough at sea and in their own ports; but it seems to be asking too much for them to sanely and injure us at our own wharves.

The charges against my ship are entirely from beginning to end, and I will have redress if the laws of our land will afford it. Will you insert this in your valuable paper, to correct the garbled story which has appeared heretofore, and oblige, your obedient servant,

JAMES W. GOODRICH,
Master of steamer Massachusetts.

New York, July 27, 1855.

Seizure of the Steamship Massachusetts.

At a recent meeting of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company at Pittsburg, it was shown that the expenses for the past year have been $1,111,626, or $200,000 more than last year. Gen. Latimer, the superintendent, had the same to say of the net earnings of the road in the last six months have been so large as to enable the directors to charge the whole of it to profit and loss, and to pay the interest on the debt of the company, and after providing for a stock dividend of five per cent. to carry over a surplus of about $50,000 to the next half year.

The British ship Glencairn, from Greenock, entered at Mobile on Friday last with 126 Scotch emigrants, whom it is intended to employ in the Dog River factory, at least such of them as are old enough and otherwise suited, there being forty-one children and infants among their number.

ILLEGAL WORK, CARRIAGE.—We learn, says the Mobile Star, that Noah E. Smith, the efficient express agent, prized upon some two hundred letters in the hands of Adams & Co.'s express agent, while crossing the Isthmus on their point and California. It is said that these letters are in the hands of carrying a number of letters outside the mail, which they delivered, collecting postage for the same, to the great injury of the Post Office Department. There is a heavy penalty attached to the violation of the law.

From Santa Fe.

The St. Louis Republican of the 25th has the following telegraphic despatch from Independence:

The Santa Fe mail arrived yesterday. By it we learn that the Indians have begun their depredations again. The Mescalleros band ran off four hundred head of Lyon's and Russell's cattle, wintering on Red River. Some started after them and recovered upwards of a hundred, after pursuing them two hundred miles. A detachment from Bent are now out in the White Mountains still in pursuit. A post is to be established on the route to protect the southern settlement. The Jicarilla Apaches are also north, and the Utahs are doing foul little harm. Among the latter small pox is raging violently.

Chico Velasquez, the chief, who took Mr White and party has died with it. Capt. Ewell, in command of the coming party, set aside after the Indians about the 1st March. Maj. Holland returned from the Mesilla Valley on the 18th, and has published his order, taking military possession of the country.

The Legislature was not in session, but the Governor said that body do not get along very fragmentarily. The patriotic body refused to pay the freight on a number of books presented in the Territory by Congress, because they were English books, and did not want them. They do not refuse English dollars; why not change the order of Government.

Mr. Johnson, of Baltimore, and Judge Watts, of Indiana, were passengers by the mail stage. By them we learn that the traders at El Paso, except Mr. Carrol, had not yet been able to enter their goods through the Custom house. Some of the sheep merchants from California were returning for further supplies from Chihuahua and New Mexico.

Messrs Beck and Giddings, at Santa Fe, had all their fine sheep, lately from the States, ran off by the Mescalaros Indians.

There was but little snow on the plains, and the mail party came in pleasantly.

We just here, on Saturday last, a violent snow storm commenced before sunrise. The snow is thirteen to twenty-five inches in depth, and drifting in places four to five feet.

Extraordinary Balloon Ascension by a Lady and Miraculous Escape.

—The following is from the correspondence of the New York Herald, dated Easton, Pa., January 20:

I see you have in your telegraphic columns of to-day's Herald, a brief account of the balloon ascension of Miss Louise Bradley from this place yesterday. Her escape from death was so miraculous that I think you will find a more detailed account interesting. Miss B. filled her balloon entirely with gas from one of the street mains, and at 11 o'clock stepped fearlessly into the car. She is a small delicate looking woman, and was dressed in a Bloomer costume of scarlet and blue. The balloon, held by a rope, was then permitted to rise about twenty feet, when she was pulled to the ground, when she made a short address to the crowd in pencil. It then rose gently, still held by the rope, until she was one hundred feet from the ground, when she cut the cord; and the balloon rose perpendicularly with great velocity, until she had reached a mile, or a mile and a quarter, as it was estimated by those present who were best able to judge.

Miss Bradley appears, from her own account, that she knew very little about the business she had undertaken, or of the effects likely to be produced upon the balloon when it reached the rarified atmosphere. The balloon was old, see, and the silk had become so rotten that it is wonderful that it would bear inflation at all. When she reached this height, she states that the balloon, which was not entirely filled when it left the earth, expanded until the gas began to escape at the seams, and became very offensive to her. She had been so absorbed by the enchanting prospect spread out beneath her, which she says was magnificent beyond the power of language to describe, that she had not noticed the balloon. The escape of gas alarmed her, and she pulled the valve rope, but permitted but little gas to escape, as she was afraid she would fall into the Delaware, which was directly beneath her.

In a few moments after this the balloon collapsed, and to our horror and alarm, we saw her fall with frightful rapidity for the distance of six hundred or seven hundred feet, her progress thus being checked, from what cause we below could not see, although we then observed that she was descending quite slowly. It seems that when the balloon burst, it was torn into ribbons, except the lower part or neck of the balloon. So completely was the upper part torn to pieces, that large pieces of silk blew away, and the remainder hung down from below the car. When she had fallen this distance the neck of the balloon suddenly blew up, turning inside out, and catching against the net-work, formed a parachute, which bore her safely to the ground. She came down in an open field, and so lightly did the car strike the earth that she says there was not the slightest jar. Her presence of mind was extraordinary. After this fearful toil, and when the balloon was still descending with terrific velocity, she threw out her sand bags and anchor, and then with the utmost calmness commenced singing a hymn. She alighted about four miles from this place. The trip must be considered a quick one, as at a quarter past 12 she rode into town safe and in fine spirits.

From Santa Fe.—

We find some interesting news in the Santa Fe correspondence of the San Antonio Texan. The writer under date of December 31, states that the mail contractor would leave the next day without the mails, because the Postmaster there refused to deliver them to the new contractor. It seems that Postmasters in that section are quite despotical and independent. They refuse to deliver mails in new contractors the old ones declining to act, because not advised officially from Washington of their appointment.

The Legislature was in session at the date of this letter, and we learn with some regret that one of the Mexican members was "about to introduce a bill abolishing the Constitution of the United States of America."

A rumor, according to the correspondent of the Texan was current that the American flag in Mesilla Valley had been pulled down by the Mexicans, and the Mexican national tri-colors raised in their place. It was also reported that American "troops from Fort Fillmore had gone over to raise the flag and pull down the usurper."

ANNEXATION OF CANADA.—Lord Elgin, wishing to leave behind him some memento of his magnanimity, ordered letters of pardon to be issued to the unfortunate petitioners for annexation to the United States. The letters benignly assume that the sentiment which gave rise to that petition exists no longer, and graciously condescends to reinstate them in the positions which they occupied previous to their lamentable hallucination. But these unhappy men seem to be entirely insensible to the generosity of the late Governor-General. One of them, M. Flypolite Cherrier, publishes in Le Moniteur Canadien the following reply to an invitation to resume his station in the militia:

"MONTREAL, Monday, Jan. 15, 1855.

"SIR: In reply to your note of the 9th, I have the honor to inform you on my part that my opinions, with regard to the annexation of Canada to the United States are unchanged. That I desire the accomplishment of this as soon as possible, and as I have no intention of serving her most gracious and most excellent Majesty in case of rupture with our neighbors, either as officer or private, I beg you to be so kind as to accept my resignation, and erase my name from the list of the faithful and loyal subjects of her Majesty.

"Receive, Monsieur, the assurance of my distinguished consideration. "O. HYPOLITE CHERRIER."

GOOD TARGET PRACTICE.—The author of a Rifle and the Hound in Ceylon"—a work filled with exciting sketches of the most exciting description—gives the following account of a little target practice in which he indulged one afternoon, and by which he got the range of his favorite "four-ounce" rifle: "Just as I was quitting the shores of the lake, I noticed three buffaloes in the shallows, about knee-deep in the water, nearly half a mile from me. They did not look bigger than dogs, the distance was so great. There is nothing like a sheet of water for trying a rifle: the splash of the ball shows with such distinctness the accuracy of the effect in the shooting. It was necessary that I should fire my guns off in order to clean them that evening, and I therefore tried their power at this immense distance. The long two ounce fell short, but in a good line. I took a rest upon a man's shoulder with the four-ounce rifle, and, putting up the last load I arrived at the leading buffalo, who was walking through the water parallel with us. I aimed at the outlines of the throat, to allow for his pace at this great distance. The recoil of the rifle cut the man's ear open, (first blood this at all events!) as there were sixteen drachms of powder in this charge. We watched the smooth surface of the water, as the invisible messenger whistled over the lake. Certainly three seconds elapsed before we saw the slightest effect. At the expiration of that time, the buffalo fell suddenly in a sitting position, and there he remained fixed. Many seconds after, a dull sound returned to our ears—it was the "fut" of the ball, which had positively struck him at this immense range. What the distance was I cannot say: it may have been 600 or 800 yards, or more. It was shallow water the whole way, and we therefore mounted our horses and rode up to him. Upon reaching him, I gave him a settling ball in the head, and then we examined him. He was very bull-headed, completely through the hips, crushing both joints, and of course rendering him powerless at once. The shore appeared full half a mile from us on our return; and I could hardly credit my own eyes, the distance seemed so immense—and yet the ball had passed clean through the animal's body."

According to the last annual report of the New York State Engineer, there was on the railroads of that commonwealth, during the year 1854, one passenger killed for every 3,440,015 miles traveled, and one passenger injured for every 1,781,606 miles traveled. Although nine millions of passengers were carried an aggregate distance of 500,000,000 miles during the year, not one was killed from causes beyond his own control.

A TERROR TO EVIL-DOERS.—Judge Worrell, of Muscogee county, Ga., this charged a jury recently, to the great dismay of rowdies, bullies and assassins:

The object of the law is not revenge, but to deter others from the commission of crime. Until the administration of my immediate predecessor the practice of the court in this circuit has been to administer the law, as far as practicable, in favor of the guilty. The practice is at an end. I am determined that for the next four years the law shall be a terror to evil-doers. Hitherto life and property have been insecure. It is now time honest men should be protected in their rights."

A NEW NATIVE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA.—Dates from the Cape of Good Hope to November 7th, state that a very painful occurrence had taken place in the Trans-Vaal country. The Bloemfontein Gazette of October 3d reports that intelligence had reached the town that fourteen burghers and a brother of Commandant General Pretorius, who had gone hunting beyond Zoutpans Berg, had all been murdered. President Hoffman had also received advices from Pretorius that seven powerful native tribes on the north-east of him had risen, that twenty-three persons, including wives and children, had been destroyed by these natives, and that the village of Zoutpans Berg had been cut off.

In 1854, 29,480 emigrants left Antwerp for the United States. They came to our shores on board of ninety-five ships.

The Immortality of Chivalry.

BY JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE.

> The splendid chivalry of war may cease,
> But never fail the chivalry of peace!
> The errant gallantry of Quixote dies,
> But not the Bayard deeds of high emprise—
> The hope, the faith, the courage and the love,
> Whose wars are but a radiance from above;
> The heart to dare, the ready hand to do,
> The eager zeal, which to the truth is true,
> Fearless in danger, bold beside the hearth,
> Faithful to God without forgetting earth—
> Such is the chivalry which triumphs now,
> Disarmed its hand, no corpse upon its brow—
> Such is the chivalry of truth and right,
> The grand disliterd on of the Christian knight;
> Bright without blood, without pageantry proud,
> The chivalry of Woodruff and McLeod!
>
> Arthur's round table crumbles to the dust,
> The lightning sword of Charlemagne is rust,
> Sidney has vanished from the lists of fame,
> And Roland leaves, at best, but half a name;
> Yet not in vain the heroes lived and died,
> Nor worthless all their courage and their pride;
> Great lives are roots of heroic noble deeds,
> And flowers still spring where a hero bleeds;
> Great thoughts bear golden fruit, which blooms for ages,
> And those which thrilled the past inspire to-day;
> The human heart is ever true and bold,
> And time its testings to the pulse of old;
> The Roman but anticipates in date,
> The "broken column" of the fireman's fate,
> And men recall how Phillips met his doom,
> In dreamful walks by Irad Ferry's tomb!
>
> Honor the bereaved of our native land,
> The fearless, true, self sacrificing band—
> From out the hottest heart of a lifting flame;
> The white tire's brightest splendor on high,
> In living fire across God's startled sky;
> The knights who never shed a brother's blood,
> But laugh at death, for sake of human good;
> Who wield no sword, and fling no challenge glove,
> Yet fight for honor and for lady's love;
> No sunshine knights, no mercenary tribe,
> Who take fire for ostentation or a bribe—
> Honor the men who never were dismayed,
> Our own, our bold, unpensioned Fire Brigade!
>
> Arthur's round table crumbled to the dust,
> The lightning sword of charlemagne is rust,
> Sidney has vanished from the lists of fame,
> And Roland leaves, at best, but half a name;
> Our heroes live, and long may they remain
> The standing army of the people's reign—
> Long may the glories of the Fireman bloom,
> And blossom flower-like round his honored tomb!

LIEUT. "ALVARADO" HUNTER.—The unexpected return of Lieut. Hunter with the Baluhridge, has created much speculation, and a court martial, it is said, will be immediately convened. Lieut. H. has published an address "to the American public," in defence of his course. It appears he was anxious to take part in the quarrel between the President of Paraguay and Consul Hopkins and brother. To this his commanding officer objected, whereupon the Lieutenant hoisted sail and came home. We quote the material portion of his address, as follows:

"Circumstances in a high degree involving the honor of our flag, have occurred near the station to which I have been attached.—No helping hand has been given to our unfortunate countrymen. Exposed to the wrath of a tyrant, they have been driven from Paraguay, their property has been confiscated, and our flag, so proud because it waves as a banner for the oppressed of every land, who chose to come under its folds, has been, by order of a petty tyrant, hauled down and trampled under foot.

"I could not help our countrymen, because I was not permitted to go there with my command. I was sent away where difficulties had not occurred, although the American Consul at Buenos Ayres expressed his wonder at my absence from the difficulty, as though my inaction had been a voluntary one.

"Vessels of war are abroad for the sole purpose of protecting the lives, property and rights of our citizens. When I found that my requests to go to Paraguay were refused by the Commander-in-chief of the Brasil squadron, when one month later he had direct and authentic information from Lieut. Moore, of the navy, of the actual condition of affairs in Paraguay, and the means to send me orders again at hand; when I saw that the fear of responsibility made the Commander-in-chief yet decline sending me where a vessel-of-war was so much needed, I no longer hesitated, but brought back my command to the United States, rather to ingloriously rot in the mud than ingloriously sail upon the ocean."

DEFINITION OF "SPORT."—The actual killing of an animal, the death itself, is not "sport," unless the circumstances connected with it are such as to create that peculiar feeling which can only be expressed by the word "sport." This feeling can not exist in the heart of a butcher; he would as soon slaughter a fine buck by tying him to a post and knocking him down, as he would shoot him in his wild native haunts. The actual moment of death, the fact of killing, is his enjoyment. To a true sportsman, the enjoyment of a sport increases in proportion to the wildness of the country. Catch a six-pound trout in a quiet mill pond, in a populous manufacturing neighborhood, with well cultivated meadows on either side the stream, cattle grazing on the rich pasturage, and perhaps actually watching you as you land your fish. It may be sport; but catch a similar fish, far from the haunts of men, in a boiling rocky torrent, surrounded by heathery mountains, where the shadow of a rod has seldom been reflected in the stream, and you cease to think the former fish worth catching. Still he is the same fish, showed the same courage, has the same perfection of condition, and yet you can not allow that the first sport compared with the wild stream. If you see no difference in the excitement, you are not a sportsman.—You would as soon catch him in a washing-tub; and you should buy your fish when you require him, but never use a rod, as you would disgrace the hickory.

THE WEATHER.—The weather has got to be clear, beautiful and spring like. The ladies were out in overwhelming numbers yesterday, and Camp, Canal and Chartres streets were perfectly surfeited with beauty. We observed a corresponding change in the goods at clothiers doors, and in dry goods and hat windows, upon which the passers by looked admiringly. The delicate green of the new spring grass is becoming apparent in the public squares, and the tree-buds are springing into existence. Winter is about gone.

It is said that the President is in possession of highly gratifying intelligence from Utah. The Mormons are not only docile, but are much pleased with their new Governor, whom they soon hope to convert to their religious faith. Several of the officers under Col. Steptoe have declared the disapproval of the Mormon custom relative to matrimony. It is to be hoped that these gentlemen have not left any very near and dear family the behind them.

The gold mines of Virginia are valued at $1,700,000. The great difficulty in the way of gold mining in Virginia, as in other States, has been the want of adequate machinery. This difficulty is thought to be overcome by John Cochrane, an eminent mechanic of New York, in an invention of a machine with which, it is said, one hand can crush to impalpable powder, thirty tons of quartz rock per day of twelve hours. It is expected now that as soon as the present stringency of the money market is relieved, the spare funds of the capitalists of the State will be, in a good degree, devoted to investments in gold mining interests.

RUSSIAN AND FRENCH SOLDIERS.—A lively writer from Paris draws a parallel between the soldiers of the different nations now fighting in the Crimea, and first says of the Russians:

The valor displayed by the Russians in the night attacks on the Allies has never been surpassed by the soldiers of any nation or people whatever. The Russian soldier lacks strategy and quickness of movement; but he possesses courage almost without parallel, a remarkable strength of body, and great resistance to the exhausting effects of wounds. It has been a common remark, from the day of Napoleon to the present moment, that the Russian soldiers are the most difficult soldiers in the world to put hors du combat. Marshal Ney said: "It will not suffice to shoot a Russian soldier; he must be pushed over." Remarkable instances of this power of resistance to the loss of blood and to the first impressions of a wound have been exhibited since the commencement of the campaign in the Crimea, and it is no doubt due to the rude life which the Russian soldier is subjected, not only as a soldier, but as a peasant.

Next he says of the Frenchman:

While eating is no part of a soldier's life in the Russian camp, in the French camp it is quite the contrary. A Frenchman must have his breakfast before he fights, and he will cook and eat it in the midst of bursting bombs rather than miss it; for between the fear of losing his breakfast and his life there is about an even balance. On the morning of the battle of Inkermann 7500 Englishmen were compelled to stand the shock of 35,000 Russians for three hours, before the French division arrived, the latter having stopped to eat their breakfast before starting to the aid of their suffering allies. They fought beautifully, as they always do, when they did arrive, but in the meantime there had been a fearful slaughter of Englishmen, which otherwise might have been saved. This is one of the facts which do not appear in print for the good of the alliance, but it is nevertheless true.

MISSOURI UNITED STATES SENATOR.—Advices from Jefferson City to the evening of the 27th ult., state that the Legislature of Missouri, up to that time, had made no choice for United States Senator to succeed Mr. Benton. Only one ballot was taken on the 27th, with the result: Benton, 57; Atchison, 59; Bonjhan, 52; Hall, 1; Wilson, 1.

The Montgomery (Ala.) papers of the 1st inst. state: We learn that a gentleman on this way to Texas, was robbed on Tuesday, on the Louisville road, near this city, of $1600, by two foot-pads, who, with a pistol at his head, made him stand and deliver. Officers are after the scamps, but we learn, have not yet arrested them.

By letter from Gov. Brown to the postmaster at Jackson, Miss., enclosing a note from Mr. Dundas, Assistant Postmaster General, the Mercury learns that the Department has at last concluded to receive bids for the much needed daily mail service between Jackson and the head of the New Orleans Railroad. Bids will be received for daily service in four-horse coaches.

Among the "subjects for premiums," just published by the Institution of Civil Engineers in Great Britain, we find: "An inquiry into the causes which have hitherto prevented the asserted high speeds of steam navigation on the American rivers from being arrived at in England."

A note to the Korna relates the following legend: "The angel of death passing once by Solomon in a visible shape, and looking at one who was sitting with him, the man asked who he was, and upon Solomon's acquainting him that it was the angel of death, said, 'He seems to want me, wherefore, order the wind to carry me hence into India;' which, being accordingly done, the angel said to Solomon, 'I looked so earnestly at the man out of wonder; because I was commanded to take his soul into India, and found him with thee in Palestine.'"

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE respectfully announce that the present number contains the conclusion of the "Memoirs of Napoleon Bonaparte," which have so long formed an important portion of the Magazine. They have made arrangements to supply its place with articles which they hope will prove equally attractive. Among those already in course of preparation are the following:

I. BIOGRAPHIES OF DISTINGUISHED AMERICANS, Illustrated from original Drawings by our most eminent artists. The Biography of Andrew Jackson, in the number for January, is the first of this series, which will include the principal heroes of our two wars with Great Britain. Among the articles already prepared are Biographies of Putnam and Marion.

II. ILLUSTRATIONS OF AMERICAN SCENERY, LIFE AND MANNERS.—The article, "Virginia Illustrated," in the present number, will give an idea of the scope and design of this series. Papers and illustrations have been engaged from our most accomplished authors and artists. They will present in succession delineations of the scenery and local peculiarities of every section of our country.

III. THE AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS OF THE UNITED STATES.—This series will be prepared by the author of the papers already published upon "Sugar" and "Cotton." The illustrations will comprise the most interesting features in the cultivation and preparation of our principal agricultural staples.

IV. NARRATIVES OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPEDITIONS.—The series will embrace accounts of the principal exploring expeditions sent out from this country. They will, in all cases, be prepared from papers, and illustrated by drawings, furnished by those who have taken part in the enterprises. The first article of this series, which will appear in the number for March, will contain the commencement of the "Narrative of the Darien Expedition," under command of Lieut. Strain.

V. VOYAGES, TRAVELS AND SKETCHES in various parts of the world. In this department papers have been engaged, and are now prepared, and in course of preparation by different authors, relating to China, Madras, Java, the Malay countries, Russia and Brasil. No expense will be spared to produce for the articles a series of superb illustrations, in most cases after drawings by the authors themselves.

VI. SOCIAL, POLITICAL AND RELIGIOUS SKETCHES IN EUROPE, by the accomplished and spirited author of "Sights and Principles Abroad." These will be accompanied by numerous characteristic illustrations. The opening article of this series appears in the present number, and presents a graphic view of life and morals in Italy, showing the effects of Romanism on society.

VII. THE HOLY LAND AND THE ADJACENT COUNTRIES.—This series of elaborately illustrated articles, by Jacob Abbott, will be still further continued.

VIII. ILLUSTRATIONS OF NATURAL HISTORY.—The article upon Alligators, in the December number, is a specimen of the style and manner of illustration in which a large number of subjects, belonging to this department will be treated.

IX. CONSULAR EXPERIENCES.—A series of papers by our Consuls abroad. The first of these sketches, by Donald G. Mitchell, author of "Reveries of a Bachelor," giving an account of his consulship at Venice, will appear in an early number.

X. MEMOIRS OF THE REIGNING DYNASTIES OF EUROPE.—The brilliant paper in the number for January, upon the "House of Bonaparte," will be followed by others upon the various European dynasties. The next paper in this series will give the "Memoirs of the Spanish Bourbons." These memoirs present a vivid picture of the characters of those monarchs who claim to reign by "Divine Right."

XI. In addition to the different series of illustrated articles enumerated above, the Publishers have made ample arrangements for papers upon subjects of general and current interest. The illustrations will be profusely furnished with—for the value of the paper will be in all enhanced by them. Besides the foregoing series of articles, the pages of the Magazine will afford abundant space for the usual variety of literary and miscellaneous matter, furnished by American writers, or selected from the whole field of Foreign literature. The Editorial Department will preserve the same distinguished features that have heretofore characterized it. The Publishers are confident that this programme of a portion of their arrangements for the next year will be accepted by the public as evidence of their determination and ability to make their Magazine the most interesting and valuable, as well as the most widely circulated periodical in the world.

TERMS.—The Magazine may be obtained of Booksellers, Periodical Agents, or from the Publishers, at Three Dollars a year, or Twenty-five Cents a number. The semi-annual volumes, as completed, neatly bound in cloth are sold at Two Dollars each; and Muslin covers are furnished to those who wish to have their back numbers uniformly bound, at Twenty-five Cents per number. Nine Volumes are now ready, bound.

The Publishers will supply specimen numbers gratuitously to Agents and Postmasters and will make liberal arrangements with them for circulating the Magazine. They will also supply Clubs of two persons at Five Dollars a year; or five persons at Ten Dollars. Clergymen supplied at Two Dollars a year.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

THE undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements or the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of a high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own and the adjoining States the adoption of a plan, which we trust will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. C. Thweatt, (well-known throughout the State as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South) has been engaged as President of the Institution. The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweatt is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield having subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured that no school can be found in the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of teaching as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages as far as health, society, etc., are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher Schools of the country—the particulars of which will be published hereafter. The first session of the School to commence on the 8th day of January, 1855.

Parents will please send on their daughters, as there are always advantages to be derived from an early commencement.

Board can be obtained for the present in respectable private families at moderate rates.

THE NATIVITY.

Turn we to Bethlehem's lone shed of yore,
When ere 'twas noon of night the wise men stood.
Their goal was won; the star that led before,
Centering its rays here, pours a dazzling flood
Of light, while warned by astronomic lore,
Here lain, as lessening human pride did bear on all pomp
But what doth here redress their toilsome march
O'er desert wastes, through savage foes and storm,
'Neath torrid suns, wiuds that the journeyers scorch,
Whose bones, far strewn, hideous, the course deform
A maiden, old nnn, child reward their search—
Oh! mighty spectacle! Oh, powerful charm!

No costly garniture shines pompous round;
A manger's walls the sacred trio hold;
For journeying here no refuge may be found.
On stubble lays that babe of heavenly mould;
Yet, bending lowlier than to monarch crowned,
In solemn worship here that regal train behold.

Rare was such bait in Bethlehem's streets, I ween;
For glittering like meteor of the night,
In contrast strange with tenement so mean,
Gleam their rich robes, beneath that virgin light,
All-richest dye and pattern; and the sheen
Of gems flash from their coils and girdle weapons bright.

Oh! opulent the gifts they proffer here,
Perfumes and spices, gums and gems of price;
The diamond's flash illumes that dusky lair,
With orient gold in ornate forms emblazed;
White bridal-like rich, and scarlet patterns rare,
Form contrasts strange with those dim walls confined.

Separted these, anon, oncoming see
O'er the near hill a troupe more simply dight;
Herdsmen they seem, but lowly though they be,
For them shines also yon all glorious light;
Entering, they bow with unreluctant knee
Before the Great Redeemer, now a babe in lowliest plight

Homely their tunic, whose plain girdle bound
Suspende the shepherd's pouch or drinking horn,
Rude was each limb; their feet the sandal bound;
Their scrip and night cloak coarse, on shoulder borne;
Some sheepcrooks bear, with early violets crowned.
Such they. With simpler gifts, I ween, they hail the [newly born

Oh! well contrast their simpler garb and speech
With those high satraps who now journey forth.
Oh! though not theirs such worldly height to reach,
Or costly gifts donate of priceless worth,
Yet in a faith sublime are equal each—
Equal their triumph in that glorious birth.

Albeit, more high in heavenly favor, came
To them celestial heralds, breathing all
God's grace, premeditated through the name
Of his blest Son, whom earth the Christ shall call;
While seraphs' harps did all his grace proclaim, [hail
Responsive to the peerless notes of heaven's supernal

The shepherds speed, rejoicing on their way
Again to tend their flocks, their herds to feed.
The sacred pair their holy homage pay
To the Great Power who aided thus their need,
And gave thier blameless lives such glorious meed
As lent their Saviour-babe to their caress.
The virgin mother, treasuring all, doth heed [bless.
That in far ages all mankind their anointed names shall

Oh! what beatitude enjoyed that pair
Of earliest Christians in those blissful hours,
When pseans sweet echoed from upper air,
Blent with the harpings of seraphic powers,
Or thus the strain till God's high will declare:
Peace and good will toward man, and all the grateful [praise be ours!

SEEK GRACE, NOT ECSTASY.

Think not that all is lost when thy heart is not elevated with that sensible fervor which thou art always coveting. These raptures are allowed them as sweet foretastes of heavenly bliss, but thou art yet too carnal to be capable of their constant enjoyment. Seek, then, growth in grace, rather than lights of ecstasy. While thou art in war, expect not the rest of peace; while combating, expect the feelings of combat. Thy principal concern and business is to struggle against the motions of fallen nature, and the suggestions of fallen spirits; and if thou resist this with faithful perseverance, thou wilt give true proof of that Christian fortitude which will be distinguished with the crown of victory.

RELICS COMING.

A correspondent of the New York Times learns that the Pope is about to send to this country an assortment of relics, such as some of the wood of the cross, from Genoa; two of the nails of the same, from Venice; and one thorn from the crown the Saviour wore during his last agony, together with a linking and a weeping Madonna. The writer states that this favor is conferred because of complaints from American ecclesiastics that this portion of the flock had been neglected in dispensing the sacred and miracle-working treasures. The winking Madonna is to go to New York, and the weeping one to Baltimore.

MURMURING.

Cecil was once riding with a friend on a very windy day, when the dust was so troublesome that his companion wished they were at their journey's end, where they might ride in the fields free from dust; and this wish he often repeated a number of times. When he reached the fields, the flies so teased his friend's horse that he could scarcely keep his seat on the saddle. On his bitterly complaining, "Ah! sir," said Mr. Cecil, "when you were in the road, the dust was your only trouble, and all your anxiety was to get into the fields. You forgot that the fly was there. Now this is a true picture of human life: we know the trials of our present situation, but the next will have trials, and perhaps worse, though they be of a different kind."—Cecil's Remains.

The steamer American, from Smithland, which left on the 5th inst., encountered much floating ice as low down as Hickman's Island. There was only 3 feet water in the river below Memphis. There were about a dozen boats laying up at Cairo, bound down.

THE BEST SERMON—THE BEST CHURCH.

It is an instructive fact, that when Christ was crucified there was a thief upon his right hand, and another upon his left, as if to lead the sinner's eye to look neither to the right nor to the left, but to rivet it upon the crucified Lamb that hung between. It is possible for us now, when we profess to draw near to Christ, to draw near the sacrament, yet not to Him, the substance; to draw near to the Church, and rest on it, and find it as a tomb, instead of drawing near to Christ, and resting on him, and feeling in him a Saviour. And whatever in the ministers, or in the rites and ceremonies of the Church, so rivets you that it keeps you there and prevents you rising higher, is the very essence of all anti-Christian superstition. If, for instance, the architecture of the church should fascinate you and keep your from thinking of Him who fills the church with his glory, it may be beautiful architecture, but it is bad divinity. Or if the splendor of the language of the minister's sermon should so captivate you, or if his doctrine, or his illustrations, or his metaphors should so dazzle you that you lose the great, penetrating, rivetting thought they were designed to convey, it may be an eloquent address, but it is a very worthless sermon. Whatever, in short, keeps you from the great end and aim of all ministry, the Lord Jesus Christ, ought not to be there. It is the beauty of a proposition in Euclid that every step helps you to the conclusion; and it is the highest evidence of all true architecture, all poetry and all painting, that everything in it and about it has a tendency to contribute to one great point for which the painting or building was designed. So in all Church ceremonies and services, in all preaching, in all reading, in all prayer, in all praise we ought to be carried directly, and without obstruction, to Him who is and ought to be the Alpha and Omega of all. Hence it is the best creed which proclaims Christ most clearly; he is the best preacher who points you to the Lamb of God most distinctly; and that is the best and most apostolic church in which you can learn to know and love your Saviour most simply and directly.—Dr. Cumming.

REVIVALS.

SENSE OF GOD'S PRESENCE.

One of the most remarkable features of a revival state of mind, whether in an individual or community, is a feeling that God is present to behold the evil and the good, to condemn or justify, according as we are his enemies or his friends. Edwards, in his "Narratives of Surprising Conversions" in Northampton, after stating certain important facts of the revival, goes on to say: "Presently upon this a great and earnest concern about the great things of religion and the eternal world became universal in all parts of the town, and among persons of all degrees and all ages. The noise amongst the dry bones waxed louder and louder; all other talk but about spiritual and eternal things was thrown by, till the conversation in all companies and upon all occasions was upon these things only, unless so much as was necessary for people carrying on their ordinary secular business. Other discourse than of things of religion would scarcely be tolerated in any company. The minds of people were wonderfully taken off from the world. It was treated amongst us as a thing of very little consequence; they seemed to follow their worldly business more as a part of their duty, than from any disposition they had to do it. The temptation now seemed to lie on that hand, to neglect worldly affairs too much, and to spend too much time in the immediate exercise of religion."

THE TITLE OF LL. D.

Everybody knows that two Ls and a D at the end of a name stand for a title, and a good many know that the meaning is Doctor Legum (Doctor of Laws.) But why two Ls, when one would answer just as well? Some, says a correspondent of the Presbyterian, have accounted for it by supposing that the mystic letters mean Doctor of Law and Logic. Others think they mean Literarius Legum Doctor. Now the simple explanation is, that the letters mean Legum Doctor, (Doctor of Laws,) and the first letter is doubled according to the well known practice of the Romans in abbreviating words of expressing a plural noun by a double letter. Some persons, not aware of this, write L. L. D., as if each letter stood for a word, instead of LL. D. As to the meaning and value of the title itself, we leave it to the Doctors themselves to decide.

The Infidel Reproved.—When the Rev. Mr. —— heard an infidel jestingly say, "I always spend the Sunday in settling my accounts," he turned round and said, in an accent of deep solemnity, "You may find, sir, that the day of judgment is to be spent in exactly the same manner."

River News.—We learn that the Ohio river at Louisville, on the 6th inst., was very low, and much obstructed by the ice, and navigation was extremely difficult. The Fanny Hallitt and Southerner were in port leading for New Orleans. The steamer Equinox, bones for Ohio, and, was at Wabash on the 31 inst; the Ambassador at West Franklin; the Peter Tellon, Rainbow and Washington City at Green River—all laid up on account of the ice. The Belle Sheridan left Louisville for this port, and on the 31 inst was obliged to lay up at Troy for the same cause.

CHRISTIANITY.

Since the introduction of our religion, human nature has made great progress and society experienced great changes; and in this advanced condition of the world Christianity, instead of losing its application and importance, is found to be more and more congenial and adapted to man's nature and wants. Men have outgrown the other institutions of that period when Christianity appeared; its philosophy, its modes of warfare, its policy, its public and private economy; but Christianity has never shrunk as intellect has opened, but has always kept in advance of men's faculties, and unfolded nobler views in proportion as they have ascended. The highest powers and affections which our nature has developed find more than adequate objects in this religion. Christianity is peculiarly fitted to the more improved stages of society, to the more delicate sensibilities of refined minds, and especially to that dissatisfaction with the present state which always grows with the growth of our moral powers and affections. As men advance in civilization they become susceptible of mental sufferings, and these Christianity is fitted to assuage. Imagination and intellect become more restless, and Christianity brings them tranquility, by the eternal and magnificent truths and the solemn and unbounded prospects which it unfolds.

This fitness of our religion to more advanced stages of society than that in which it was introduced to the wants of human nature not then developed, seems to me very striking. The religion bears the marks of having come from a being who perfectly understood the human mind, and had power to provide for its progress. This feature of Christianity is of the nature of prophecy. It was an anticipation of future and distant ages; and when we consider among whom our religion sprung, where but in God can we find an explanation of this peculiarity?

MISERY OF STATESMEN.

Probably few great philosophic statesmen—few men, that is, who acted intimately in public affairs, as well as contemplated them from the closet, ever quitted the stage without a feeling of profound discouragement. Whether successful or unsuccessful, as the world would deem them, a sense of sadness and disappointment seems to prevail over every other sentiment. They have obtained so few of their objects; they have fallen so far short of their ideal; they have seen so much more than ordinary men of the dangers and difficulties of nations, and of the vice and meanness of public men. Not many Englishmen governed so long or so successfully as Sir Robert Peel, or set in such halo of blessings and esteem; yet shortly before his death he confessed that what he had seen and heard in public life had left upon his mind a prevalent impression of gloom and grief. Who ever succeeded so splendidly as Washington? Who ever enjoyed to such a degree, and to the end, the confidence and gratitude of his country? "Yet," says Guizot, "towards the close of his life, in sweet and dignified retirement in Mount Vernon, something of lassitude and sadness hung about the mind of a man so serenely great." A feeling, indeed, most natural at the termination of a long life spent in men's concerns. Power is a heavy burden and mankind a hard taskmaster to him who struggles virtuously against their passions and their errors. Success itself cannot wipe out the sorrowful impression which originated in the conflict, and the weariness contracted on the scene of action is prolonged even in the bosom of repose.—North British Review.

ORGANIZE! ORGANIZE!

Homer, La., Feb. 7, 1855.

Mr. Editor—The subject of temperance has for a long time past occupied a prominent place in our thoughts. Seeing, on one hand, the baleful influence of intemperance extending over the land, and on the other the powerful and efficient means which exist in our Church, and especially in its ministry, to arrest and chain the monster, we therefore suggested at the session of the Louisiana Conference that the subject of temperance be added to those proposed for the deliberations of the Conference in lay session, which was accordingly done, and a chairman of said committee was appointed.

We supposed that he would have given the subject sufficient thought to be enabled to submit some system in report to the Conference. But the year passed, and no one undertook the responsible task of quarrying out and reducing to order a system which would be appropriate to be adopted by the Conference and put into operation. When the subject was brought up in regular order for discussion, a few scathing remarks and resolutions was all that was done.

Besides, it was thought by some that it would be a venture of doubtful propriety to attempt to do anything. Our fathers introduced a good rule in the Discipline on temperance, and it would not do to go beyond the old landmarks! "Resolved, therefore. That we enforce said rule."

All that is very well in its place; but to say that it is all that is necessary, and all that can be done to promote the cause of temperance at the present day, evinces, at least to our mind, an apathy altogether unenviable. Is not the rule of our Discipline on the subject of charity equally good? Why, then, favor a Howard Association, and other like institutions? Why, then, should a Methodist, and especially a Methodist preacher, favor any fraternal institution? The rule of Discipline is certainly good; then let us have nothing but that rule. If experience teaches us that we can effect more good, at least in this cause, by forming separate and distinct associations, then let us become all things to all men, that we may effect the more good.

We would ask: Is it the rule of Discipline which has awakened such a powerful interest on the subject of temperance in this nation? Is it this which has caused legislation to drive the demon from several of the States of this Union, and from hundreds of our towns and villages, and thousands of our homes? Or has it been owing to separate and distinct temperance organizations? The answer is plain. On this subject we happen to have some experience. We have witnessed, at least in one parish—and what is true of one may be of many—the necessity of separate and distinct temperance organization in order to insure success. In two successive elections, where the question of "license or no license" was submitted to the people, "license" prevailed—the rule of Discipline to the contrary notwithstanding. But a Temperance Society was organized and public lectures made, and an influence was brought to bear on the subject which before was latent. The consequence was, at the next election the "no license" prevailed.

We do not intend to discuss here the propriety of legislating upon the subject; the time for that is past. But we do hold that more may be done by separate and distinct organizations in the great cause of temperance than can be effected without it. We do not think it strange that an indifference should be evinced to tectotal temperance even by many who are convinced of its importance, when we consider that moderate drinking is one of the social practices indulged by men, and that good wine is held by many to be the most wholesome and delicious beverage ever used at a dining table, and especially in this warm climate. Hence to advocate total abstinence societies comes in contact with a popular vice, in high places, and of every day's occurrence. But the cause of temperance, in our judgment, next to that of Christianity, is doing more good than all others.

Further, we believe that we have the power in our own hands of driving intemperance from our land. Only let there be unanimity of effort, and the work will be done. Therefore, we sincerely hope the chairman of the committee on this subject will give it sufficient thought to be able to present at our next annual meeting some system for operation which may be adopted and carried out by the Conference.

Yours, J. P.

READING SERMONS—OTHERS.

It is not our purpose, Mr. Editor, to discuss the relative efficiency of preaching, proper, and reading sermons. That the former method is by far the most efficient, we assume to be a foregone conclusion. If, however, brethren will persist in reading, in the name of common honesty let them read their own sermons, or else in the commencement apprise the congregation that they mean to appropriate one of brother A's or brother B's best. This would be honest, candid, manly. Without such announcement, to read another man's sermon is to practice a downright fraud. True, all would not be deceived. There are some who require other evidences of authorship than the mere reading of the discourse; some who have learned to be distrustful. Consequently, when they hear a dull man deliver a brilliant sermon, they begin at once to wonder (that is, if they do not chance to know) where he got it from. But while this is the case with regard to the few, the many are imposed upon, and conclude that the retailer of other men's wares is some great one.

It is painful to hear a brother spouting, in a style which he intends to be highly rhetorical, the language of another; especially when, from your knowledge of the speaker's capacity, you cannot resist the conviction that he does not fully understand the import of the words he uses, and is incapable of sympathy with the sentiment and fancy of the writer.

How must the preacher presume on the ignorance of his hearers, especially when there are those present who know him well, and have had sufficient opportunities for weighing him and ascertaining his calibre. The preacher who pursues such a course, though he may not be deficient in intellect, though he may possess both genius and talent, can never rise above mediocrity. He is self-doomed. We have frequently thought on this subject, yet it is probable this brief article would not have been written but for the recent remarks of a preacher who but a short time before had been edified by hearing one brother preach another's sermon.

CAUSES OF THE GULF STREAM.

Mr. Editor—It is stated as the opinion of Mr. Shoales, an experienced navigator, that the Gulf Stream is nothing more nor less than the waters of the river Amazon, forcing their way against wind and tide through the ocean. From the following description of the battle of Marston Heath, Sir Walter Scott appears to have entertained the same opinion:

"——The battle's rage
Was like the strife which currents wage,
Where Orinoco in his pride,
Rolls to the main his tribute tide,
But 'gainst broad ocean surges far
A rival sea of roaring war;
While in ten thousand eddies driven,
The billows fling their foam to heaven,
And the pale pilot seeks in vain,
Where rolls the river, where the main."

The aptitude of human nature to theorise the supernatural, to draw upon the imagination for facts, and to adopt the opinions of learned men without investigation, has led to errors in science which nothing can correct but a strict construction of the laws of nature, and their rigid application to facts after they have been fully ascertained.

Now it is a fact that the Amazon does not contribute as much water as the Mississippi, and, in consequence of its great width, flows into the ocean with a much gentler current. But even if its current was strong enough to force a channel through the ocean, instead of flowing, as the Gulf Stream, to the Banks of Newfoundland, it would strike the coast of Africa about the Cape Verde Islands.

In other fanciful theories the Gulf Stream has been attributed to the current of the Mississippi; when the fact is, the current of the Mississippi, through its principal passes, would, if continued in a direct course, strike the coast of South America. Another fact, which, independent of all would overthrow either of the theories, is, that twenty such rivers as the Amazon and Mississippi combined would not afford a volume of water equal to the Gulf Stream.

The Gulf Stream can only be accounted for by the law of nature which alike governs the atmosphere and the ocean. The vertical rays of the sun around the Equator heat alike the atmosphere and the ocean, and effect their elements in precisely the same manner. Around the whole circumference of our globe, as far as the ocean extends, there is a superficial current of warm water flowing to the north and south from the Equator, and at the same time an under current of cold water flowing from the north and south to the Equator. So that mariners frequently discover icebergs that sink deep into the ocean drifting towards the Equator, while at the same time their ship, which only draws a few feet, is drifting in the opposite direction. Now if there were no obstacle calculated to obstruct or divert these currents from their natural course, they would be uniform in every part of the ocean, and there would be no such current as the Gulf Stream.

I may be charged with presumption, but it does seem strange to me how any one acquainted with the laws of nature, and with a map of North America and the Gulf of Mexico before him, can find any difficulty in accounting for what causes the Gulf Stream. The whole of the water which is heated in the Gulf of Mexico flows north, is obstructed in its direct course by Florida, thrown into a body, and finds its way around the cape; when, coming in contact with the regular current from the Equator, its course is changed to the north of east, which throws it upon Newfoundland and the west coast of Ireland.

DELIGHT THYSELF IN GOD.

Oh! laboring and heavily laden souls, do ye not know that the restlessness which you take so many different ways to alleviate is occasioned by nothing so much as by the want of God? While you are living without Him, all that you do is vanity and vexation of spirit. There is a rest for your souls; but it is not in those things which you have been so earnestly pursuing. You seek it from the earth; but the earth says, "It is not in me." You seek it from pleasure, from fashion, from riches, from friendship, from praise; but praise, friendship, riches, fashion, pleasure, each of them says, "It is not in me." Ask it from everything in creation; and everything in creation will say, "It is not in me." You must seek it above and beyond creation; for there is no rest for your souls till you come and seek it where it only is to be found; in the bosom of God's everlasting love.—Hewitson.

"Son of a Gun."—A Curiosity of Literature—Early in the 15th century the Scotch and Irish had a skirmish in the North of Ireland, at Armagh, near which town Swift once wrote the following lines in the window of an inn:

"High church,
Low steeple,
Dirty lasses,
Proud people."

After the fray was over some one in the Scotch army gave his opinion of Armagh in Latin verse, of which the following is a free translation:

"So far from the town of Armagh being witty,
'Tis an extremely cocked-up and ridiculous city;
Man, woman and lad,
Their manners are bad—
The ladies I wish were a little more prude,
For, I think to narrate, they are awfully nude.
If you dine with a gent your meat's underdone,
And your best some poor pauperly son of a gun."

[Armagh is famous in Irish history as the most ancient seat of literature in the three Kingdoms. The name, a Gaelic compound, signifies "high ground" or high hill. The town is now the center of one of the finest and most prosperous districts in Ireland. Dean Swift's designation of the people is still, in some measure, true. We recently observed in an Irish paper that "the Book of Armagh has been sold at a price of over $1,600." Valuable book that!]

A terrible accident occurred at Toledo, Ohio, a few days ago. Five men had entered the wheel-house of the ferry boat for the purpose of cutting away the ice which impeded it, when, through some unaccountable carelessness, the machinery was started, and the men precipitated into the ice and water below. Two of the men were drowned, and another had his leg broken.

CONDITION OF THE BRITISH ARMY.

These are not the days for a mere personal, factious or other peculiar triumph. The attempt to extract anything like credit or "capital," as it is called, out of the disastrous state of things in the Crimea, and the general mismanagement of the war, would be almost as bad as the trade of the wretches who prowl over the battle-field, or the beach, for the spoils of the slain or the wrecked. We might, indeed, without much indecorum, take an honor that has been forced on us—fastened on us—by our rivals and opponents. For weeks and weeks were we exposed to a storm of abuse from all sides for what was called our interested or spiteful misrepresentations of the state of things at the seat of war. Some writers coolly assured the public the whole was an invention, and that the hideous complication of fatal neglects described in our columns was of home manufacture; the truth being that all was going on very smoothly and comfortably under the paternal rule of Lord Raglan, his veteran colleagues and youthful aids-de-camp. When this could no longer be maintained, one or two journals admitted the facts, threw the blame wholly and solely upon the Administration at home. For our part, we have done our best to describe the state of things just as it is; having all the parties concerned to settle the responsibility among themselves as well as they can, only fixing a culprit here and there, when the matter seemed to be brought home; and this, after all, is what all our contemporaries seem to have come round to. Here they all are, and not only they, but provincial newspapers, of all kinds—English, Irish, Scotch—giving what we have said all along, "taking the bread out of our mouths." If, indeed, it is a question of political capital; and not only confirming, but actually going beyond, every thing we have said.

But who any longer denies the sufferings and losses of our army, or can deny them? They are confessed, with we know not what excuses, by the Commander-in-Chief. They are confessed by the Generals of his Staff. From the very men in command of the army—the men whose alleged inertness, incapacity and blindness have been the theme of many a complaint, come letters to their friends, describing the state of things much as it is described by the corporal or private soldier, the mere unit in the military system. Somehow, or other every body views the war from without, and seems the helpless spectator of a frightful catastrophe. Every body complains. It is, "I complain, you complain," and so on through all the numbers and persons. The universality of the complaint is its worst feature; for, while every body admits the terrible state of things, and there is no argument upon it, the expedition seems to flounder in a Sorbonian bog of despair, and that dull Cimmerian sky which the ancients ascribed to the scene of this calamity. The army, and its managers at home and abroad, dream rather than live, in any waking or active sense of the word. They feel, and see, and hear; they even speak and intend, but do nothing. It is so from the lowest to the highest.

A great authority, writing from the Crimea, says of the "fresh trooper," "They absolutely despair, become reckless, cease to prepare their food, go into hospital and die." Here is a picture of the Crimean disease in its simplest form, in the person of the poor soldier just come from England. Next follows, in the same letter, a picture of it in another stage, in the commissariat and authorities charged with the transport. The writer says, that hitherto the good clothing and comforts accumulating at Balaklava might as well be in London, so nearly impossible is it to transport them to the camp. That it is so every body knows by this time. There is every thing in the world at Balaklava. The arrivals there during December were incessant—shiploads upon shiploads—and in them great numbers of the very things most wanted. Nobody can say what there is not at Balaklava: for there, we believe, are still to be found all the thousands of packages sent from this country, and never heard of again. But the army, like a man in a dream, has not the waking will and energy to stretch out its hand and effectually grasp the wealth within its reach. It complains, it moans inarticulately and helplessly, like a patient under chloroform. If it does more, then comes another stage of the same disorder. It consists in "plans" that somehow are always on the point of being put into execution; but some thing, some body, some official, some accident, indefinitely postpones them.

The great authority we have quoted has drawn up a plan for the transport of goods from Balaklava to camp. It has received the approval of the Quartermaster-General, but at the commencement of the new year it was still only a plan. Of course, nothing can be done without a plan; but it does occur to us that at the date mentioned a considerable number of the "navvies" had landed with the materials for their railway. Has that solid assistance, too, dwindled into a "plan," to be passed from office to office, and to be decided on when young officers have become old, and old officers young? Why has there been no transport all this time? Why did we land in the Crimea without wagons, or any regular system for the conveyance of baggage? The apology is, that in the country of Ransom and Crosskill, a committee of old generals have been sitting for months to decide on the best form of carts, and that nothing can be done to save the remnant of the army from destruction till they have made their report.

Yet, while the attempt to shield the generals by attacking the Ministers is simply ridiculous, and is, in fact, already abandoned, in truth and honesty it must be admitted that the authorities at home seem to suffer equally from the Crimean helplessness. They, too, see and hear, and feel and complain, but do not address themselves point blank to the remedy. Their measures are aimless and ineffective, falling short, like the old man's javelin, and making only a noisy show of energy. Look to the letter in Tuesday's paper from Major-Gen. Angerstein. Immediately on the intelligence of the miseries suffered by the sick and wounded after the battle of the Alma, upon the field, on the passage, and in the hospitals, official assurance was given that such horrors should not occur again. The miseries of the middle-passage were as bad as ever after three months of public warning and official resolution. The sick and wounded do not, indeed, lie wholly uncared for on the gory battle-field, but they do lie in the mud, the only bed they find in the hospital marquees at the camp; while at Scutari, though many evils are redressed, the crowding and the infectious character of the atmosphere engendered by it have been lately aggravated to an alarming extent. Again, some months ago the tea-dealers of the metropolis, with that generous feeling which so well becomes the commercial class, offered to supply the hospitals with tea and sugar gratis. Their offer was declined on the ground that there was tea and sugar enough in the hospital stores at the cost of Government. In fact there was none, and from that time to this there has been none, except what we have supplied from the Fund, or the poor sufferers could buy at an extravagant price from the ship-stewards and suttlers. Very possibly orders have been given; very possibly supplies have been sent, and the receipt thereof duly notified by the regular authorities.

Yet, the weapon has not reached the mark, and will not reach it. There is no where to be found that penetrating glance, that searching scrutiny, that strength of will, that determination that the thing shall be done by which alone things are done. We confess that we put great faith in the human will. We believe that "where there is a will there is a way." But then the will must be a very resolute one, and must override all sorts of conflicting wishes. We really can not believe that if either the Minister of War, or the Commander-in-Chief in the Crimea, had thoroughly resolved, last October, that the sick and wounded should have beds to lie on, proper transports to convey them to hospitals, warmer tight tents in the camp, tea and other comforts, these poor creatures would still be without these things. Nor can we believe that, if nearly three months ago, when the communication between Balaklava and the camp was interrupted, or rendered difficult, Lord Raglan and his Staff had resolved to restore it by a road that would stand the wear and tear of an army's traffic in all weathers, that army would have been reduced to its present melancholy state, which is about as bad as if it had been separated a hundred miles from its supplies, or shut up in a besieged town. Human will may not be supreme, but it is very apt to prevail, and the comparative strength of human wills go far to determine the issue of war. Fortune is not the jade that some would represent her. She is to be wooed and won, but by no feeble or irresolute hand. If we wish for success, we must first resolve to let nothing we can help stand in its way—no favor, no fear, no sinister motive—above all no friends; and then, when we have sacrificed all we have, we at least deserve to succeed. Mozart and the Pope.—In the year 1770, when Mozart was in his fourteenth year, he traveled with his father to Rome. It was then that liberal and amiable Ganganelli filled the pontifical chair, who, having heard much of the extraordinary youth whose fame had spread over most parts of Europe, invited him to the Quirinal Palace, where he had the honor of performing privately. This was just before Easter. In the course of the conversation, the performances of the Sistine Chapel were alluded to, particularly the celebrated Miserere for two choirs, the masterpiece of Gregorio Allegri, which is always sung there in the Holy Week. The youthful Mozart, with all the naiveté of his age, requested a copy from the Pope.

Ganganelli kindly replied: "If the music were mine, I would with all my heart gratify your laudable curiosity; but being the property of the church, it is not at my disposal; by an arrangement, for which I am not responsible, it has been forbidden to be copied under pain of excommunication.

This unsuccessful attempt did but strengthen the wish of the youth. He obtained permission to attend the only rehearsal which was given of the music. The attention with which he listened to it was intense. On quitting the chapel he spoke not a single word, but hastened home and wrote down the notes. At the public performance, he brought his manuscript, which he kept carefully concealed in his hat, and having filled up some omissions, and corrected a few errors in the inner parts, he had the satisfaction to know that he possessed a complete copy of the treasure thus jealously guarded. The next time he played before Ganganelli, he had the courage to tell His Holiness what he had achieved, and produced the manuscript.

The Pope was all amazement, but replied, with a smile: "The prohibition does not extend to the memory, and I think that you may escape the pain of excommunication."

This composition, afterward published from a copy sent as a present from Pope Pius VI to the Emperor of Germany, was compared with the manuscript of Mozart, and not the difference of a single note between them was discovered. That the solemn and devout harmony, the supplicatory strains, and the awful effect produced by this extraordinary "Miserare," made a deep and indelible impression on the sensitive mind of Mozart there can be no doubt, and that to this circumstance we are indebted for many of those heart-moving passages which stud with gems his compositions, is more than probable.

Novel Concert between a Mouse and a Canary Bird.—"Rara Avis," in the Boston Traveler, gives the following account of a concert between a canary bird and a mouse, which took place on the evening of the 10th of January. He says:

"When all was still in my room, on the above mentioned evening, my attention was attracted by a sound within the walls exactly resembling the chirp of a young canary. This awoke my canary, who answered it from his perch. The chirp was repeated, and the bird replied. A regular conversation followed, each answering in turn, the ocean singer increasing in loudness and clearness till the canary was clearly thrown into song, and imitating him in his trills and warbling, just about as closely as a young canary would imitate an old one. At this moment a regiment of rats, who seemed to have been collected round the spot, made a stampede, and the invisible singer was silenced for the night.

"My first thought was to refer this latramural singing to a canary heard through the walls, but inquiring at the next door and finding that no canary was kept there, and hardly supposing that one could exist between the walls, I was obliged to yield to the opinion of a lady present, that it was a musical mouse, she citing an instance of the kind which had come to her knowledge in the family of a physician of this city, in which, after many attempts, the mus musicus was captured. Only one other supposition could be indulged, and the improbable one, that the rats had carried off a live canary, and kept him in confinement to enjoy his song."

The Double Baby at Lancaster, Ohio.—We stated a few days since that a strange case of malformation had occurred at Lancaster, in this State, and we noticed a more full description.

"From the lower extremity of the breast bone, where the junction of the 4th bodies takes place—upwards, there are the upper parts of two perfect and well developed infants—two heads, two pairs of arms, two chests, two stomachs, two hearts, two pairs of lungs, and two livers. From the same point downwards, the blending of the two systems into one becomes more and more intimate, until it seems almost perfect and complete. The intestines, and all the lower organs, are in common with common privates, and the legs, made up of the right leg of one and the left leg of the other are a part, standing in the natural position relative to each other save to the other organs in their vicinity. In the rear, however, the spine is not perfect, there being two well developed spines, each terminating in a separate os coccygis; and, what is peculiarly strange, the two inner legs, dislocated at the hip joints, are thrown backwards and upwards, and joined together, are found passing under the true skin of the back of the body upon the right, the feet being extricated and standing up heel to head, nearly in the knee. The child is a female, with apparently a perfect sexual organization. The bodies do not exactly face each other, but are more nearly face to face than side to side. One is apparently more inactive than the other, and it is evident that in many of the characteristics of their constitutions they are different. As one is capable of suffering while the other is unconscious of pain, it follows that their nervous systems are several; from which it is, we suppose, to be inferred, that in case they should survive, each will possess a character and individuality of its own. This strange phenomenon is the offering of respectable parents at Lancaster. Although delicate, it is thought the chances are in favor of its survivleg. The case is in the hands of Dr. Boerstler, one of the oldest physicians of the state, whose skill in its treatment is spoken of in terms of high commendation. [Cincinnati Commercial, Jan. 30.

Subterranean Telegraph to the Pacific.—In noticing the fact that the House of Representatives had passed the bill authorizing the construction of a subterranean telegraph through to the Pacific coast, the Baltimore Sun says:

"The contractors are to construct and protect the road at their own expense, and at their own hazard, and asked from the government a grant of lands. This, however, the House has refused to give, having stricken that provision out of the bill. The amount of land asked was two millions of acres, not to be conveyed to them until after they have completed the line and are ready to work it. The charges are to be $1 per word up to ten words, and then 75 cents a word, the government to have the preference always in the use of the line. Should the bill pass the Senate, and the contractors accept it unless the land provision, the practicability of the work can be soon tested, for they bind themselves to complete the line within two years. The argument of impracticability has been urged against every great enterprise, and especially in opposition to Mr. Morse's application to Congress in aid him in the great experiment of a line of telegraph between Washington and Baltimore.

Impracticability in this case is alleged as a consequence of the difficulties of the Indians to dig up every thing that is hidden in the plains. But the contractors say that they have considered these objections and know how to avoid them. They propose to engage the Indians by supplementary means, that of itself is an important argument, and the success of which would be vastly beneficial.

NOTICES—ADVERTISEMENTS—TERMS.

Send Notice.—"I have not yet received a paper," writes a worthy member of A— Conference. Looking at the books, we find him in the northern part of the Conference, and his paper still going to last year's post office, in the southern. This is the first notice to change. We desire (it is our interest as well as theirs) that every member of the patronising Conferences be in receipt of the paper.

Advertisements.—In regard to advertising, the New York Independent says:

"We must give some space to advertisements. Many readers wish the information these convey; and since every subscriber gets his paper at less than cost, we must make up the deficiency from our advertising columns.

The Independent is one of the leading papers at the North. The same policy obtains in other cotemporaries of high standing. THE NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

Rev. W. H. Cranbaw writes us that he is preparing to go about the agency. Glad to hear it. And we predict his success.

He expresses a reasonable concern for the co-operation of adjoining Conferences. With this he thinks, as we do, that "it can be done with ease; and in another year the Methodist preacher or layman visiting the Crescent City can sit under his own roof."

Mississippi has—

It is evident, from the report published last week by the General Committee, that the General Agents cannot build a house for themselves. They say, imploringly and justly:

"Take the strong points" was the policy advocated by Bishop Asbury. It is good policy. The Romanists and the Presbyterians (they will pardon the juxtaposition) are before us in this instance; but it is not yet too late to adopt and act on it.

We should be pleased to hear from our brethren in the adjoining Conferences. What think they? How feel they? Are we all ready? Say the word, and the agents and the house is up—the thing is done.

The communications of [illegible] S. A., W. J. H. and S. H. will appear next week; Remittances also.

LAST HOURS OF BISHOP CAPERS.

It needs no searching among our exchanges to be reminded of the calamity that has befallen the Church. The press, both secular and religious, bears testimony to the loss of one endeared to Christians beyond his own communion, and to men beyond the bounds of his local habitation.

We now present some intelligence of "the last end" of Bishop Capers. He that had cheered others for half a century as they entered the dark valley, himself must die. On that "same Jesus" must his soul be stayed. And how he died we felt deeply, the common interest to know.

The editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, of February 9, says:

His visit to the Florida Conference seemed a blessing to the brethren and to himself. We passed in his company, at the residence of his son, Major Capers, the last evening of his stay in Charleston, just one week previous to his fatal attack. Much of the evening was spent in conversation respecting this, his last Conference. He expressed the liveliest interest in the Church there, and earnest desire for its prosperity, believing, as he said, that the importance of this section, and its wants and worth, were underrated by the preachers generally. He expressed some disappointment at not having received from an officer of the Conference some information necessary to the completion of the Conference minutes for publication, as he wished, as always heretofore, to forward these minutes to the Publishers as soon as he reached home. When he was told that the information desired had reached the office that afternoon and could be obtained from the next week's paper, he remarked: "But, brother, I may be too late." And it was; for before he could have received it he was upon his deathbed. He had met some members of his family whom he did not expect to see here, and he remarked it with special satisfaction, saying that he rarely saw so many of his children together, there being six of the ten present. They parted that night to meet next on the resurrection morn.

The next night, Jan. 16th, he passed in Columbia at the house of his old friend and companion in the ministry, the Rev. N. Talley, and the 17th reached his home in Anderson to leave it no more, until called away by the angels. Though he had apparently seen for some time in better health than usual—with the exception of one or two asthmatic attacks—he had often mentioned "a strange feeling in his left side." Disease was here preparing to spring a mine which should one day startle the Church with the sudden intelligence of his death. He employed the greater part of Thursday, the 25th, on which day he completed his 65th year, in his garden, preparing the ground for early vegetables. This was a favorite occupation with him, and though the day was very unpleasant, he engaged in the work with great interest, and was in fine spirits. After prayers at night, he sat conversing with his family with much interest upon various topics, though he sat with a pillow against his back and smoked freely, which he did only during the attacks of asthma, (from which he was now suffering,) he seemed so well in other respects that none of his family thought to ask him if he was in pain.

At midnight two of his daughters, the only members of the family at home, except Mrs. Capers, were awakened by their mother calling to them in great alarm, and upon hastening to the Bishop's room, they found him sitting up, but suffering great agony. "Make my blood circulate," he said; and warm flannels, friction and mustard were applied, but gave no relief. He writhed in pain; his hands, feet and head were of icy coldness, and a cold perspiration oozed from every pore. Seeing alarm depicted in the countenances of those around him, and feeling that he could not endure such agony much longer, he said "I am already cold;" and now, my precious children, give me up to God. Do that more of you were here, but I bless God that I have so lately seen you all." Then turning to his daughter Mary, he said: "I want you to finish my minutes to-morrow and send them off." He gave some directions respecting them, and thus closed his labors for the church, thinking of duty in what he believed were the agonies of death. Meanwhile the physician came, and during the next violent paroxysm of pain succeeded in producing nausea; vomiting brought him relief, so that he was removed to his bed. He then asked the hour. When told, he said: 'What, only three hours since I have been suffering such torture! Only three hours! What must be the voice of the bird that cries, 'Eternity! Eternity!' Three hours have taken away all but my religion."

The next day his son-in-law, the Rev. S. B. Jones, came. During this day he suffered much, but was constantly engaged in prayer. It is believed especially for his family. On the Sabbath, he was so much better that he sat up nearly all day, and at night his children, at his urgent request, left him to sleep. Early on Monday, the 29th January, he proposed to get up and dress himself, and to give Mrs. Capers opportunity for rest, as her anxiety had kept her from sleeping during the previous night. She urged him, however, to keep his bed, as he had medicine to take. After taking this, he drank freely of water, and as he laid himself down, fixing his head upon his arm, in an instant his countenance expressed the most perfect composure—his spirit was caught up to heaven. There was no sigh, nor groan, nor convulsion, to mark the moment. His devoted wife refused to believe that he was gone. She called to him, as though she expected an answer, and it was an hour before she ceased endeavoring to restore him to consciousness, so fully persuaded was she that this was but a fainting fit, but death had set his seal upon the great and good man, and that terribly sudden malady, disease of the heart, had now made an end of his labors and his life.

FUNERAL.

The South Carolinian, (Columbia, S. C.,) of February 6, gives an extended notice, from which we ex

On Friday morning, the body, enclosed in a metallic coffin, was removed from his home near Anderson Court-House, accompanied by the bereaved family and several friends. Judge Whitner, Mr. Osborne and others accompanied it on its way to Columbia as far as Belton. At this point they were met by the Rev. Dr. Whitefoord Smith, who had been requested by the family of the deceased to accompany the remains to Columbia and preach the funeral sermon.

On arriving at Cokesbury, a large number of weeping friends visited the car in which the body was conveyed, and gazed for the last time upon those features so calm and placid in death, and which had been so endeared to them in life. A committee, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Boyd, Rev. Messrs. J. W. Townsend, G. H. Round and J. W. Wightman had been appointed by the community of Cokesbury to unite in the procession.

The funeral escort reached Columbia at 4 o'clock P. M., and was met at the depot by a committee of the clergy and laity, where a procession was formed and the body conveyed to the residence of the Rev. N. Talley.

On Saturday morning, at 10 o'clock, the body, accompanied by his family and the clergy of Columbia, was conveyed to the Washington street Methodist Church, the following ministers acting as pall-bearers:

Rev. P. J. Shand, Rev. A. Wigfall, of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Rev. Dr. Boyce and Rev. Mr. Curtis, of the Baptist Church.

Rev. Drs. Leland, Howe and Rev. Mr. Frazier, of the Presbyterian Church.

Rev. Messrs. Crook, Gamewell and S. Townsend, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

At the Church a large and sympathizing audience had already assembled. The solemn services were conducted by Rev. Dr. Whitefoord Smith, and opened by the choir singing the 737th hymn:

"What though the arm of conquering death."

This was followed by a very impressive prayer. The 739th hymn:

"Servant of God, well done," was then sung. The lessons were the 90th psalm and a portion of the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians.

Dr. Smith then read his text from the Acts of the Apostles, 13th chapter and part of the 36th verse:

"For David, after he had served his own generation, by the will of God, fell on sleep."

The sermon of Dr. Smith is represented as very appropriate. It will be published. His personal intimacy and Conference connection enabled him to bring many illustrations of life to bear upon the text. Among other things, this:

"About the year 1827, his attention being called to the subject by C. Cotesworth Pinckney, he founded the mission to the slaves on the plantation, and at the opening of the work found effectual co-operation from John Honour and J. H. Mossey. To Dr. Capers belongs the credit, under God, of establishing these missions, now so important and interesting a department of the operations of the Church."

The preacher alluded to the desire of the community of Columbia to have his body interred at that place. This he characterized as the "selfishness of love." But there was peculiar fitness in the location of that resting place. In 1831, as pastor of the church, he had laid the corner stone of the church in which they now worshipped, and his name was inscribed on that stone. His ministry here, too, was peculiarly blessed.

Dr. Smith feelingly alluded to the Bishop's return home after attending to the last official duties for the year at the Florida Conference. He had returned to the bosom of that family, whose members almost worshipped him, to "fall on sleep!"

"Fell on sleep!" how beautiful was this expression. The Scriptures loved to designate death as sleep. When the Saviour spoke of Lazarus, he said he "was not dead, but sleepeth."

In the hymn sung at the opening of the service was this line:

"At midnight came the cry."

This, too, was peculiarly appropriate. He was attacked by intense pain on Thursday night, at 12 o'clock. Two lines in the same hymn also presented a striking coincidence:

"His tent, at sunrise, on the ground
A darkened ruin lay."

He died exactly at sunrise, on Monday.

The Friday previous to his death was his birthday (he was sixty-five years and three days old when he died.) On the evening of that day he told his children he "had liked to spend his birthday in Heaven." When death approached, he told his children that they had nothing to do but give him back to his God, and be thankful that He had spared him to them so long. He said to them, with the confidence of a Christian, that the "preparation was not then to be made." With him it had been made for many years.

At the close of the services the choir, which seemed to be a union of all the choirs of the different churches, sung with great effect, the beautiful hymn (731) of Bishop Heber:

"Thou art gone to the grave, but we will not deplore thee."

A large portion of the congregation passed around the altar, taking their last look at one they so tenderly loved. The colored people, to whom the deceased was peculiarly endeared by his many services, were then allowed the like privilege.

The body was then removed to the grove in the rear of the pulpit, where the service for the burial of the dead was read by the Rev. Nicholas Talley.

Bishop Capers was a Methodist rigidly—in dress, manner, doctrine, discipline, life, labor and spirit. With this well defined, clean cut denominational character coexisted a genuine catholicity. No man, perhaps, during nearly fifty years' service as a minister, could be found who was less inclined to be involved in religious controversies. He had room enough in his heart for all of whatever name who loved the Saviour in sincerity. It was therefore a befitting feature of this solemn occasion, that, of so many ministers of the different denominations, deeply affected, sitting by the altar, around the corpse.

THE CHURCHES.

M. E. Church, South.—The Methodist Episcopal Church at the corner of Eighth street and Washington Avenue, St. Louis, was dedicated a few days since. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. B. Parsons, D.D., of Louisville. After the Doctor had finished his discourse, which occupied one hour and thirty-five minutes, a collection was taken up which amounted to $3,024. The building cost $55,000. The edifice is Norman in its style. Its exterior is 106 feet by 65. The main audience room is 86 by 60 feet, with circular pews, and all finely cushioned. It has a separate lecture room and Sunday school room, and an office for the pastor, all well furnished, and all above the surface. The account before us says that this church is one of the most magnificent edifices in the West. The pews are to be rented, not sold.

LaGrange College, as far as the three Conferences are concerned, is removed to Florence, and President Rivers announces that the next session will open there. The new buildings, says the Huntsville Advocate, will be erected by the citizens of Florence for the college during the present year. In the meantime, however, the trustees of the college do not concur in the action of the Conferences, and announce that the college will remain where it has been all the time, at LaGrange. Much controversy about the matter has taken place in the Tuscumbia and Florence papers. See advertisement.

Dr. Taylor might be called Bishop. In the last four months he has visited thirteen Conferences, involving a travel of ten thousand miles. The interest thus awakened in behalf of China will never die, but go on increasing, and will show itself in successive harvests of missionaries, missionary zeal and missionary money.

After seeing all the Conferences, he writes of the Louisiana:

"The preachers form a noble band of noble men. Would that their number were twice its present figure. Of no other work within the bounds of the M. E. Church, South, can it be more truly said, 'the field is white already to the harvest.' And for no other do I more earnestly pray the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest; for the harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few. Bishop Andrew needed thirty new men for the work. Oh, ye preachers in crowded and overstocked Conferences, did you obey the call to preach with the express understanding between yourselves and your God that you were not to go away from home to do it? If China be too far, go to California; go to Florida; go to Louisiana. What means the late resolution of the Georgia Conference appointing a day of fasting and prayer that the Lord may raise up more laborers, when they had a score of applications more than they had work for? Better pray God to inclian the hearts of this large surplus already raised up to go where they are really wanted, and wanted most, rather than stand all the day idle."

M. E. Church.—The total increase of all the annual Conferences of the M. E. Church for the year 1854, is 30,732. Last year the increase, according to the Methodist Almanac, was 26,859.

The annual catalogue shows the number of students of Wesleyan University, Middletown, to be 123, a larger number than the institution has had for a number of years. The University has been in existence since the year 1831.

Presbyterian.—A new Presbytery, called the Presbytery of New Orleans, has just been constituted in this city. It embraces the Presbyterian clergy of the city, and those east of the river in the country, nearly up to Natchez.

An addition of $30,000 has been raised in subscription to the permanent funds of Hampden Sydney College, Va. The prospects of the college are said to be bright and cheering in all respects.

The Oriental, or Tung-Agai San Luk, is the name of a new paper published in San Francisco by the Rev. W. Speer, Missionary of the Presbyterian Board to the Chinese in California. It will be published tri-weekly in Chinese, and weekly in English.

Baptist.—Of regular Baptist periodicals in the United States there are twenty-eight weekly newspapers, fifteen monthly publications and two quarterly reviews. In the British Provinces are four weekly newspapers and a quarterly publication, called the "Grand Ligne Mission Register." There are in the United States twenty-six Baptist colleges and ten theological institutions, or departments of theology, connected with the colleges.

The Celestials are likely to be well cared for in our land. The Rev. J. L. Shuck, formerly of the Southern Baptist Mission, in Shanghai, a very efficient and successful laborer, and highly esteemed among his own denomination throughout the United States, is at present in Sacramento. He has given a successful course of lectures on China, and is preparing to erect an edifice for a chapel and school-room.

Episcopal.—The whole number of parishes connected with the Episcopal Church in the United States is estimated at 1,700. The number of the clergy, exclusive of the bishops, is not far from 1,720. The bishops number 37, including 3 consecrated for the foreign field, and 2 suspended.

The Gospel Messenger and the New York Churchman are dealing out particular vengeance for all such Episcopalians as escape to go, or in any wise encourage social prayer meetings, where men and women pray without books. Protestant Episcopal "Brotherhoods" and "Sisterhoods," in separate organizations, have been made the subject of some pointed censures by the Bishop of Western New York, in his recent address to the convention of that diocese. He pronounces them, needless, cumbersome and hazardous, forming a church within a church, and likely to become a sectional, exclusive and inimical party organization.

The Episcopal Board of Foreign Missions have appointed a missionary to labor among the Chinese in California. The Rev. Mr. Syle, who is probably on his way here by this time, is a native of England, who was brought to this country by Mellvaine, of Ohio, and graduated under his care at Kenyon College, in 1840. He went to Shanghai, China, in 1845, whence he returned in 1853, on account of the ill-health of his family.

PROGRESS OF REFORM.

One branch of our City Council recommends an ordinance that liquor shops and coffee-houses be closed on the Sabbath; a fine of fifty dollars for the first offence, and forfeiture of license for the second. We trust the other will concur.

Next, let us have stores closed up. This is generally done in the American portion of the city. Just about the Roman Catholic Cathedral Sunday morning is the briskest trade day of the week. Opposition may be feared from that quarter.

Mobile has lately covered the whole ground. It is time for us to have a Sabbath.

The movement of closing the liquor shops in New York on Sunday, it is said, is becoming popular even among the old topers, who are coming to the conclusion that they need one day in seven to "cool their coppers."

The Quarterly.—January number on our table. Dr. Bogget, the editor, furnishes a rich literary table. His notices of new publications are the best we find anywhere—terse, judicious and characterizing. Perhaps a grain of bile would help them.

The principal contribution is that on Prayer, by Dr. Winans, setting forth its objective virtue, and setting aside a "tentative essay" that appeared in the Review, taking the unscriptural ground that the efficacy of prayer was only subjective.

Our Quarterly bears the imprint, Excelsior. It is improved and improving every way. The portrait of the late Bishop Capers, taken in serene old age, enriches this number. Others are promised. Back numbers can be ordered from this time. Send in your names.

Jacksonville (Fla.) Conference.—The Lord has made the lines fall unto me in a pleasant place, this year. After my transfer from Alabama to Florida Conference, Bishop Capers, I believe, under the direction of the Lord, sent me to Jacksonville. At my first sermon six were added to the Church, and I am engaged since my arrival (three weeks) in a protracted meeting, resulting in an addition to the Church of seventy-five members, white and black. Conversions are numerous, and the fire is only beginning to burn. Among the accessions are some of the most prominent citizens, and some of the members of "The Church" and other churches.

This is the Lord's doing, and not marvelous in our eyes; for the Father of our spirits has been ever kind to us, and we know there is nothing hard or impossible for our God, the great Jehovah.

I believe we shall have hundreds of conversions before this meeting closes. Our trust is in God, and we shall not fear or want.

Yours, D. B. Lyne.

Pub. Doc.—To Hon. J. P. Benjamin we are indebted for a copy of "Sickness and Mortality on Board Emigrant ships." Also, to Hon. W. R. Gober for a copy of Gov. Bigler's Message to the California Legislature.

In the obituary of John Richard Reamer, aged twenty-two years, published on the 20th ult., the name was misprinted for J. K. Kenrick. This error we regret, but it is one of the unavoidable consequences of writing names indistinctly.

The Council at Eutaw, Ala., lately raised the price of license to retail liquor to $1,000.

ARRIVAL OF THE EMPIRE CITY.

The U. S. mail steamship Empire City, H. Windle, commanding, arrived here from New York via Havana at 1½ o'clock, 14th inst., with 26 passengers from New York, 18 from Havana, 30 from California and several in the steerage.

The Empire City arrived at Havana February 9; received the California mails and passengers from the U. S. mail steamship El Dorado, Capt. Gray, and left for New Orleans on the 10th, at 5 P. M.

The Panama Railroad was completed, and the fast train crossed from Panama to Aspinwall on the 28th January, bringing the passengers per Empire City from California.

Arrival of the Steamship Nautilus.—The steamship Nautilus, Capt. Thompson, arrived the 13th instant, from Brazos Santiago. We have received by her but one paper, the Brownsville Flag of the 3d inst., which contains no news of importance.

Gen. De la Vega had taken the place of Gen. Woll as Military Commander of the city of Matamoras, and the latter had gone to the city of Mexico.

The flag announces that a new paper, printed in the Spanish language, had commenced publication at Brownsville. It is called El Rago Federal, and declares itself the organ of the revolution now going on in Mexico.

Oil Market.—The transactions in our Western produce market have been more limited than they would have been this week, owing to the interruption of supplies occasioned by the unnavigable condition of the upper rivers. It will be observed, however, that in cotton, sugar, molasses, Rio coffee, and several other articles, of which the stocks were more ample, the transactions have been on a very extensive scale. See commercial column.

POLITICS IN RELIGION.

This is the subject of a trenchant sermon preached by Rev. C. Wadsworth, pastor of Arch Street Church, Philadelphia, a neat copy of which is on our table. The preacher is not of that sort whose pulpits become platforms where all questions of practical morals are discussed, as side issues with some aim of the demagogues; where the Cross of Christ is taken down from its high place as the crowning glory of the sanctuary, and in its stead, as an engine of reform, is lifted the ballot box; and the popular passions are lashed into storm, that with their suffrages as freemen they may carry a Maine law or defeat a Nebraska bill.

An appreciative friend, "C," writes us:

"His congregations are always large; all denominations flock to hear him; and few ministers are so often called upon to fill the pulpits of other denominations. In all the excitements, political or ecclesiastical, which have betrayed others into improprieties, he has kept a cool head, and has been content to preach the gospel as he finds it in the Bible. When the excitement about new school and old school was rife, he was often called upon to define his position; but, much to the disappointment of the zealots on either side, instead of ranking himself among either, he was bold to say what the Bible said, preaching the Cross of Christ, and avoiding any participation in the bitter controversy.

The citizen is called upon, as a member of the State, to use all lawful means to suppress vice and promote virtue. Their civil bearings demand it, without being alarmed at the cry of conscience and Church and State. States and corporations boast of having no souls. The preacher thinks they have, or ought to have:

"Governments have a moral character as patent and as paraded as the device on their banner folds. The elder Rome was an unscrupulous robber. The elder Greece was an exquisite voluptuary. Russia, to-day, is a sturdy and selfish churl. France is an ambitious and unprincipled man of fashion. Spain is a wasted and wrinkled and scorned courtezan, in the decay and decrepitude of her dissolute army. England is a half breed between the Pharisee and the prize fighter. And America is a well trained yet most passionate youth, of whom it is altogether a problem whether the manhood be a fine Christian gentleman, or an unprincipled ruffian."

The clamor against Bible reading in the common school system of education is against not a Protestant, but an American principle. What says Mr. W.:

"Administer oaths on the Bible, and yet not require any subject of such an oath to understand the Bible! Why the world has never heard of a parallel to such suicidal absurdity! All as safely to your liberties might you inaugurate a President or empannel a jury by pressing to the man's lip some old volume of Pagan Mythology, which the man had never read, whose gods he did not know, whose authority he did not recognize."

Again, the Sabbath day is claimed as an American institution; one recognized by and worked into the constitution of the country.

This hue and cry of "Church and State" which is ever boisterously raised when we seek aid from executive power for such sanctification of God's Sabbath, is as little countenanced by our Federal or State constitutions as it is by common sense. A public recognition of the Sabbath as holy time has from the first been accorded to the day by our Federal Constitution. On that day the high civil functions of the Chief Magistrate of the nation, the business of the Supreme Court, the sessions of both Houses of Congress, the operations of the War, Treasury and Navy Departments, all are suspended by constitutional provisions. And so all the individual States of the Union, in their capacity as sovereign powers, do provide for the Sabbath's sanctification, by precept and penalty.

Gold.—We learn that advices have been received of a transfer of $500,000 in gold, being ordered from the United States Assistant Treasurer, St. Louis, to the Branch Mint in this city. This sum will be absorbed by the silver now on deposit in the Mint. It is hoped, for the credit of the Government, that a similar sum will be immediately ordered to cover expected remittances of coin via Brazos Santiago.

Cotton and Sugar.—The receipts of cotton for the twenty-four hours ending at 6 o'clock Wednesday, were from Smithland, out of the Cumberland River, by the America, 1185 bales; from Memphis, by the Belfast, 2682 bales; from the same, by the T. P. Leathers, 1802 bales; from Shreveport, by the Lone Star, 649 bales; from Fort Adams, by the David Gibson, 309 bales. Total, 6577 bales, 985 hogsheads sugar, and 735 barrels molasses.

A Miss Norwood was seriously burned on the night of the 30th ult., at the Academy, in the town of Summerfield, Dallas county, Ala. She was standing near the fire in the music room, when her dress took fire, and in her fright she attempted to run down stairs, but fell and rolled down. There happened to be some gentlemen near by, who succeeded in smothering the flames by wrapping her in cloaks. She was frightfully and seriously burned, and there is but little hope of her recovery.

The Weather.—Is of kaleidoscopic changefulness at present. Sunshine and shade, heat and cold, wind and dust, have been following each other and jumbling themselves together, for some days past in a way that would puzzle Proteus himself to keep record of. Shade, wind and dust predominated yesterday, and once or twice the sidewalks were freckled with tantalising drops of rain. Last night it drizzled enough to lay the dust. Out of the hydrant districts there is beginning to be distress for want of water, and the young spring herbage looks as if it had started into life too soon, and would like to shrink back again. A dash of rain would be thankfully received by every body.

Steamboat Ed. Howard on Fire.—We learn from the officers of the steamer Bulletin No. 2, that the Ed. Howard, from the Cumberland River, after having been lightened off by the Iroquois, where she had been aground at President's Island, took fire in her hold, on Wednesday last, 7th inst., and to prevent the total destruction of the boat and barge, they were obliged to fill her with water. The Iroquois, bound up, after discharging her upward freight, went again to the assistance of the Howard and took on board most of her cargo, and would bring it to this port. The Howard was sunk down even to her guards.

At a recent interview between Col. Manypenny, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Six Nations, Col. M. was adopted into one of their tribes, and formally invested with the title of Hor-waw-gun-e-no, or Pacificator.

Fate of the Mamelukes.

A correspondent of the Detroit Advertiser, who is spending the winter in Egypt, gives an interesting sketch of the Mamelukes, who, for centuries, have exercised a controling influence in the affairs of that country. We copy one of his letters on the subject:

As you ascend to the citadel of Cairo, situated in the rear of the city, upon a spur of the mountains of Mokattam, you are startled by the appearance of a cluster of edifices rising from the midst of the desert, about two miles distant from the spot where you stand. It is "the city of tombs," the tombs of the Mamelukes, and the citadel you are approaching is the fatal spot where the last of them were slaughtered by Mohammed Ali.

But who were the Mamelukes, and what did they do to deserve such a fate? Let us get answers to these questions, and then we shall be prepared to contemplate their tragical end.

In the lapse of about twenty centuries, ending with the eighth of the Christian era, Egypt had been overrun and conquered by the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, and the Saracens, successively, and, in their turn, the latter were compelled to change places with their own slaves, the Mamelukes, who, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, became masters of the country.

The most reliable account of their origin is that they were introduced into the country the century previous, by Saladin the Great, from Circassia, because, as a foreigner and usurper, he was afraid to trust the natives of the country about his person. And, for the same reason, they themselves, in their exaltation, transported slaves from the same country, and these, too, at the end of a hundred and twenty years, took their turn and became masters of the country. While the throne became theirs, however, the Mamelukes still continued substantially to govern the country as heys of districts, in which capacity they had things pretty much their own way. And even after the country had been overrun, and conquered by the Turks in the 16th century, and had become a vice-royalty of the Ottoman Empire, down to the time of the final catastrophe which overwhelmed them in the Citadel of Cairo, within the memory of many now embracing a period of more than six hundred years from the time of their first accession to power, they continued to exert uncontrolled dominion in their respective districts, being accountable to the Viceroy only for a certain amount of revenue.

There has been much pompous declamation about the free and independent spirit of the Mamelukes, and about "liberty expiring with them in Egypt," an idea, however, which could only have been begotten in a mind schooled in the doctrine of the necessity of a hierarchy of some kind to tranquilize down the people.

The truth is, as I have become fully satisfied, it was under the blighting influence of Mameluke rule, that Egypt sank to its lowest depth of degradation, as "the basest of kingdoms." As beys, they practiced the most wanton oppressions upon the unresisting nations of the country, reducing them by their exactions, to a state of wretchedness at which humanity revolts, at the same time caring little for the accountability to the Pasha. They were held responsible to that functionary for the collection annually of a certain amount of taxes apportioned to each of their districts respectively, and the required amount was promptly collected, and as promptly pocketed, and refused to be paid over.

Thus matters had gone on from bad to worse century after century, under their rapacious rule, until it verily seemed that the lowest depths to which a people could be reduced, had been reached. Attempts had been made before Mohammed Ali came into power, to abate the nuisance, but in vain. One of these attempts made upon the principle that nothing short of their utter extermination would relieve the country, is deserving of notice. It was early at the beginning of the present century, just at the time the British arms had triumphed over those of France in Egypt, and the beys had been won over to British interests, that Hassan Pacha laid a plan for their destruction. He invited them to a sumptuous feast at Aboukir (a little east of Alexandria, on the coast,) and after the feast, he proposed an excursion to the bay of Aboukir, having provided pleasure boats for the purpose; to which they consented, and to quiet all apprehension, he embarked with them himself.

They had not proceeded far, however, before a small cutter was observed, evidently making an effort to overtake them, upon which the Pacha suggested that probably an Envoy from the Sultan, with dispatches, was on board, and falling back until it came up, he transferred himself bodily to the same, receiving and reading at the same time, what seemed to be the dispatches he had anticipated. By this time the little fleet was far ahead, and while the Pacha was lingering, as the boys supposed, to read his dispatches, they entered the bay of Aboukir, and before they were aware, were in the midst of the Turkish fleet, from which destruction was poured upon them without mercy. A great portion of them were slain, and those who escaped were taken prisoners, and compelled to swear upon the Koran their allegiance to the Sultan, to the renunciation of all other influence.

The terrible blow, however, inflicted by Turkish treachery, did not cure the evil. Upon the accession of Mohammed Ali to power, in 1805, he found the country still suffering, to a greater or less extent as ever, from the grinding oppressions of Mameluke rule, and he saw clearly that there was neither hope for himself nor his country, while those petty tyrants retained their power. But, unhappily, semi-barbarian as he was, he had never been schooled to a recognition of the nicer principles of human truth and justice, and of course was not unscrupulous as to the means he used for the accomplishment of his ends, whether selfish or patriotic.

The turbulent horsemen, knowing the fatality of Mohammed to their order, and dreading his revenge, had opposed his elevation to power, and, after his induction into power, they gathered about Cairo in a threatening attitude, as though they were meditating an attack. Nothing could have suited Mohammed better, lest they should not carry out their purpose, intrigued with the Shieks friendly to him to encourage the Beys in their design of attacking him in Cairo, with a view to draw them into a snare. They caught at the bait, and as the lion-like gates were opened to let in the camels they rushed in, and dividing themselves into two bands, end striking up their martial music, advanced in the full expectation of an easy triumph, when, to their consternation, they were attacked from all quarters, both by the soldiers of Mohammed and the inhabitants, and cut to pieces without mercy, very few escaping, and those few were taken prisoners and slaughtered. Eighty-three heads, embalmed, were sent as trophies to Constantinople.

But it was in 1811 that the crowning act was enacted—a scene which, for cold blooded atrocity, has few parallels in history, and which in the extermination of the Mameluke dynasty in Egypt—a most philanthropic end, when published by means at which humanity shudders.

The favorite son of the Viceroy was invested with the honors of a Pacha of the second order conferred by the Sultan, and apparently as a mark of especial friendship invited all the Beys to be present and participate in the festivities of the occasion. They accordingly appeared in their most brilliant uniform, offering their congratulations upon the joyful event, and were received with every apparent cordiality, the Viceroy sitting among them around the festive board, conversing and making merry as with friends.

After refreshments had been served, the procession was formed, with the troops of the Pacha at the head, with the purpose of making their exit from the citadel, and just as they were passing through a deep cut in the rock, the gates were closed behind them, so that they were hemmed in before and behind, in which condition they were attacked by soldiers stationed for the purpose, and all slaughtered to a man. The weltering in their own blood, no less than one hundred and seventy boys, besides their Mamelukes, one only escaping, who had not arrived in season to join the procession, by leaping his horse down a precipice, and fleeing across the desert. What few there were left in the country, were hunted out in their hiding places, and slain without mercy; and thus ended, for the present, the grinding oppressions of that brave and turbulent race in Egypt. Another cargo of embalmed heads were sent in triumph to Constantinople, and all Egypt was prostrate under the iron reign of Mohammed.

NOTICES.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We take this method of announcing to the Church and the public generally that we are now opening, in our new and commodious buildings in this city, a large and varied stock of Methodist books and approved miscellaneous publications, including a good supply of common, classical and scientific works, together with a general assortment of Sunday school books, tracts, &c., to which valuable additions will continue to be made, as the demands of the Church and the extent of the business may require.

Our brethren and friends throughout the whole range of Southern Conferences, are now respectfully invited to favor us with their orders, being assured that to the utmost of our resources their wants and wishes shall be fully and promptly supplied. For particulars, see our new and enlarged catalogues, which we are sending out by mail, free of postage, to all our brethren whose address we may be able to ascertain. It is scarcely necessary to add that the united, continued and increased patronage and support of the present concern by the whole Church is most earnestly and anxiously desired by the agents; and if secured, will tend to obviate, at an early day, perhaps, the causes which now prevent the establishment of depositories as authorized by the late General Conference. A different policy must eventuate in a widely different result.

In conclusion, we may be allowed to recommend the cash system, so far, at least as it may be found convenient or practicable, to all who may favor the Southern Methodist Publishing House with their patronage; believing, as we do, that the general approval and practical adoption of the policy by the Church, as well in the sale as in the purchase of the books, would greatly tend to promote the interests of all concerned.

STEVENSON & OWEN, Agents.

Nashville, Tenn. Jan 22, 1855.

P. S.—Orders for books addressed to the agents at Louisville, Ky., will continue to be filled at that place up to the first of March next; after that time all orders should be forwarded to them at this place. S. & O.

DEATHS.

DIED.—At his residence, near Union Town, Ala., December 20, 1854, the Rev. J. WILKINSON, a local elder in the M. E. Church, South, in the sixty-second year of his age.

He was a native of Wilkes county, Ga., and removed to Clarke county, Ala., in 1818, where he resided for some twenty years. He afterwards removed to Perry county, where he continued to reside until his death.

Brother Wilkinson was a good physician, and at one period in his life did an extensive practice. He likewise made himself pretty well acquainted with law, and was at one time Judge of the County Court, and for five years represented his county in the State Legislature.

He was licensed to preach in the Methodist Church about thirty years ago, and to the close of his life he always sustained an excellent character as a Christian and a minister. In former years he was extensively useful as a local preacher, and I am informed that there were many seals to his ministry. For some years before his death he was in feeble health, and preached but little.

Some four months before his death his spiritual strength was much renewed, and from thence forward to the close of his life he looked back to that period as the beginning of a new era in his Christian experience. He was attacked with his last illness on Sabbath evening; the morning of that day he and all his family met together in class meeting, and he informed the class that for six weeks past he had been praying for the fullness of a blessing of perfect love; that he already enjoyed it in part, and he sought them to pray for him that he might enjoy it fully. During his sickness, his religious peace was full and uninterrupted. When I first visited him, he calmly said that he expected to die, and that he thought it was the right time; he had passed three score years, and he now felt that his work on earth was done." He then added, "Through the grace of God, I am ready to depart, and be with Christ." In this state of mind he continued to the last; and a few moments before his death he said to his physician, "My way is clear, and I shall soon be in heaven."

J. E. NEWMAN.

The Southern Advocate will please copy.

DIED.—In Jefferson county, Ala., December 7th, 1854, CHARLES ANTHONY CALDWELL. While we were, with saddened hearts, called upon to witness the triumph of death over nature, we thank God our fears were cooled while witnessing the triumph of religion over death and all its foure. EDWARD.

DIED.—At his residence on Red River, parish of Natchitooches, La., on the 8th January, 1855, Brother THOMAS M. BROWN, in his fifty-second year, long known as a consistent and useful member of the M. E. Church in this country. For more than thirty years he had labored to secure an interest in the Redeemer. Nor did he labor in vain: his end was peace and joy unspeakable. God grant unto his family and friends may all remember his dying charge!

To his family, his friends, his neighbors, and, in a very especial manner, to the Church in this circuit, Brother Brown's death is a severe loss, and will long be felt as such. But God, in his unerring wisdom, knows what is best for all. H. MCCALLEN.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.—The Clinton Whig of the 9th inst. says:

We are pleased to state that Mr. Fir, who was so dangerously wounded a few days since by a negro belonging to A. W. Poole, is recovering. Mr. Fir was discharging the duties of overseer on the place, and in an attempt to arrest the boy, received several stabs in his body. The negro has not been captured.

On the night of the 3d inst. the hotel at Vermillionville, kept by Mr. John Kignes, was entirely destroyed by fire.

The young man who was found murdered near the Elm Oak plantation, in this parish, on saturday morning last, was a Mr. Mayes, son of W. T. Mayes, of East Feliciana. We have been informed that he was found near the road on the upper Jackson road. It appears that the cause of the death by a blow inflicted on the right side of his head with a club, or some other heavy instrument. It received the fatal blow on the left hand side of the road and was dragged across the road into the woods, where the body was found.

A fire occurred in Mobile, on Sunday evening which destroyed the drug store of George Custer & Co., and greatly damaged the adjoining building, occupied below by C. Brod, wig maker, and above by Mrs. Sught, milliner.

The Little Boy that Died.

Dr. Chalmers is said to be the author of the following beautiful poem, written on the occasion of the death of a young son whom he greatly loved:

I am all alone in my chamber now,
And the midnight hour is near;
And the fog-whistle's sound I hear,
And over my coat in its solitude,
Sweet feelings of coldness glide,
For my heart and my eyes are full when I think
Of the little boy that died.

I went one night to my father's house—
Went home to the dear ones all—
And softly I opened the gateled gate,
And softly the door of the hall.
My mother came out to meet her son—
She kissed me and then she sighed.
And her head fell on my neck, and she wept
For the little boy that died.

I shall miss him when the flowers come.
In the garden where he played;
I shall miss him more by the fireside,
When the flowers have all decayed.
I shall see his toys and his empty chair,
And the horse he used to ride;
And they will speak with a silent speech
Of the little boy that died.

We shall go home to our Father's house—
To our Father's house in the skies
Where the hope of our souls shall have no blight,
Our love no broken ties.
We shall roam on the banks of the river of peace,
And bathe in its blissful tide,
And one of the joys of our Heaven shall be
The little boy that died.

A RUSSIAN REMINISCENCE.

Upon one of the coldest days in February, 1858, I left Paris by the Orleans Railway. The weather was extremely severe, the frozen snow lay thick in the streets, the asphalt of the boulevards was slippery as glass, sledges scoured the Champs Elysees and Bois de Boulogne. An icy wind whistled around the train as we quitted the shelter of the station, and I regretted, as I buttoned myself to the chin, and shrunk into my corner, that the carriage was not full, instead of having but one companion beside myself.

Opposite to me sat a hale man of about sixty-five, with a quick, bright eye, an intelligent, good-humored countenance, somewhat weather-beaten, and the red rosette of the Legion of Honor in his button-hole. During the first half hour he pored over a letter, whose contents, judging from the animated expression of his physiognomy, interested him strongly. He seemed scarcely aware of my presence. At last he put up the letter, and then for the first time looked me in the face. I had been but a few days out of a sick-bed, and was sensitive to the cold, and doubtless my appearance was chilly and woe-begone enough, for I detected a slight approach to a smile at the corners of the stranger's mouth. To one or two common-place remarks he replied courteously, but laconically, like a man who is neither unsocial nor averse to conversation; but who prefers his own thoughts to that hald talk with travelers sometimes weary each other rather than sit silent. So, our dialogue soon dropped. The cold increased, my feet were benumbed, and I stamped them on the floor of the carriage to revive the circulation. My companion observed my proceedings with a comical look as if he though me a very tender traveler.

"This carriage must be badly closed," I remarked. "It is bitter cold to my feet."

"For that discomfort I have little pity," replied the Frenchman. "A ride on the railway is soon over, and a good fire or a brisk walk is a quick and easy remedy. Mine is a different case. For forty years I have never known warm feet."

"For forty years?" I repeated, thinking I had misunderstood him.

"Yes, sir, forty years; since the winter of 1812—the writer of the Russian Campaign."

"You were in that terrible campaign?" I inquired in a tone of interest and curiosity.

My companion, previously taciturn, suddenly became communicative. "All through it, sir," he replied, "from the Niemen to the Kremlin, and back again. It was my first campaign, and I came near being my last. I was in others afterwards; in Germany, in 1813, when the combined Germans and Russians drove us before them, for went of the brave fellows we had left in Muscovy's snows; in France, in 1814, when the Emperor made his gallant struggle against overwhelming forces; and at the closing scene in Flanders; but not all these three campaigns put together, nor, as I believe, all that this century has witnessed, can match the horrors of that dreadful winter in Russia."

He paused, and, leaning back in his corner, seemed to revolve in his mind events of powerful interest long gone by. I waited awhile, in hopes he would resume the subject. As he did not do so, I asked him to what army he belonged when in Russia.

"I was assistant surgeon in a regiment of hussars," he answered, "and in my medical capacity I had abundant opportunity to make acquaintance with the horrors of war. On the 6th of September, for instance, at the Moskwa—Heavens! what a shambles that was! Ah, it was fine to see such valor on both sides—for the Russians fought well—gallantly, sir, of where, where would have been the glory of bonting them? But Ney! Ney! Oh, he was splendid that day! His whole countenance gleamed as he again and again led the bloody charge, exposing himself as freely as any corporal in the ranks. And Eugene, the Viceroy, with what vigor he hurled his masses against that terrible redoubt! When at last it was his, what a sight was there! The ground was not strewn with dead; it was heaped, piled with them. They had been shot down by whole ranks, and there they lay, prostrate in the line, as they stood."

The surgeon paused. I thought of Byron's beautiful lines, beginning—

"Even as they fell, in files they lay."

But I said nothing, for I saw that my companion was now fairly started, and needed no spurring.

"Monsieur," he presently resumed, "all those things have been brought strongly to my mind by the letter you saw me just now reading. It is from an old friend, a captain in 1812, a general now, who went through the campaign, and whom I was so fortunate as to save from a grave in those infernal plains, where most of our poor comrades perished. I will tell you how it happened. We were talking of the battle of Borodino. Seventy thousand men, it is said, were killed and wounded in that murderous fight. We surgeons, as you may well think, had our hands full, and still could not suffice for a tithe of the sufferers. It was a rough breaking-in for a young hand, as I then was. Such frightful wounds as were there, of every kind and description, from shot, shell and bullet, pike and sabre. Well, sir, all the misery and suffering I then saw, all that vast amount of human agony and bloodshed, whose steam ascending to Heaven might well have brought down God's malediction on His creatures, who could thus destroy and deface each other, was nothing compared with the horrible misery we witnessed on our retreat. I have read everything that has appeared in France concerning that campaign—Segur, Labaume, and other writers. Their narratives are shocking enough, but nothing to the reality. They would have sickened their readers had they told all they saw. If anybody, who went through the campaign, could remember and set down all he witnessed, he would make the most heart-rending book that ever yet was printed, and would be accused of gross exaggeration. Exaggeration, indeed! there was no need to heighten the horrors of the winter of 1812. All that frost and famine, lead and steel could inflict, was then endured; all the crimes that reckless despair and ruthless cruelty could prompt were then perpetrated."

"And how," I asked, "did you escape, when so many, doubtless as strong and courageous, and more inured to hardship, miserably perished?"

"Under Providence, I owed my preservation to the trustiest and most faithful servant ever master had. Paul had been several years in the hussars; was an old soldier, in fact, although still a young man; and at a time when all discipline and subordination were at an end; when soldiers heeded not their officers, officers avoided their generals, and servants and masters were all alike, and upon a level, Paul proved true as steel. As if cold and the Cossacks were not enough, hunger was added to our sufferings; there was no longer a commissariat or distribution of rations; rations, forsooth! dead horse was a luxury. I have seen men fight for it till death, lean meat as it was, for the poor brutes were as starved as their riders. What little there was to eat in the villages we passed through fell to the share of the first comers. Empty larder, often smoking ruins, were all that remained for those who came behind. Well, sir, when things were at the worst, and provender at the scarcest, Paul always had something for me in his haversack. One day it would be a bit of bread, on the morrow a handful of grain, or some edible roots; now and then a slice of horse beef, and how delicious that seemed, grilled over our smoky, scanty fires! There was never enough to satisfy my hunger; but there was always a something, enough to keep body and soul together. Paul, as I afterward discovered, plundered his stores; for he well knew that alone gave me all at once, I should have nothing, and then I must have fasted for days, and perhaps have fallen from my horse for weakness. But think of the courage and affection of the poor fellow, himself half starved to carry food about him, day after day, and refrain from devouring the share scarcely set aside for me. There are not many even in the army, even of general's rank, capable of such devotion to the dearest friend they had, for extreme misery had induced a ferocious selfishness, which made us more like hyenas than Christians."

"I should think the cold must have been even worse to endure than hunger," said I, screwing up my chilly extremities, which the interest of the Doctor's conversation had almost made me forget.

"It was, sir, harder and more fatal; at least a great number died of it; although, to say the truth, frost and famine worked there hand to hand, and with such unity of action, that it was often hard to say which was the cause of death. But it was a shocking sight of a morning to see the poor fellows lying dead around the bivouac fires. Unable to resist fatigue and the drowsy influence of the cold, they yielded to slumber and passed from sleep into death. For, there, sleep was death.

"But how then," I asked, "did any ever escape from Russia, for all must have slept at times?"

"I do not believe that any who escaped did sleep, at least not of a night, at the bivouac. We used to rouse each other continually to prevent our giving way, and then get up and walk as briskly as we could, to quicken the sluggish circulation. We slept upon the march, in our saddles, and, strange as it may seem to you, even those on foot slept while marching. They marched in groups or clusters, and those in the center slept, propped and supported by their companions, and moving their legs mechanically. I do not say that it was a sound, deep sleep, but rather a sort of feverish dozing. Such as it was, however, it was better than nothing, and assuredly saved some who would otherwise have sunk. Others, who would have given way to weariness upon the long monotonous march, were kept from utter despair and self-abandonment only, by the repeated harrassing attacks of the Cossacks. The excitement of the skirmish warmed their blood, and gave them, as it seemed, fresh hold upon life. In one of these skirmishes, or rather sharp combat, a dear friend of mine, a captain in the same regiment, had his left arm carried off by a cannon shot. After the affair was over, I came suddenly upon him, where he lay moaning by the road side, his face ashy pale, his arms still hanging by the sinews. His horse had either galloped away, or been taken by the fugitives."

"Ah, mon ami!" he cried, when he saw me, "all is over; I can go no further. I shall never see France again!"

"I saw that, like the majority of those who received severe wounds in that retreat, his moral courage was subdued, and had given way to despair. I was terribly shocked, for I felt how slight was his chance of escape. I urged hardily tell you there was very little dressing of wounds during that latter part of the retreat; most of the surgeons were dead, the hospital-wagons with the medicine and instruments had been left on the road; transport for the sick was out of the question. I assured him cheerful encouragement as I could. 'Why, Preville,' I cried, 'this will not do; we must get along somehow. Come! Courage, my friend! You shall see France again, in spite of all.'"

"'Ah, Doctor,' he replied, in piteous tones, 'it is no use. Here I shall die. All you can do for me is to blow my brains out, and save me from the Cossack lances.'"

"By this time I had dismounted and was at his side. The intense cold had stopped the bleeding of his wound. I saw that there was no lack of vitality in him, and that, but for this mishap, few would have got out of the campaign in better plight. Even now his despondency was perhaps his greatest danger. I reminded him of his wife and child (he had been married little more than a year, and news of the birth of a daughter had reached him on our forward march) of his happy home, his old mother—of all the ties, in short, that bound him to life. While speaking, I severed the sleeve that still retained his shattered arm, and bound it up as best I might. He still despaired and moaned, but suffered me to do as I would. He was like an infant in my hands; that man who, in the hour of battle, was a very lion for courage. But long suffering, and the sudden shock—occurring, too, when he seemed on the verge of safety—had overcome his fortitude. With Paul's help I got him upon my horse. The poor brute was in no case to carry double, so I walked and led it, although at that time I could hardly hobble."

"It is all useless, my dear Doctor,' Preville said, 'this is my last day; I feel that. Far better shoot me, or lay me by the road-side, than to risk your life for my sake.'

"I took no heed, but tried to cheer him. Those unclean beasts, the Cossacks, were hovering around us as usual, and at times the bullets fell pretty thick. Not a quarter of an hour had elapsed since I left Preville on my horse, when a shot struck his right eye; not entering the head, but glancing across the globe, and completely destroying the sight. Well, sir, then there occurred a physiological phenomenon which I have never been able satisfactorily to account for. This man, whom the loss of an arm had reduced to despair, seemed to derive fresh courage from the loss of an eye. At any rate, from that moment he complained no more of his fate, resumed his usual manly tone, and bore up like a hero. Paul was lucky enough to catch a riderless horse, which I mounted. The worst was over, and we soon got a respite. Without troubling you with details, and incredible though it may seem to you, my poor friend escaped with life, although with a limb and an eye the less."

"There must have been many extraordinary escapes from that campaign," I remarked.

"Innumerable. There was a sergeant of dragoons, a former comrade of my servant's, who, for many days, marched beside me and Paul. He received a severe wound. There were some vehicles still with us at the time, and we got him a place in one of them, and made him as comfortable as we could. The following night we stopped at a town. In the morning, as we were about to march, the Cossacks came down. There was great confusion; several baggage-carts were captured in the street, and some of the wounded were abandoned in the houses where they had passed the night. Among these was Sergeant Frits. Not many good houses in the town were still in good condition; most of them had been burned and knocked to pieces by the soldiers. The house in which Fritz lay had still its doors and windows, and was one of the most comfortable in the place, on which account it had been converted into a temporary hospital. Well, the Russians came in, brought their wounded, and turned out our poor fellows to make room for them. Some, who could not move quickly enough, were brutally pitched through a low window into a garden behind the house, there to perish miserably.

Fritz was one of these. Only just being able to crawl, he made his way around the garden, seeking egress. He reached a gate communicating with another garden. It was locked, and pain and weakness forbade him climbing over. He sat close to the gate, propped against it, and looking wistfully through the bars at the windows of the house, and at the cheerful glow of a fire, when he was perceived by a young girl. She came out and opened the gate, and helped him into the house. Her father was a German clock-maker, long settled in Russia, and Fritz, a Swiss, spoke German well. The kind people put him to bed, hid his uniform, and tended him like a son. When, in the following spring his health was restored, and he would have left them, the German proposed to him to remain and assist him in his trade. He accepted the offer, married the German's daughter, and remained in Russia until his father-in-law's death, when he was taken with a longing to revisit his native mountains, and returned to Switzerland with his wife and family.

"I met him since in Paris, and he told me his story. But, although his escape was narrow, and romantic enough, there must have been others much more remarkable. Most of the prisoners made by the Russians, and who survived the severe cold and harsh treatment, were sent to Moscow, to labor at rebuilding the city. When the fine season came, some of them managed to escape, and to make their way in various disguises, and through countless adventures, back to their own country."

I have set down but the most striking portions of my conversation; or rather, the Doctor's narrative, since I did little but listen; and occasionally, by a question or remark, direct his communicativeness into the channel I wished. We are now near Orleans.

"The letter I was reading when we started," said my companion, "and which has brought back to my memory all that I have told you, at risk perhaps of worrying you," he added, with a slight bow and smile, "and a host of other circumstances, to me of thrilling and everlasting interest, is from Gen. Preville, who lives in the south of France, but has come unexpectedly to Orleans to pass a month with me. That is his way. He lives happily with a married daughter; but, now and then, the desire to see an old comrade, and to fight old battles over again, comes so strongly upon him that he has his valise packed at an hour's notice, and takes me by surprise. He knows well that 'The General's Room' and an affectionate reception always awaits him. I received his letter, full of references to old times, yesterday evening, and am now hurrying back to Orleans to see him. He may very likely be waiting for me at the station; and you will see, that for a man who gave himself up for dead forty years ago in the snows of Russia, and begged, as a favor, a bullet through his brain, he looks tolerably hearty and satisfied to live."

"There is one thing, Monsieur le Docteur," said, "which you have not yet explained to me, and which I do not understand. Did you mean literally what you said, that since the Russian campaign you have never had your feet warm?"

"Literally and truly, sir. When we got to Orcha, where Jomini was in command, and where the heroic Ney, who had been reparated from the army, rejoined us with the skeleton of his corps—having cut his way by sheer valor and soldiership, through clouds of Platoff's Cossacks—we took a day's rest. It was the 20th of November, the last day of any thing approaching to comfort which we were to enjoy before crossing the Russian frontier. True, we made one more halt at Molodetschina, whence Napoleon dated his bulletin of our terrible disasters, and then only a portion of us could find lodging; we were sick, half-frozen, and numbers died in the streets. At Orcha we found shelter and tranquility; the Governor had provided provisions against our passage, the enemy left us quiet, and we enjoyed a day of complete repose. My baggage had long since been lost, and my only pair of boots were torn to shreds. I had been riding with fragments of a soldier's jacket tied around my feet, which I usually kept out of the stirrups, the contact of the iron increasing the cold.

At Orcha, the invaluable Paul brought me a few (the Jews were our chief purveyors on that retreat) with boots for sale. I selected a pair, and I threw away my old ones, which for many days I had not taken off. My feet were already in a bad state, sore and livid. I bathed them, put on fresh stockings and my new boots, and contrived, with a pair of old trousers, a sort of leggings or overalls, closed at the bottom, and to be worn over the boots.

From that day till we got beyond the Niemen, a distance of one hundred and ten leagues, which we took three weeks to perform, I never took off any part of my dress. During that time I suffered greatly from my feet; they swelled till my boots were too tight for me, and at times I was in agony. When, at last, we were comparatively in safety, and I found myself, for the first time since I left Orcha, in a warm room, with a bed to lie upon, and water to wash, I called Paul to pull off my boots. Sir, with them came off my stockings, and the entire skin of both feet. A dyer's knife could hardly have done the thing more completely. For a moment I gave myself up as lost. I had seen enough of this kind of thing to know that my feet were on the verge of mortification. There was scarcely time to amputate, had any one been at hand to do it, and had I been willing to preserve life at such a price. Only one thing could save me, and I resolved to try it. I ordered Paul to bring me a bottle of brandy; I put a piece of silver between my teeth, and bade him pour the spirits over my feet. I can give you no idea of the excruciating torture I then endured. Whilst it lasted, assuredly no martyr's sufferings ever exceeded mine. It was agony—but it was safety. I bit the florin nearly in two, and broke this tooth. [Here the doctor drew up his lip and exhibited a detective tooth, in company with some very white and powerful grinders.] The martyrdom saved me; I recovered, but the new integumenle, which in time covered my scarred feet, seem chilled by the recollection of their predecessors' sufferings, and from that day to this I have never had feet otherwise than cold. But here we are, Orleans, sir, and yonder, as I expected, stands my old Preville."

The train stopped as he concluded, and a fine looking veteran, with white hair, an empty sleeve, and a silken patch over one eye, peered inquisitively into the carriages. Like most Englishmen, I have a particular aversion to the Continental fashion of men kissing and hugging each other, but I confess I beheld with interest and sympathy the cordial embrace of those two old comrades, who then quickly separated, and, with hands grasped, looked joyously and affectionately to each other's faces, whilst a thousand recollections of old kindness and long comradeship were evidently swelling at their hearts. In his joy, my travelling companion did not forget the attentive listener, whose journey he had so agreeably shortened. Turning to me, he presented me to the general as an Englishman and a new acquaintance, and then cordially invited me to pass the rest of the day at his house. But the business that took me to Orleans was urgent, and my return to Paris must be speedy. And had it been otherwise, I think I still should have scrupled to restrain, by a stranger's presence, the first flow of intimate communion to which the two friends evidently looked forward with such warm and pleasurable feelings. So I gratefully declined, but pledged myself to take advantage of the doctor's hospitality upon my next visit to Orleans. When that occurs, I shall hope to glean another Russian Reminiscence. FROM KEY WEST.—A correspondent of the Mobile Tribune furnishes the following:

The schr. G. C. Gibbs, Gibbs, of Derby, from Charleston S. C. with a cargo of 16,000 feet lumber, 100 sacks salt and 30 tierces rice bound to Attakapas, La., ran ashore on Key Sombrero, Florida, Florida Reef, the morning of the 26th inst. Capt. G. at once got out an anchor, and run-ning it into deep water, as the tide arose succeeded in getting his vessel off. He lost one anchor. The schooner pounded a good deal on the rocks. Capt. Roberts, of the Harallel, pilotted the Gibbs to this city where she safely arrived on the 27th. She will be taken out on the marine railway for repairs.

The bark Milton, of New York, Capt. Bradford, from Galveston, bound to Antwerp with 1,740 bales cotton and 479 hides, arrived on the 29th in distress. On the 26th, when near Sand Key at 10 o'clock, p. m., an attempt was made by a colored sailor named Abram Phillips to murder the Captain. Not succeeding in his design, he attacked the mate, N. T. Davis, who came up to the aid of Capt. Bradford, and succeeded in inflicting upon him two severe and dangerous wounds, both in the chest, one near the heart. The wounds were supposed to be mortal, and Capt. B., after placing the negro in irons and threatening the rest of the crew who were on the point of rescuing their fellow sailor, with death if they dared to interfere, turned his bark towards this port, and anchored her under the guns of the frigate Princeton. Dr. Barry of that ship went on board the Milton and dressed the wounds of Davis. He has been transferred to the Marine Hospital, and is recovering. The U. S. Marshal has taken charge of the sailor and placed him in the county jail for safe keeping. Judge Marvin, of the Marine Court, has ordered his trial for attempt to murder on the high seas, to be held at the Admiralty Rooms on the 12th of February.

MARINE DISASTERS.—The Liverpool (Nova Scotia) Transcript, of the 25th ult., states that the schooner Rambler, of Halifax, Patrick Gray, master from Fortune Bay, N. F., for Boston, with herrings, etc., in bulk, put in for a harbor 17th inst., and anchored below Fort Point. Her timber, cargo and materials were seen next morning strewed along the beach a short distance from the wreck of the ship Queen of the Seas. Every person on board perished. Next day the bodies of six of the crew were found, and buried with all proper ceremonies.

The British brig Ann, from Boston, for St. Johns, N. F., is reported by a Shagreph to have been totally lost 15th ult., at Garbarous on the east coast of Cape Breton. Capt. Murray and all on board are stated to have perished.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—On Saturday afternoon, as we learn from Mr. Nathan Carter, the up train on the Boston and Maine Railroad, which left Haverville at quarter before 2 o'clock, on passing Ward Hill crossing in Bradford, ran into a wagon, in which Mr. Moses Johnson was riding, by which he was fatally injured, and died in a short time after. The horse was killed, and the wagon smashed to pieces. Mr. Johnson was about sixty years of age—he lately been residing on a farm in Bradford, but on former years was known as an active business man.—[Newburyport Herald.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

BY THE STEAMER EMPIRE CITY

Grant Excitement at Havana.

At the time the steamer sailed the inhabitants of Havana were in a state of much excitement, in consequence of reports of revolt and forced polities of the island, and the alarming intelligence officially communicated through the colonies of the disaffected. A formidable expedition was arming in this country and about to sail from different ports for the purpose of attacking the island. A great number of suspected individuals, chiefly of respectability and high standing, had been arrested, and the Captain General had issued proclamations, announcing that the severest measures will be adopted to prevent invasion from abroad and insurrection at home. He threatens any expedition that may effect a landing upon the shores of Cuba with immediate extermination, and holds up the terrors of the law to those of his own people who may be inclined to break the peace. The following is the official account of the expedition, published by order of Gen. Concha:

The advices received yesterday by the steamer from New Orleans of the 5th inst., in regard to the projected expedition against this island, are as follows:

The expedition is to be composed of from two thousand three hundred to two thousand six hundred men. The place of embarkation and the proportion of men from each colonel Ruloson, Texas, from six to seven hundred men in the steamship Pampero, and enough the same number on the Daniel Webster, at the Pass-a-Loutre, and the rest from New York on the Massachusetts, of which we shall speak further on, and a steamship which we cannot name.

In order to secure their departure from these ports without the interference with the Federal Government the rumor has been circulated that the destination of the expedition is Puerto Rico and it is the general opinion that the revolutions in the country will not also be one of the principal objects, what, in some measure of disagreements with the [illegible] completely separated himself from them.

The first [illegible] to New York has been the seizure of the steamship Massachusetts, on board of which have been found arms and ammunitions of war to a considerable amount, and perfectly concealed. On this point we shall receive further details by the steamship which ought to arrive to-day, but on the departure of the last steamer from New Orleans the Commercial State Gazette had received there, relating to the affair as one which had been consummated, that is, the seizure.

The Pampero, that was running between Pensacola Key West and New Orleans, left Key West on the last of January, not to return to New Orleans, but for some other unknown point, without doubt, in connection with the expedition.

"The force is to be commanded by Colonel Kinney as commander-in-chief, who was lately in Washington, but the true objects and directors are the same that managed the Lopez affair; that is Quitman and Slaughter, who reside with the directing commission of the entire enterprise, at Natchez, some eighty or one hundred leagues from New Orleans.

"Men are being continually recruited at all points in the United States, seven hundred miles of land being collected to each soldier, and in proportion to the officers.

"At the latest no men but it was confidently asserted in New Orleans in consequence of information that had been received, that the President of the United States would issue a proclamation against the expedition, as its military character had become manifest."

The following British vessel-of-war were in port when the Empire City sailed:

Rifle-steamer Esperanza, Commander Hancock; the 70-gun ship-of-the-line Hogue, Captain William H. Granville, Commander, with Rear Admiral Sir Arthur Fanshawe, K. B., in command of the North American and West India squadron, and 650 men; also, the screw propeller, ten horse power, Cossack, of 800 tons, and 150 complement, Commander R. S. Dobbie, com. Esq.

On the morning of the 8th inst. a negro man out of his master's premises, near the Plaza del Vapor, having chains on his legs for punishment, with an old razor in his hand, with which he killed three persons and wounded seriously more than twenty others.

SOUTH AMERICAN NEWS.

From Peru.

The Southern mail arrived at Panama on the 20th ult. by the steamship Santiago, bringing news of the final overthrow of the Government party in Peru, and the entrance of Castilla, the conqueror, into Lima. The Callao News, of the 7th, gives an account of the battle which brought about this result, and states that Generals Cel. Cavranza and several other officers of the Government forces were killed. Col. Montes, Col. Buenos, Major Granlas, and six other of the revolutionary officers were also reported among the slain. The News says:

President Echenique, with a small cavalry escort, succeeded in reaching Lima, and placed himself under the protection of Mr. Sullivan, the English Minister, where he still remains. Gen. Vivanco escaped to this city, and embarked on board the American steam frigate.

The Liberating army entered Lima about 10 o'clock, and as they defiled through the streets and entered the Plaza, an immense throng accompanied them and the most enthusiastic cheers rent the air. At 2 o'clock Gen. Castilla (el Libertador) arrived at the gates, and amid the roar of artillery, the clanging of a thousand bells, the discharges of fire-arms and general uproar, and the deafening shouts of the multitude, he entered triumphantly the "City of the Kings," from which he had so long been exiled. The people flocked around him and embraced him, and his path was literally strewn with flowers. After much difficulty he succeeded in reaching his own house.

Immediately after taking possession of Lima, the revolutionists marched upon Callao. The Castle of Callao, which had been heavily fortified, surrendered without firing a gun, and the troops then entered the city.

It is stated that a war brig at Arica, in the South of Peru, mutinied recently, killed the purser and another officer, distributed the vessel's armament among the people of the town, and with the latter, declared for Castilla. The mutineers afterwards shot their own leader. Castilla had decreed the abolition of slavery in Peru—and the planters were convoked to secure themselves against attacks from those thus let loose.

New Grenada.

The revolution in this country is probably at an end. Melo and Obando are prisoners, and although they have not yet been tried, it is said to be well known what disposition will be made of them. The former will be shot, and the latter banished. On the 25th in January, a portion of the prisoners (revolutionists, adherents of Melo,) taken by the Government, were sent from Carthagena for Panama, to serve as garrison at that place.

Bolivia.

Dates to December 27, inform us that Acha, (who, at the present accounts, was successfully pushing forward to La Paz) has been put down. The President has pardoned those engaged with Acha. He has also called an extraordinary session of Congress for the 1st of February; and has announced to the nation that one of the matters to be disposed of will be the acceptance of the resignation as President, and the provision of a successor.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH FROM BALAKLAVA TO VARNA.—The new steamer Black Sea left Sunderland, England, January 11, with four hundred miles of iron telegraph cable, which is to be laid down in the Black Sea, between Varna and Balaklava, and also a company of gapper men, who are to assist in placing the wires and apparatus in order. They were to be joined at Malta by British engineer officers. The expedition consisted of sixty persons, who took with them their own carts and horses, to be used when employed on shore; for the wires will be taken up to the headquarters of the generals, and portable telegraphic apparatus, neatly fitted into boxes of the size of an ordinary medicine chest, and about the weight each of a knapsack, will, when coiled ready for use, which can be joined on the main line, will be taken out, so that in whatever direction the army moves in the Crimea, the headquarters of the Allies can keep up a communication with Europe. It was expected that the telegraph would be open from the Crimea to Paris and London about the 11th of this month.

THE BIRD'S ISLAND GUANO DIFFICULTY.—It is stated that orders have been sent by the Government to Aspinwall, requiring the United States ship Falmouth to proceed at once to Bird's Island, with a view of settling the difficulties there. The Washington correspondent of the New York Post says:

"As is well known, Bird's Island is a little uninhabited rocky spot near the Dutch West Indies. About six months or a year ago a ship belonging to Philo C. Shelton, and other capitalists of Boston, touched on the deserted place, and while the captain and crew were loading her with guano, they were driven away with insult and damaged by a ship-of-war of Venezuela. Now, as no jurisdiction so far as can be ascertained, has been established over the island in question by any Government, it has been determined to vindicate the rights of our citizens in removing the guano from it by some decisive step, and to insist on reparation for the indignity to which the American flag was exposed while floating over the fragrant deposits which gave rise to the trouble."

MEMPHIS AND OHIO RAILROAD.—The Memphis Eagle and Enquirer says that the work on the first forty miles of this road is going on with great energy. About seven hundred hands are employed, and more than half of the first division (of thirty miles) is completed. Besides a large portion of the next ten miles, together with seven-six miles next to Brownsville. The bridging and trestle work over Wolf and Loose Hatchie rivers are nearly complete. In a few days an efficient corps of engineers will start out to make final location of the road from Trenton to Paris; and so soon as that is done, the work on that division will be let out.

TWO DEATHS BY FREEZING.—We learn from the Rock Island (Ill.) Republican, that during the tremendous storm of Sunday, the 21st ult., the wife and child of Mr. Thos. Butler, who resides near the railroad bridge at Rock River, were frozen to death. Mrs. Butler and her child were alone, and during the terrible storm and wind on Sunday, started to go across the prairie to an acquaintance who lived about a mile distant from her house, and both mother and child perished on the way. When found, the little child had its hands clenched full of snow, and frozen fast. It is said the woman became frightened or lonesome, and started for the house of an acquaintance, to stay until Mr. Butler returned.

TAMED MOOSE.—A couple of well-grown tamed moose were sold in Bangor, Me., on the 1st inst. One of them is a male, three years old; the other, a female, two years old. They were taken on the Aroostock when very young. The male has been trained to work in harness. The purchasers, it is said, intend sending these animals to England, where they will be a great curiosity, and probably command a high price.

The New York Commercial Advertiser states that two volumes of the Hon. Dr. Prime's Travels in Europe and the East will shortly be published by the Harpers.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ASIA.

Resignation of the British Ministry.

HALIFAX, Feb. 14.—The royal mail steamship Asia arrived at this port this morning en route for Boston. She sailed from Liverpool at 1 o'clock on the 31st inst., being one hour later than those by the Atlantic at New York.

The British Ministry had resigned in a body, and the Earl of Derby, who had been summoned by the Queen to form a new one, failed in the attempt. Great anxiety prevailed in England in regard to the Arctic expedition, and the Government were all spoken of in connection therewith. The Government had received dispatches from the Crimea, and the army was all well. Palmerston was the Premier elect.

There had been a meeting of Protectionists in the Crimea, and the war was pronounced the condition of the allied army.

Russia had gained a triumph over Austria in preventing the mobilization of the Germanic army, which was carried against Austria in the Italian war.

The Sardinian Government had negotiated a loan from England of a million pounds sterling for war purposes.

The Turkish army was to be immediately placed upon a war footing.

England had refused to permit a French army of 80,000 men intended to guard the Austrian frontier, to pass through her territory.

The Greek affair had been arranged.

Mind Le Soule was reported incendiary.

The German Army.

Prussia had refused a triumphant over Austria in opposition to the motion of the former in the German Diet to prevent the mobilization of the German army having been carried in spite of the efforts of Austria to the contrary.

Liverpool Market.

Brown, Shipley & Co. quote a decline of nearly ; penny per pound in cotton; also quote Mobile Middling at 5 pence per pound. The sales of Friday were 6000 bales, the market closing dull. The stock in Liverpool, exclusive of shipboard, was but 426,000 bales, of which only about 19,000 bales were American.

The market for wheat was quite dull, and prices were weaker, though not quotably lower.

Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co. quote flour dull and a trifle lower.

The rice market was firm at 2¾ @ 3 for Carolina.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14.—The Senate to-day discussed the Indian Appropriation bill.

The House appropriated $125,000 for the erection of defences at the terminus of the Mexican Gulf Railroad.

The resolution to fulfil the 5th article treaty with Spain, giving a million, was tabled by a large majority.

New York Market.

TWO WEEKS LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

ARRIVAL OF STEAMER PROMETHEUS

News from Oregon, Sandwich Islands, China, etc.

The steamship Prometheus, Captain H. Churchill, arrived yesterday from San Juan, bringing San Francisco papers to the 26th ult., two weeks later than previous dates. The Prometheus experienced a heavy gale on her passage from this port to San Juan, which caused her to lay to ten hours. Her passage to and from San Juan was performed from a visit to the interior, and report the country in a state of great confusion.

We glean from the San Francisco papers the following items of general intelligence:

The Alta Californian, of the 24th, states that on the previous Monday a man named Wm. Whitman, recently from Baton Rouge, La., was drowned while crossing the bay in a small boat. He was observed by some sailors to suddenly throw down his oars, stand upon his feet and plunge overboard. He had been married but about eighteen days, was of industrious and regular habits, and it was not known at the time what induced the act.

Mr. Tober, who killed Joseph Mansfield, editor of the Sacramento Republican, has been sentenced to be hung on the 16th of March next.

Mr. Thomas Mowry, an old resident of San Francisco died on the 23d from the effects of a pistol shot wound received from one John Blake. The difficulty between them arose in regard to money matters.

On the night of the 18th ult., Mr. Joseph Heelere, acting Treasurer of Tuolumne county was murdered in his office by an Englishman named Griffith, who then robbed the safe of $18,000. He was captured that night, confessed his crime and was executed before daylight by process of Lynch law.

The San Francisco Evening Journal of the 24th, publishes the following:

The steamer Humboldt, which arrived this morning, brings the following news:

Reports came to Union on the 15th inst., that five white men were murdered by the Klamath Indians, near Orleans Bar, on the 13th inst. Col. Buchanan immediately sent a detachment of 25 U. S. troops, under the command of Lt. W. Judah, to the spot, and also a party of volunteers from Union. Considerable difficulty is apprehended, as the Indians have sent all the squaws and children into the mountains. The names of two of the men who were killed were Wheeler and O'Neil, who were both brothers.

The Humboldt Times states that a general outbreak among the Indians had been for some time expected, and that large numbers of the miners had deserted their claims on the Klamath and Salmon Rivers, and congregated at different points to prepare for the anticipated attack. It had been determined by the whites to take all fire-arms and ammunition from the Indians in that section, and at some points this had been done, but at others the Indians resisted, sent their women and children to the mountains, shot cattle and committed other outrages.

The Sacramento Union says:

The situation of the Indians in the northernmost counties of this State is truly deplorable. Not only do they stand in need of the ordinary necessaries of life, but they are on the very verge of starvation. The proceedings of a meeting held recently at Pittsburgh, Shasta county, will show the condition of their pitiable condition. The Secretary of the meeting states that the Rev. Rivel McCloud and other leaders of the Society are besieging the citizens, begging for food, and compelling the whites either to support them or witness cases of actual starvation.

A fire had taken place at Yreka, which destroyed several buildings, involving a loss of about $12,000.

A man named Lang, formerly of Ohio, was frozen to death recently in Placer county.

The Times and Transcript, of the 24th ult., contains the following mining intelligence:

Where the miners can obtain the water to wash their dirt, there appears to be little difference in the yield of the previous week. For our own part, we have never seen the gold since 1849, but that we have found plenty of dust, and many people who were impressed with the conviction that the mines were exhausted. This kind of people were extremely plenty in the fall of 1850. Any one who has traveled over this country, and takes pains to inform himself in the matter, would be of a different opinion. We have adopted a few items from the country papers giving accounts of the proceeds of the different diggings.

The miners in the neighborhood of Wyandot are, for the most part, prosecuting their claims. Many places are found to be rich, one panful of earth yielding $2 40 in grains of gold, weighing thirty-two and a half ounces, was taken out of the claim of Hiram L. Barton, a short time since.

In the region of Georgetown, the hill or coyote diggings are considered the best. At Jones' Hill, several men have struck the paying.

In the Tuolumne column the paying lead averages about, five feet in depth—in the shaft, two feet. The company have worked only about fifteen feet in this pay dirt, and from that the yield is constantly increasing, as they proceed into their claim. The pay dirt thus far will average one hundred dollars to the foot. Within the drift, they took out of a single crevice in the rock eighty pounds of pure gold.

The drift in the Union Tunnel paid all expenses from the beginning. In the commencement of the tunnel, and in the face of the hill, the pay dirt was about twenty-one feet in depth from the bed-rock. The main pay lead will average from eighteen inches to three feet in thickness, and will probably average half an ounce of gold per day to the hand. These claims are very extensive, and will require years of labor before they are worked out. In the bottom of the shaft on the top of the hill, the company have sunk $40,000 in the circumference of about six feet.

The Spring Hollow Company have drifted into the pay dirt about fifteen feet, although they are not yet into the main channel. The gravel already taken from twelve and a half to fifty cents to the pan.

The Summit Company's tunnel is six feet high and four feet wide. They have drifted in near one hundred feet in length and eighty feet in breadth. The pay dirt is from four to four feet deep, and has prospected $35 to the pan. This company has sunk a shaft since commencing it, but eighty feet from the tunnel, and has struck the pay dirt.

In addition to the miners still and rich diggings, there are a number of tunnels being worked here, which pay handsomely. A small pile of dirt laying in front of one of them, led us to find that the proprietors would not take $1000 for it, for yet it looks as if there were not a dozen cents to be in it. This is by no means an unusually rich claim.

In the claims of Dr. Bibard, situated near Woman's Hill, between Old Woman's and Rich Gulches, a distance of about one hundred and fifty feet from the [illegible] and about one hundred cubic yards of dirt per day.

Two men named Churchmen and Davidge, in a bar-room in Sacramento City, was struck in the face with a pistol shot aimed by Davidge at Churchman by the latter thought dangerous, and Davidge was fined in the sum of paying a fine of $250.

Mr. George Hain, the sheriff of San Jose, had been missing for two weeks and his wife and friends were greatly alarmed for his safety.

From Lower California.

By the steamer Arabia, dates had been received from Los Angeles to the 18th ult. A great excitement had been created at that place in consequence of the population being determined to hang Brown, who had been convicted of the murder of Pinckney Clifford, and whose sentence to be hung by the order from Judge Murray, of the 6th of December, was confirmed by the Supreme Court shortly after the meeting of the Legislature. The Star reports that immediately after the dismissal of the Supreme Court, a petition was circulated for the pardon of Brown, which was numerously signed, and presented to the Governor, who refused to grant the pardon. The prisoner was then removed from the jail and hung in the presence of a large concourse of people.

The Star also says that the Governor has issued a proclamation, calling upon the militia of the State to come forward.

ITINERANT'S FIRST ROUND.

Mr. Editor—In the providence of God, I have this year been sent to a circuit which I have not traveled before, and I propose giving you a few items in reference to my first round.

First Appointment.—Day a little chilly and damp, but few out; preached the best I could; held class, and did not forget the colored people; closed and went home with the class leader. He had many complaints to utter. The preachers did not hold class meeting last year, and they did not visit the people, and they were not spiritual preachers; and closed by intimating that I had commenced right, and that I was the man; but he was fearful that their quarterage collections would be small, as a great many of their paying members had moved away, &c.

I learned that this complaining class leader has never held a class meeting since his appointment, and I fear he will have as many complaints against me at the end of the year as he did against my predecessor.

Second Appointment.—On my arrival, everything about the church-house was as silent as the grave. I went in and took a survey of the place. No shutters to the doors; seats tumbled topsy-turvy; backs broken off; floor very dirty; showed evidences of having been a sheep-stall. Some good sisters came in, after awhile, and set things to right, as best they could; and I preached to the few, and attended to the other duties of an itinerant, and closed.

Third Appointment.—Found everything neat; door-shutters and floor clean; well arranged seats; clean pulpit. They have held class meetings at this place ever since the preachers left for Conference. Heard no complaints against any one. I felt the prayers of the people while I preached, and I have no doubt but that I preached a better sermon at this place than at any of my previous appointments.

Fourth Appointment.—Cold wind and a right sun to-day. Found a goodly number standing, sitting and lounging about on the sunny side of the house, waiting for the appearance of the new preacher. After a genteel introduction, the following dialogue took place:

First Speaker—(a brother with a gold-headed cane, a fine cloth coat, who came to church in a $1,000 carriage, drawn by a span of beautiful match horses.)—"Brother, I wish you to stop my New Orleans Advocate; don't print it so fine that I cannot see to read it—my eyes are getting weak anyhow (giving them a rub.) I think I will take the Crescent, the print is so much better." And, to make it to myself, the $1 50 is so much smaller!

A sister, who sat near, took up the thread of the discourse: "Yes, I think you all had better stop your papers, and try and save your money to pay the preacher. They say cotton is all fell down, and ye can't git nothin for it, and the river aint riz yet; and Mr. S——, who lives on Curry Creek, everybody says is a mity knowin man, and says the river aint gwine to to riz this year. My old man gin a dollar last year, and the saye times are so hard this year he don't 'spect he can gin anything."

Itinerant.—"Well, sister, I hope old Mr. S—— is a false prophet, and that we shall have a river to take our produce to market yet; and as to the brethren stopping their papers, I much prefer they would not, as I have ascertained that those brethren who take the papers are always the most liberal."

Loan Sister—(sharply.)—"Well, my old man never tuck n payer in his life, 'cepting Brother Jonathan, and that only cost twenty-five cents a year, and I reckon he is good as some of the rest, that lives in fine houses," giving a leer at the brother of the bald-headed cane.

Finding the conversation assuming an unpleasant turn, we repaired into the interior of the building, and attended to the regular services. In the first part of our discourse we dwelt on Christian duties—rich man and sister looking very bland. And then on the joys of Heaven—rich man's eyes full of tears. Finally, upon the privilegee of classes; and when enlarging upon the social promises and privileges of the poor, a sister made the walls ring with her shouts.

Fifth Appointment.—Heard the class steward ask a brother for some quarterage, stating the preacher was poor, and no doubt would need money to buy his provisions. The brother's eyes began to enlarge, and he looked somewhat astonished. "What! don't the Discipline allow him three hundred dollars? and that's more than I can make. But has he done with that? I don't believe in making men rich because they preach a little. No, sir! you don't get my money that away."

The steward tried to explain that though the Discipline did say that married preachers should be allowed three hundred dollars, yet at the same time the Discipline did not pay it, but the members and friends of the church; and, as he was a member, it would be but just for him to pay a portion, according to his ability. But the brother could not be convinced that it was his duty to pay a preacher when he only preached ten or twelve times a month, and as I walked off I still heard him talking about "hard times—poor—other people might work," &c.

I am at home now, and whilst I am penning these lines the good wife is industriously engaged with her household duties, and by economy and cheerfulness is endeavoring to make home comfortable and happy. I am day by day looking into the law of the Lord, and preparing myself to bring forth things new and old to my people on my next round: and I doubt not that God will open their hearts, and I shall do them good, and be fed and clothed; and at the end of the Conference year I hope to number many on our class books that are now in nature's darkness. And I hope, Mr. Editor, that you will number many names from this circuit on your subscription list which have not been there before. So mote it be. Amen.

Itinerant.

SHE WINDS.

I have heard that full wind behind the ship drives her not so fast forward as a side wind, that seems almost as much against her as with her; and the reason, they say, is, because a full wind fills but some of her sails, which keep it from the rest, so that they are empty, when a side wind fills all her sails, and sets her speedily forward. Whichever way we go in this world, our affections are our sails, and, according as they are spread and filled, so pass on swifter or slower whither we are steering. Now, if the Lord should give us a full wind and continued gales of mercy, it would fill but some of our sails—some of our affections, joy, delight and the like. But when he comes with a side wind, a dispensation that seems almost as much against us as for us, then he fills our sails, takes up all our affections, making his works wide and broad enough to entertain them every one, then we are carried fully and freely towards the haven where we would be.

Chinese in California.—The importance of missionary labors among the Chinese of California must soon arrest the attention of American Christians generally. In his late message to the Legislature, Gov. Bigler said that when he last addressed the body with reference to the Asiatic immigration, there were but 20,000 Chinese in California, now there were 60,000. The fact that they generally come without families, and with the design of returning, only enhances the importance of their receiving the gospel, that they may bear its blessings to their countrymen at home.

A Suggestive Remark.—At the North Carolina Conference, in speaking of the importance of circulating the periodicals of the Church among the members, Bishop Pierce said, in substance: "There were many Christians so ignorant of the religious condition of the world, that if they were to go to Heaven, and the blessed Redeemer were to ask them what the Church was doing for the conversion of the world, would not be able to answer him a word." Is not this true? Ought it so to be?—N. C. Adv.

Revivals.—The Watchman and Observer informs us that President Hitchcock, of Amherst College, states, in his valedictory address, that about one-half of all the graduates of this institution had entered the ministry or become missionaries. There had been ten marked revivals of religion during the life of the college, occurring with singular uniformity, about once in three years, thus extending their hallowed influences to every class.

Forbidden care not only doth no good, but it is sure to do us a great deal of harm. I may suffer in my own foreboding imagination many things that really I shall never suffer at all, for the events may never happen the forethoughts whereof do now afflict me. And what a foolish thing is it to be troubled beforehand at that which, for aught I know, will never be, and to make a certain evil of an uncertain! Matt. vi. 34.—John Howe.

Roman Catholics.—The Roman Catholic Church difficulties in the United States are getting frequent. In Chicago, four of the clergy at the Roman Catholic College have been removed. The congregation of the Church of the Holy Name, in that city, have held a meeting and protested against the removal of their clergyman, in whom they express the highest confidence. They have appointed a committee to appeal to Rome on the subject.

A Very Old Sermon.—Rev. Dr. Cooke, of Lynn, gave his people as an afternoon discourse, on Sunday, January 21, a sermon which was preached on the same day of the month in 1655, (just 200 years before,) before the same society, by Rev. Thomas Cobbett, who was then its pastor. The Lynn News says: "It is supposed that but few recognized the sermon from having heard it when it was first delivered."

TO THE METHODISTS OF EAST ALABAMA.

Dear Brethren—At the recent session of the Alabama Conference I was appointed agent of the Tuskegee Female College. The appointment was not ordered by the Conference without a due consideration of the interests involved. In their wisdom, the brethren considered the enterprise of sufficient importance to demand the active and constant services of one person. The correctness of their judgment will be admitted by all who properly consider the great subject of education as connected with the prosperity and advancement of our Church. It is evident that the opinions which are formed in the school room will follow and influence us in after-life, affecting, to a great extent, our happiness and usefulness. If they are erroneous, an unhappy and disastrous future will likely be the result, since it is very difficult to control and direct, much less eradicate early prejudices. Indeed, when we consider that the sentiments which are formed in youth will be developed in after-life either to the advantage or injury of society, the importance of keeping the heart and mind during that period constantly under proper influences, becomes apparent.

Our brethren in other sections of the country have acted on the suggestions of this great truth, and erected in their midst schools and colleges, from which annually go forth multitudes of pious, educated youth, of both sexes, to bless society with their godly walk, and to defend the doctrines and perpetuate the usages and prosperity of our beloved Church, which, of course, rejoices the heart of every true Methodist. These schools may with propriety be termed the nurseries of our Church; and the good they have done is so great and so apparent, that the propriety of establishing them in sufficient numbers to meet the educational wants of all our people is not now questioned. The problem of the propriety and benefits of denominational education is solved, for by all Christians it is now conceded that religious training ought to accompany mental culture; and every denomination rightly looks to its welfare endeavors, when it is possible, to direct the education of its children. The Methodist Church ought certainly to be active and determined in this particular, and this means of establishing and perpetuating our blessed faith ought to be assiduously and constantly used. The thousands—I might truly say the millions—whom God has committed to her keeping and training ought to be kept within her own bosom, and not coldly pushed off to others. This is the desire of our people, if I understand their sentiments: for we all feel that the hope of the Church, in a great measure, rests on its children. To accomplish this, however, we must not only be determined, but united. There must be harmony of feeling and concert of action. Individual preferences must yield to the general good. A divided house will fall, and differences and dissentions among ourselves will effectually defeat all our good purposes and determinations. But with harmony, liberality and a good measure of the zeal which characterizes us in some other things, we can, in a great degree, control not only the training of our own children, but the educational interests of the land; and with this lever we can move the world. Who among us would object to this? Does any one of our faith think it would be disadvantageous to the rising generation, or to the religious hopes and prospects of the earth? If so, why are you a Methodist? Every neighborhood should have its school, and we should, when it is possible, control it; but every one cannot be a high school or college. The patronage and funds are too limited for this.

There must, then, be certain points selected for the location of seminaries of a high grade, where all the facilities and advantages for acquiring a thorough and liberal education will be afforded to the sons and daughters of our Church. This matter ought to be well considered, and no point should be selected for such a school where, from the nature of the location, a failure or even partial success would likely be the result. The site should be an eligible one. In the term "eligible" are embraced accessibility, health, local patronage, morals and intelligence, local denominational sympathy and influence, and also centrality, where it can be had. When such a place is obtained, and the directing powers of the Church locate a college there, the united support and cordial sympathy of those of our brethren who, from their place of residence and circumstances are expected to be its patrons, will be required to prevent a disastrous and humiliating failure.

That Tuskegee combines, in an eminent degree, the qualifications enumerated above, no one who is fully acquainted with it will doubt. Its climate is salubrious, and in intelligence and moral worth its citizens will compare favorably with those of any community. Methodism, too, has a strong hold on the affections and sympathies of the people, so that any enterprise under its control would be cordially and liberally supported. In addition to this, the wants of the Church in this section of the State absolutely require a female college of the highest grade. Many young ladies from Methodist families in our midst now seek in other States and from other sects the instruction which they should find at home among their own people. Our brethren here see and feel this, and to prevent an excuse for its occurrence in future have commenced an enterprise on a large scale, which, when carried out according to design, will furnish, as many educational advantages and facilities for girls as can be found anywhere. We have commenced the erection of a very commodious building, which will combine, in an admirable degree, elegance of structure and convenience of [illegible] The plan was given us by one of the most celebrated architects in the United States, and it is conceded by excellent critics (judging from the model) that in beauty and adaptation to the purposes for which it is to be built it will perhaps be unsurpassed by any in the country. The estimated cost is between twenty-five and thirty thousand dollars. Five thousand more will be needed to purchase apparatus and furniture. Of this amount some twenty thousand dollars, in perfectly reliable notes and subscriptions, have been obtained. The remainder, say twelve thousand, is to be raised this year, or the work will be left incomplete, for it is the unalterable determination of the trustees to cease operations when the funds are expended. We are convinced that the worst hindrance an institution can have is a heavy debt. Many which apparently commenced prosperously have been wrecked on this shoal. It is possible some may object to the cost of the building, considering it extravagant. A glance at the situation of the college, and at what will probably be its patronage, will, we think, dissipate that objection. The wants of the school will evidently demand a commodious, and consequently, costly building. Its beauty and convenience will cost us nothing, as the same money will erect a tasteful structure that it takes to build a clumsy, disproportioned one of the same size. The discerning man will at once see the propriety and great advantage of this: for in education everything should be brought to bear on the unfolding intellect which purifies and elevates. The taste and finer feelings of the heart should be cultivated and expanded, by keeping constantly before the mind the beautiful and good. All must admit that the contemplation of the beautiful, whether seen in nature, art or morals, has a refining effect on the soul and mind. Now that which refines, purifies; and that which purifies, elevates and ennobles; and that which ennobles brings us nearer to God, and to all that is glorious and enduring. How unwise is it, then, to give our college edifices a dull, inelegant, prison-like appearance, the very sight of which fills the soul with dread, when, for the same, or even a greater cost, a thing of beauty might be presented to direct and elevate the thoughts and affections to God. Will any parent trouble for his child, whose mind is in constant communion with the pure and beautiful?

I have been thus explicit in regard to our enterprise to show that we intend having here a Female College; one that will meet all the educational wants of our people in Alabama, and one that our Conference, to which care and patronage it has been committed, will delight to own and foster. The whole will be on an elevated scale, suited to the demand of the times. The faculty will consist of the ablest teaching ability that can be obtained.

Well, brethren, the twelve thousand dollars alluded to above must be contributed by you before the enterprise will be completely successful. But, says one, "we have too many female colleges already; why not unite on those now in operation?" Where are they, brother? How many can you show me in all this section of the Conference, where Methodism is so influential, which command the patronage of our people? How many do we, as a Church, actually control? But another says, "It is impossible to meet all the calls that are made in behalf of our Methodist schools." Indeed! Have we too many enterprises on hand for our means? Demonstrate this by pointing them out in our midst. Furthermore, brother, do you not feel gratified at having assisted our educational enterprises by contributing of your means to their support? Doing good always makes us happy, even in this life. What will be its effects in the life to come, think you? But are there not some of our brethren who feel a little bad because they never have contributed a single dollar to old a Methodist school? Ponder this question till I see you.

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

In Tuscany, the Dominicans have protested against the edict of the Vatican, and their chief, it is said, has shared the fate of the Madiai, being committed to jail on the warrant of the Archbishop. Austria has forbidden the publication of the bull respecting the immaculate conception in Lombardy, and has even prohibited the priests from preaching upon it. A correspondent, of the London Tablet says: "I can vouch for the fact of the bells of one Protestant church in England having rung a merry peal on the promulgation of the glorious dogmatic decree."

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

This brief yet comprehensive prayer is the embodiment of Christianity, a compend of divinity. The spirit of the Lord's prayer is beautiful. that form of petition breathes a filial spirit—"Father."

A catholic spirit—"Our Father."

A reverential spirit—"Hallowed be thy name."

A missionary spirit—"Thy kingdom come."

An obedient spirit—"Thy will be done on earth."

A dependent spirit—"Give us this day our daily bread."

A forgiving spirit—"And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us."

A cautious spirit—"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

A confidential and adoring spirit—"For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen!"

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

WESLEYAN SOCIETY OF THE ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

1. At our Conferences there are always a number of young men who have nothing to do with the business of the Church. Their time is spent in social enjoyment, listening to the proceedings of the conference and too often in idleness. One of the secrets of our success is that Methodism is capable of organizations within organizations—"a wheel within a wheel," so that each member may form a cog somewhere, useful in its place. At the Conference of 1851, in Tuscaloosa, it was suggested we prolitinary members might form a society, which would enable us to spend our time more profitably than in curious looking over graceless conversation. There is no society among the preachers holding the place of class meetings among the laity, where notes of pilgrimage on the way to Heaven may be collected and mutual instruction imparted. It is to be deplored that we are so much disposed to look upon Conferences as grand carnivals, where unmanly wit is displayed, and the occasional inn of a unisonous year made efficient in peals of clerical laughter. The cheerfulness of the Church shows that those who hold their conversations in Heaven may be joyous on earth, but it should not contravene our mutual improvement in godliness. The framers of the Wesleyan Society felt the need of an association which would give a religious tone to our Conference thoughts and conversations, in which the recounted mercies of God and failings of ourselves would mutually humble and give confidence. From this felt desideratum resulted the religious element of our society. It rises not from observing the need of a milder religious organization among the members in full connection with the Conference, for they have their hands full; but from an humble desire to spend our own time more profitably and religiously. It is the duty of our President to institute a faithful examination into the religious experience of each member.

2. To be able to preach, presupposes an acquaintance with most of the studies recommended in our course, especially those of the first year. But even supposing an ignorance of these, a mind of ordinary intelligence and industry can prepare for the examinations in six months or less. It seems that the framers of this course, like a certain philosopher who would not presuppose his own existence, (cogito ergo sum,) were unwilling to presuppose anything but blank intelligence in the young preacher, and could not, therefore, presume upon his acquaintance with English grammar even. Again, there are late developments in the heretical world, a refutation of which the regular course does not embrace. But while infidelity has improved its mode of warfare, Christianity has strengthened her fortifications by late excavations in history and science. A society which would give direction to the voluntary studies of the preacher—I mean those not embraced in the regular course—and embrace within its system of culture the more recent refutations of old infidelity, as well as the concomitant replies to its late phases, and at the same time point the enterprising mind of our young ministry to the strengthened bulwarks of our holy religion, was certainly desirable. From this desire resulted the educational element of the Wesleyan Society. We have a course of study, recommended by older divines and submitted to the adoption of the society. A committee of examination is selected from our own body, whose duty it is to suggest for mutual discussion, rather than closely to investigate the attainments of each. To prove that the educational element of the Wesleyan Society supplies a desideratum in our Conference, I need only mention one fact. The pretensions claims of high church episcopacy, and its more recent boldness in persisting in declaring itself "The Church," in the face of historic truth and the charities of the Christian heart, more especially its surprising success in proselyting the half-informed and spiritually barren, demands the honest attention of every true Protestant. The watchmen of Zion, the signs of the times, point to ecclesiastical history as the field of a coming theological battle. Not the wisdom of our Church sticks to old Rutter, while later and more profound historians, who wrote with the enemy before them, the enemy whom we have to fight, are suffered to remain on the shelf. It is acknowledged by all that an increased attention to Church history is the demand of Methodism, and of all churches who wage war against hierarchy, in whatever form, Roman or Anglican. Our judicious committee for the selection of a course of study recommend on this subject Coleman's "Primitive Church." This is sufficient to show that our society will at least meet one great demand of the Church—increased attention to Church history.

A very slight misfortune amid the innumerable happy effects of our itinerant system, is the tendency of the ministry to eccentric manners. The foibles of our great men are more easily perceived than their greatness. In talking about them we are apt to select features odd and uncommon. We are all imitators; however unconsciously, yet imitators. The young man, in selecting a model, is apt to lay emphasis on its oddities. In the Wesleyan Society, everything odd and peculiar in dress and manners is censured. But the word "manners," in our constitution, embraces habits of study, devotional cultivation, &c., as well as attitude of social life.

The above is an account of the origin of the Wesleyan Society, and an exposition of the following article of the constitution:

"Art. 2.—The objects of this society are the advancement of its members in personal holiness, the improvement of their minds, and the refinement of their manners."

The Golden Coin; or, The Little Street Beggar.

A STORY OF CHRISTMAS-NEW YEAR'S OR GRAND CANAL.

The following story is a jewel. We ask for it a careful perusal from all our young friends.

It was the morning of a New Year, that had just setin, bright, golden and beautiful. The sun glistened like jeweled diadem in the cloudless sky. The chiming of the silvery sounds of bells struck joyfully upon the listening ear, at every street. The air was cold, though not piercing; bracing, though not biting; just cold enough, in truth, to deliver life and elasticity to every one that moved.

There was a little girl—a child of poverty, on that New Year's morning—walking the streets with the gay crowd that swept past her. Her little feet had grown so numb, encased only in thin shoes, and those badly worn, that she could but with difficulty move one before the other; her cheeks shook at every step she took, and her lips looked truly purple. Alas! poor Elsie Gray! She was a little beggar!

Just like the old year was the new year to her. Just like the last year's wants, and last year's sufferings, were the wants and sufferings of this! The change of the year brought no change in her condition with it. She was poor: her mother was a widow and an invalid, and the child was a poor beggar!

In the old and cheerless room gleamed no bright fires of anniversary. No evergreens, no wreaths, no flowers, save a few old withered ones, decked her time-stained walls. There was no sound of merry voices within the door, to say to the Widow Gray: "A Happy New Year to you Mrs Gray."

Heaven seemed to have walled her and her child out from the happiness that was all the world's on that festive day of the year. It had provided, to all appearance, no compensation for laughter, no gifts, no flowers for them. Why? Were they outcasts? Had they outraged their claims on the wide world's charity? Had they voluntarily strut themselves out from the sunlight of the living creatures around them? God! Shame take the world that it must be so answered for them! Mrs Gray was poor!

Little Elsie stopped at times, and breathed her hot breath upon her blue and benumbed fingers, and stamped her tiny feet in their movements with all the force left in them, and then big tears stood trembling in her large blue eyes for a moment, and rolled slowly down her purple cheeks, as if they would freeze to them. She had left her mother in bed, sick, exhausted and famishing! What wonder that she cried, even though those hot tears only dripped on the cold pavement. They might as well fall there as elsewhere; the many human hearts that passed her were full as icy and hardened.

She would have turned back to go home had she not thought again of her poor mother; and she went on, though where to go she knew not. She was to become a street beggar. Where should street beggars go? What streets are laid out, and named and numbered for them? Surely, if not home, then where should they go? It was this thought that brought those crystal tears, that startled those deep and irrepressible sobs that checked her hasty utterance.

A young boy—a bright looking little fellow—chanced to pass her as she walked, and wept, and sobbed. He caught the glitter of those tears in the sunshine, and the sight smote his angel-heart. He knew not what want and suffering were. He had never known them himself—never once heard of them—knew not even what a real beggar was. He stopped suddenly before Elsie, and asked her the cause of those tears. She could make no reply—her heart was too full.

"Has any one hurt you?" asked the feeling little fellow.

She shook her head negatively.

"Have you lost your way?" he persisted.

"No," answered the child quite audibly.

"What is the matter, then?" he asked.

"Mother is poor and sick, and I am cold and hungry. We have nothing to eat. Our room is quite cold, and there is no wood for us. Oh! you do not know all."

"But I will," replied the manly boy. "Where do you live?"

"Will you go with me?" asked Elsie, her face brightening.

"Yes, let me go with you," said he, "show me the way."

Through street, lane and alley, she guided him. They reached the door of the hovel. The cold breath of the wind whistled in the cracks and crevices and keyholes before them, as if inviting them in. They entered. A sick woman feebly raised her head from the pillow, and gave her a sweet smile. "Elsie, have you come?" she faintly said.

"Yes, mother," answered the child, "and I have brought this boy with me. I do not know who he is, but he said he wanted to come and see where we live. Did I do wrong to bring him, mother?"

"No, my child," said the mother, "if he knows how to pity you from his little heart; but he can not pity me yet; he is not old enough."

The bright-faced, sunny-hearted boy gazed in astonishment upon the mother and child. The scene was new to him. He wondered if this was what they called "poverty." His eyes looked sadly upon the wasting mother, but they glittered with wonder when turned towards Elsie. Suddenly they filled with tears. The want and woe, the heironess, the desolation, were all too much for him. He shuddered at the cold, uncovered floor. He gazed mournfully into the fireplace. His eyes wandered wonderingly over the naked walls, looking so unlovingly and cheerless. Putting his hand into his pocket, he grasped the coin that his mother had that very morning given him, and drew it forth. "You may have that," said he, holding it out to the child.

"Oh, you are too good! You are too generous, I fear!" as if she ought not to take it from him.

"Mother will give me another if I want," said he, "Take it—take it—you shall take it!" and he was instantly gone.

It was a gold coin of the value of five dollars! Mother and child wept together. Then they talked of the good boy whose heart had opened for them on this New Year's Day. Then they let their fancies run and grow wild and revel as they choose. They looked at the glistening piece. There was bread, and fuel, and clothing, and every comfort in its depths. They continued to gaze upon it. Now they saw within its rim pictures of delight and joy; visions of long rooms, all wreathed and decorated with visions of evergreens and flowers; visions of smiling faces and happy children; sights of merry voices, and the chiming music of bells; the accent of innocent tongues, and the laugh of gladsome hearts.

Ah! what a philosopher-stone was that coin! How it turned every thing first into gold and then into happiness! How it grouped around kind good cheerful friends, and filled their ears with kind voices! How it garlanded all doors of that day with evergreens and full-blown roses! How it spread them a laden table, and crowded it with merry guests! and those guests fed, all satisfied and happy! Oh, what bright rays shone forth from that trifling coin of gold! Could it have been so bright in the child's or man's dark pocket? No; else it had before then burst its way through, and lent its radiance to others. Could it have shone with such visions in the rich man's hands? No; else his avarice would have vanished at once, and his heart have flowed with generosity. No, no; it was only to the widow and her child that it were such a sheen, and emitted such brilliant rays, and revealed such sweet and welcome visions! Only for such as they.

That night returned this angel-boy to the bleak house filled with happiness, and lighted with joy; but he was not alone—his mother was with him. Blessed boy! He passed the whole of New Year's Day in making others happy.

And how much happier was he himself! How his little heart warmed and glowed to see the child uncover the basket he had brought with him, and take out, one by one, the gifts which were stowed there; and how overjoyed was he to see his mother offer the sick woman work and a new home, and to see the sick woman suddenly strong and almost well, under the influence of kind offices. He wondered if their happiness could possibly be as deep as his own—if their New Year was as bright to them as his was to him. He knew not how any one could be happier than he was at that moment.

Years have rolled away into the silent past. That little girl, Elsie Gray—is a lady. Not a lady only to name, but one in very deed, in heart and conduct. She dwells in a suburban village, and her husband is only devoted to her. The husband is no other than the generous boy, who, on the New Year's festival, accosted her tenderly in the street, and went home with her. Her poor mother sleeps quietly in the churchyard: for she lived to know that God had provided for her child. She died resigned and happy.

Are there coins, either of gold or silver, that must be locked away from sight at the beginning of the New Year.

Holland and the United States.—A letter from Rotterdam, in the Daily News, says:

"The attacks lately made by a portion of the American press upon Holland (a digest of which I sent you in a recent communication) have produced their effect in the minds of the people of this country. While readily admitting that the state of their marine would not enable them to make any physical resistance to America, should she unwisely take us as well as back, they also regard the unworthy threats made by her for such an unworthy cause as a species of juvenile swagger becoming only a juvenile State. We have as yet no Minister of Marine to take the portfolio abandoned by Vice-Admiral Eneliè; but the public are urging upon Government the necessity of immediately placing the fleet in a state of efficiency. An immense sum is yearly voted for the maintenance of a standing army far too numerous for a country that has so little need for an army. And the question is now being asked whether it would not be more politic to reduce the army at least to half its numerical strength, in order to increase the efficiency of the marine. "The million so spent," says one indignant writer, "would be well spent, while the same now voted is far too small to render the marine efficient; and thus it may be considered as thrown away and wasted money. Would we again see Holland prosperous, let us give to the army what we now vote to the marine, and to the marine what we now vote to the army."

A Singed Cat.—The New York and Erie Railroad office, in this city, was yesterday the scene of an incident which is worthy of being recorded with the ayenis of the day; not only because it was a good joke, but because it bears on its face a moral.

An old man enters the office, in age apparently verging on three score; his clothes are of coarse texture, ventilated in some places, and rather dingy withal; his head, with its long gray locks, is covered with a tarred-worn hat; his face, the lower part of which is ornamented with a grizzly-gray beard, has an humble appearance, and his dull eyes have an imploring expression; he hands folded paper to his head, and, advancing to the desk of the first clerk, he extends it.

Clerk: "Go away, sir; I haven't anything for you."

Old Man: (Brightening up with a look of surprise) "But, sir—"

Clerk: "No buts about it, sir; I tell you I have nothing for you. Go out."

The old man, with a mingled look of surprise and indignation, passes on to the desk of another clerk and offers the paper.

Clerk: "Don't interrupt me, sir; get out of the office; I give nothing to beggars."

The truth began to reveal itself to the old man's understanding; that last word has rekindled the fires of his youth; his face glows; and his eyes flash with indignation; he is about to retort sharply upon the man who called him a "beggar," when a third party interferes, and directs him to the Cashier, to whom the old man hands the papers. The Cashier unfolds them, and finds, instead of begging certificates, New York and Erie Railroad Income Bonds to the amount of $10,000! Cashier looks surprised; the old man demands his money; Clerk No. 1 takes a seat on the cross bar of his desk, out of sight; Clerk No. 2 turns red, purple and white by turns; the old man receives his money and makes a hobby exit, mumbling something about counter-jumpers and broad-cloth. Tipsy Ladies.—A ludicrous, but somewhat painful affair, took place a few evenings since, we understand, says the New York Day Book, in a select Female Academy up town, comprising somewhat the aristocracy of the establishment. Several of the female mothers had dropped in, and remained to take a dish of tea, and, being short of milk, an Irish girl was sent to a neighboring grocery to get some. The tea was handed round, and some surprise was felt that the milk did not color it, but nothing was said. The peculiar flavor, too, was remarked, but no one liked to speak; at length one lady ventured a hint, and the exclamations became general. The mistress of the academy colored very deeply, but, of course, could not account for it, and summoned the girl.

"Bridget," said the lady, "what was that you obtained at the grocery?"

"Shure, it was milk, ma'am," the girl replied.

"Milk!" exclaimed the lady, "why smell it," handing her the jug at the same time.

"It's gin, it is, or my nose deceives me," said the girl, "but shure it's milk I asked for, and don't I go there for the same kind of milk for you, ma'am?"

It is needless to say that the indignant parents quitted the house after a very formal leave-taking, and that several young ladies were hastily summoned home.

Satisfactory Explanation.—A few years ago a school-master was wanted for the village of Limekins, Scotland. A pompous little fellow, one of the applicants, being asked to give, in writing, a philosophical reason why cream was put amongst tea, replied; "Because the globular particles of the cream render the acute angle of the tea more obtuse."

Men and Brutes.—"Now, gentlemen," said a nobleman, to his guests as the ladies left the room, "let us understand each other; are we to drink like men or like brutes?" The guests, somewhat indignant, exclaimed: "Like men, of course." "Then," replied he, "we are going to get jolly drunk, for brutes never drink more than they want."

Government Receipts and Expenditures.—During the quarter ending the 31st of December, there was received into the United States Treasury the sum of $14,278,8 2, of which $10,317,304 was from customs, and $3,73 029 from sales of public lands. The expenditures for the same period amounted to $17,477,478, of which $5,288,102 was on account of redemption of the stock of various loans, premium on stock redeemed, interest on public debt, etc.; $3,473,940 for the navy, $2,411,536 for the army and fortifications, and $6,893,900 for civil, miscellaneous and foreign intercourse.

Vanderbilt's Line of Steamers.—The new steamships Magnolia and the Ariel have now nearly ready for sea. They were built under the direction of Mr. Simonson, for Mr. Vanderbilt, to run by the New York and Liverpool line, should he be successful in securing the mail contract with Congress. These steamers are superior specimens of American naval architecture, and cost between $500,000 and $600,000. The Ariel is 2,500 tons burthen, has three decks, and is braced throughout diagonally. Her main deck is fitted for three class passengers and the between decks for freight. [N. Y. Sun.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1855.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—To Hon. Wm. R. Smith, of Alabama, for a copy of his very able speech, delivered in Congress, 15th January, on the "American Party and its Mission."

This is a bold onslaught on political Popery, from a high quarter and by a strong arm. The champion of the Pope in the United States House of Representatives—Mr. Chandler, of Pennsylvania—is handled without gloves. Mr. Smith's speech presents a digest of information especially important at this time. He is the Colossus of Congress. It is one of the few Congress speeches we have read through and through, and has elicited our admiration.

STEAMERS TO HAVANA.—We are often inquired of concerning the departure of steamers, by our friends at a distance, who purpose a trip to California. We here insert the information, furnished us by the agents of respective lines. The present arrangement is: The mail line, touching at Havana and going by Aspinwall, leaves on the 5th and 20th of each month.

The Nicaragua line, going by the Isthmus, leaves on the 14th and 30th of each month.

Both of these lines have a direct connection with steamships on the Pacific side.

Passage—Isthmus transit included—for first cabin, $300; second, $250; steerage, $150.

The Pacific Conference.

Bishop Andrew sailed from this port, in the steamship Empire City, Tuesday, 20th, on his episcopal visitation to the Pacific Conference. Mrs. Andrew accompanies him. The Bishop's health, on leaving, was not in the best state; but we trust the soft breezes that blow in the Pacific will bring it up to that point. In same company were Rev. J. W. Ellis and family—formerly from Alabama, and Rev. T. W. Mock and family, formerly from North Carolina Conference. They go by Panama.

Bishop Andrew told us, emphatically, in relation to the fears of some, that he does not go out to California to wind up Southern Methodism there—not by any means. Notwithstanding hackings, the past has been the most prosperous year of our Church in that country.

Last week Rev. Mr. Johnson, of Missouri, sailed via Nicaragua. The Pacific Conference meets on 17th of April.

The School Interests.

Our friend Andrews reasons correctly, in his address to the Methodists of East Alabama, on the Tuskegee Female College.

The advertisement of the Mansfield (La.) Trustees ought to draw proposals. The specifications may be seen in our office.

A circular of the LaGrange Commissioners estimates the local patronage of the college at Florence at seventy students. A corresponding one from a distance would give a larger number of pupils than has been matriculated since 1836.

The commission to meet at Summerfield on the 4th of July, for locating a male college, as provided by the Alabama Conference, will have several to choose from. Auburn is in the field; also Marion and Greensboro. Others, doubtless, that we have not heard from.

LIVING EPISTLES.

Extract of a sermon by the Rev. John Berridge, a celebrated English minister of the last century—"Ye are our epistles."

"In this epistle there must be paper or parchment, and pen, ink, a writer, and somewhat to write. Now paper or parchment is the human heart, which people say is as clean as a sheet of paper; but if it be so, the sheet is as black within and wants it much as any other.

"The pen must be considered to the ministers of the gospel, and many of them are willing to acknowledge themselves very bad pens, scarcely fit to write with. They have been trying for many years to make good pens of the universities; but after all the knife which are used there, still God has to make them. Many pens want mending, and some are like an old one that has been used a long while, and is yet very good, but needs to be mended and made fit for use.

"Now the ink is the grace of Divine grace in the heart. Many pens you perceive the pen is unmended, and almost dry. Whenever any of you find us either at Tabernacle, St. Ann's or Tottenham Court Chapel, and are ready to say, 'Oh, what a poor creature this is! I could preach as well myself!' It may be true; but, instead of these sad complaints, lift up your hearts in prayer for the poor pen, and say, 'Lord, give him a little more ink!'

"He then observes that the writer of these epistles must be the Holy Spirit; and concludes with a short address to the people, to make large allowances for the infirmities of the pen, and to be somewhat acquainted with and pleased with the writer."

There Is No List of Successive Ordinations.

A pamphlet (pp. 152) is before us entitled:

"THE END OF THE APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION. A Debate between Geo. R. Ferger, and W. C. Smedes, Esqs., Editors of the Church Herald, Vicksburg, Miss., and Rev. R. Abbey."

The articles which Mr. Abbey has gathered into this pamphlet and given to the world in a wider than newspaper circulation, bear on the "Apostolic Succession." Those written by the editors, and such of Mr. Abbey's as they would admit, appeared in the columns of the Herald the year past. When excluded from their columns, he betook himself to other mediums, and so kept his side of the argument along, yet at a distance; for the editors feeling confident, and having control of their paper, had the most of the say to themselves. This was not exactly fair to their single-handed opponent, but did not spoil his plan, which is thus indicated in the preface:

"He (Abbey) very confidently believed, however, that if by possibility his opponents could be induced to keep to the question, they would, by the bare assistance of a suggestion or an explanation from himself occasionally, soon work a work of destruction upon themselves."

These editors are able lawyers, well read, and the acknowledged champions of High Churchism. A victory, under such circumstances, is clearly one over the cause, and not its advocate. Their admissions and logical inferences are fatal to the Prelatic pretension. The fact of a succession of episcopal ordinations, from the Apostolic day to this, is plainly, flatly, and in terms given up. They have no list: none exists.

Mr. Abbey's manner of conducting a controversy reminds us of the Calvinistic negro's definition of perseverance: "It means to lay hold, hold on and never let go." Candidly, if we were to find him on our track, we should do as the coon is represented in Crockett's Almanac, when he found Capt. Scott after him, rifle in hand: "Is that Cap'n Scott? Well, needn't shoot. I'll come down."

He is inexorable, if not unanswerable. It is in vain an opponent raises a dust, under cover of which to retreat. He sees through dust as an owl through the dark. He keeps him to the point, and will wear him out or worry him out.

More than once we wondered at his perseverance in sustaining this debate; and even how he could compromise with his feelings. The door rudely shut in his face, refused explanation when his veracity was questioned and taunted to reviling. More than once we saw a disposition in the editors to quit—to be done with the thing. But he stirred them up again, and every reply shortened their rope. Finally, having dealt with lawyers, he comes out with:

"We have—

"1. A judgment by confession, in open court.

"2. A judgment upon issue joined—argument and verdict.

"3. Judgment by default, after the engagement of counsel and the case being carefully and thoroughly examined."

Let it be borne in mind that Bishop Green and the editors of the Herald, with High Churchmen, hold that "there is an unbroken succession of ordinations from one ordained person to another, since the time of the Apostles," and that bishops alone ordained. Further, that their ordinations are in this succession. This is the vaunted "Apostolic Succession," with its mysteriously communicated grace, its tactual communion, &c., &c. Their boast is, that "a duly ordained minister, of this very day" (meaning, of course, one of theirs) can trace his commission up to the Apostles. Bishop Green's pedigree is in this wise: "He was ordained by Bishop Otey; Bishop Otey, by Bishop White; and Bishop White by John Moore, Archbishop of Canterbury." John Moore is put down as the ninety-sixth Archbishop of Canterbury, and the one hundred and eighteenth Bishop from St. John.

This list is imposing; looks fine; is much paraded. But does each one, beginning at the first, stand with his consecrating hands upon the head of his successor on the list? Not at all. There lies the vital point. And that is the point surrendered, specifically. No. 100 is a successor in office to No. 99. His name stands next. Did No. 99 ordain No. 100? Cannot say. It is not likely, though, inasmuch as a bishop was allowed to be in his grave before his successor in the diocese was appointed. The presumption, as the Herald editors grant, is to the contrary. Who, then, ordained No. 100? Where was he ordained? How? His name stands there in historical order; but even if that be correct, (and often it could hardly be otherwise than apocryphal,) are the qualifications of the incumbent adequate? He may have bought the place with money, or usurped it. There is the fatal gap. The virtue leaks out there.

Call it a chain, and these the links. The links do not join.

This Apostolic chain is the more specious and delusive, because, at this end, a few of the links are joined in to each other. Mr. Abbey's zeal and perseverance were put to it to keep them off the real issue. They were ready to go off on side issues, and debate the canonicity of quotations from Jerome and Origen. But he takes up the opposition point intently and boldly:

"I now propose to you, that if you will produce a list of names, which you say is entitled to some reasonable historic credit, and which purports to show an unbroken succession of ordinations from one ordained person to another, since the time of the Apostles, I will give up the Argument, knock under and retire."

Again:

"I asked for a list of Bishops who were ordained—not by their immediate predecessors in the same diocese—but by anybody. I asked, and still ask, for a consecutive list of Bishops who were ordained at all, so as to show a succession of ordinations. Produce such a list from any thing you will say is history, and I am done. I beg that this point may not be evaded. Do not offer me a list of Bishops who held office successively, in lieu of a list who were ordained successively."

The extorted answer is, that there is no list of successive ordinations!! Here is the confession of these champions of Apostolic succession—ipsissima verba.

"No one who has written on this subject has, to our knowledge, intimated that such a list as Mr. Abbey demands exists. . . . He knew, we knew, every one familiar with the subject knew, that no such list existed or could be produced."

Then the bottom drops out of the whole scheme. While these admissions stand, there is an end of controversy.

We thank Mr. Abbey for having pursued the controversy to the end, under difficulties and secured these distinct avowals. We congratulate him on his complete victory.

PROGRESS OF RELIGION IN THE UNITED STATES.

In 1830 there were 9,837 ministers of the gospel in the United States, with 1,199,069 church members; and the census showed a population of 12,866,920. This was one minister for every 1,307 of the population, and one church member for a little less than eleven.

In 1840 there were 15,937 ministers, with 2,065,375 church members, and the population was 17,062,576. This was one minister for every 1,107, and one church member for a little over eight.

For the next period of ten years from 1840 to 1850, while the increase of the population was something above 30 per cent., the ministry increased 91 per cent, and the membership increased 42 per cent.

So, then, it is not in numbers that the Church of the United States is retrograding. Though not doing what she should, she is more than holding her own.

In 1850 there were 25,718 ministers, with 2,931,188 church members, the population being 23,263,488. This was one minister for every 904 of the population, and one church member for a little over eight.

We deduce from these that for the term of ten years, from 1830 to 1840, while the increase of the population was but 33 per cent., the increase of ministers was 62 per cent., and the increase of members was 61 per cent.

It seems scarcely needful to furnish the figures to prove that in pecuniary contributions to benevolent purposes there is no going backward. Let it be but remembered that the present century has given birth to every missionary, bible, tract and Sabbath school society in our land; let it be seen from the annual reports of all the large societies that year after year their receipts are swelling; let it be firstly considered that their urgent calls are founded upon enlarged operations, and arise not from diminished resources, and it must be conceded that in giving to the claims of benevolence the present generation is behind no preceding one.

TO THE BISHOPS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

Reverend and Dear Brethren—In view of the various and important interests of the Church under our general superintendence, I regard an annual meeting of all the Bishops, for consultation and forming plans of united and harmonious action in these great interests, as of no ordinary importance. The Church, in my judgment, has suffered in consequence of the failure of such a meeting. It can hardly be expected that a system of ecclesiastical government like ours, where all the Bishops are invested with equal administrative authority, without diocesan limits, should be uniformly and efficiently administered in all the annual Conferences, embracing every department of the work under our general superintendency, without an annual meeting, as above proposed. Our grand missionary enterprise especially requires such a meeting. The funds collected for this noble work are annually appropriated to the support of the missions within the bounds of the several annual Conferences, and on foreign fields. How can such appropriations be judiciously made, unless the Bishops meet and agree upon the amount which may be drawn for each annual Conference, and for the foreign work? In consideration of these important and increasing interests of the Church, and the responsibility involved in the episcopal oversight of them, I advise and invite a meeting of all the Bishops, in the city of Nashville, on the third Monday of April next. The Missionary Board will meet on that day; and it is of more than ordinary importance that the Bishops should be with the Board for consultation at their first meeting under the provision of the late General Conference.

I regret that Bishop Andrew cannot be present at this meeting, as the Pacific Conferences, which he attends, meets on the 18th of April. After the present year, I think this defect may be remedied, by holding the Pacific Conference in September or first of October.

Under this arrangement, the Bishop who goes to California can leave immediately after the episcopal meeting in April, and have three or four months before the session of the Conference to visit all the important points within its bounds. And no Bishop who visits that distant and most interesting field should spend less time than this in his visit, either before or after Conference.

I have proposed April as the time of the meeting, as I think it should be at least three months before the commencement of the sessions of the annual Conferences.

In conclusion, reverend and dear brethren, permit me to say, that in consideration of the interests of the Church, the unity of the great body of ministers and people, the support, efficiency and extension of our various institutions, especially our missionary work, and of our duty, obligation and responsibility as general superintendents, I should be favorable to a disciplinary provision by the General Conference for such a meeting of the Bishops.

Yours, with much affection and esteem,

JOSHUA SOULE.

Nashville Advocate.

The Churches.

M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.—The Missionary Board at Louisville is about transferring its work to Nashville. These brethren, who have devoted themselves so faithfully to the Church's service these years past, deserve its thanks. The new Treasurer will doubtless be a good one, but a better one cannot be had than H. T. Cobb. Suitable resolutions on the death of Bishop Capers were passed at the last monthly meeting. It was

"Resolved, That this Board will hold their last official meeting on the first Monday in April, and that the next anniversary of this society shall be held in the city of Nashville, on the third Monday in April next."

We learn that Rev. L. Rosser, of Norfolk, Va., is writing the life of the late Rev. Thos. Crowder. It is proposed to have it published in two or three months.

The Memphis Advocate says:

"We intend, in a week or so, to go over our subscription list and relieve it of the burden of all names of such persons who have been wont to take it gratis, and never do anything for it as agents. To make our friends aid in sustaining a paper for the benefit of others, who neither work for it nor pay for it, seems to us downright injustice. Such as, in pursuance of this arrangement, find their papers discontinued, can have them sent again by remitting $2 for themselves, or $10 collected from new or old subscribers. We are compelled to this measure, as our list of non-paying and non-working subscribers is too great for the welfare of our paper."

M. E. CHURCH.—Zion's Herald gives an account of the Missionary Anniversary held at Troy, N. Y. The one before, we believe, was held in Cincinnati.

The annual services were commenced on Sunday, February 4, by missionary sermons in the several Methodist Episcopal Churches in the city and vicinity. The preachers were Bishops Janes, Baker, Ames, and Revs. Durbin, Lore, Butler, Phillips, Carlton, Reid, and others. Several of them preached also in the evening.

On Monday, the 5th, at 2 o'clock P. M., a missionary prayer meeting was held in the State street Church, under the direction of Bishop Ames.

The anniversary services proper were commenced in the evening, at North Second Street Church, Bishop Baker presiding. The Corresponding Secretary presented an abstract of the annual report, from which it appeared that they have, in all, 523 missions and 549 missionaries. The German missions in this country include 15 P. Elders' districts, 180 preachers, and 10,000 communicants; all secured in the brief space of seventeen years. The German members hold more church property, and contribute more for the spread of the gospel, than the average of American members.

Of the Swedes, Norwegians, &c., the centre is the city of New York, where that faithful laborer, Brother Hedstrom, is employed. For the Welsh in this country, but little is doing, and the same may be said of the French. Yet these have in Detroit a good Church edifice, where those of them who have renounced Romanism worship the true God. The Indian Missions are mostly within the Church South, but three missions in the State of New York are prosperous, and in the region of Lake Superior, 1,000 members.

The foreign missions are of recent origin; and so is our Church. It is but seventy years old last Christmas; and we had not the means, until very lately, to extend our work into foreign lands. The mission in Africa is the oldest and largest, including 4 districts, 23 circuit preachers, and 1,358 members. It embraces a coast extent of 400 miles, which includes 15,000 colonists and 140,00 natives, under the jurisdiction of the Republic. The best building in Monrovia, the capital, is the Methodist Academy, and a still better one is going up at Cape Palmas. There are 23 teachers employed by the Board, among whom is Mrs. Wilkins, a white lady, who has labored there for seventeen years.

The missions in Germany are prosperous, have a good house of worship in the city of Bremen, and the missionaries have extended their work into Wirtemberg, Hannover, &c. They have never had more than about 100 members there at any one time, for the reason that the Government is jealous of them, subjecting them to so much annoyance that they take certificates and remove to this country.

In China, they have been afflicted by sickness and death among laborers, but others are now on their way, and the mission will soon be strengthened.

The receipts for the last year have been $20,000 less than for the previous one, as the financial embarrassments have pressed very heavy upon the people. Still the Board is free from embarrassment.

At the conclusion of the abstract, the Bishop introduced Rev. D. D. Lore, late missionary to Buenos Ayres, South America, who said, that being announced as he had been, the people might expect that he would speak of South America. Each missionary will have resources gathered from his own field of labor. He was appointed to that field eight years ago, and was aware that the mission was under had a very strong hold on the sympathies of the Church. That mission is without romance; there are no Pagan temples to attract notice; no strange scenes to awaken interest. Yet he had experienced hair-breadth escapes; had been near to the city where 50,000 soldiers were engaged in mortal strife; had been shut in by siege and blockade, when supplies were cut off and life in jeopardy. But these were not because he was a missionary, but grew out of political revolutions, which placed others in as great peril as himself.

For seven years the church in that place has been self-supporting, and has given, also, as liberally as any church in the land. In that time it has given $1,200 for other missions, $600 for Sunday school purposes, and $100 for the Bible cause. It has averaged only about thirty members while thus largely contributing. Its influence is felt, and its mark is made upon the place and people.

Romanism has selected its means, looking to the State, the sword, the purse, the power, the offices; claiming not only all privileges, but monopolizing all. In South America it had a fair field; first there, alone there; and for 300 years there were none to oppose, while the State lent its aid in all things according to the desire of the Church. It built up its system as it pleased—its monks, its friars, its priests, its brotherhoods and its sisterhoods. What has it done for the natives? Has it civilized or christianized them? No! It did mould them to its will, and it fleeced them of their wealth. The Jesuits drew from them, to send home for the use of the church, £900,000 per annum!

In Buenos Ayres, the anti-Catholic party is now in power. The Romish doctrines tremble; its power wanes; its clergy are without respect. In some parts Rome is but a shadow, Holy Mother has lost her power, and State constitutions indicate public sentiment as being in favor of freedom in religion. The State is in advance of the Church. A German Protestant is at the head of the educational department; and there is a Methodist Academy, with 150 native boys, of Romish parentage. South America is the most liberal of all the Catholic States, and the masses feel the least hostility to Protestants. In some parts, Church and State are already divorced. Brazil has most Romish power, but not to be envied even there. Mexico must yield to "manifest destiny," and mystic Babylon must fall!

Bishop Ames was next introduced.

METHODIST PROTESTANT.—The excellent Baltimorn Organ utters a hearty sentiment. We record it with pleasure:

"It cannot be denied, and we mention the fact with great pleasure, that the prejudices which formerly were so palpable between the Methodist Episcopal and Methodist Protestant brethren have, to a great extent, subsided. Among our personal friends we number a great many of our old side brethren, both of the ministry and the laity, and their intercourse with us is uniformly fraternal, and in the highest degree courteous. Why should it not be so? Why should two churches perpetuate strife?"

EPISCOPAL.—During the year ending 1854, the amount received by the Episcopal General Domestic Committee from the churches in several States was $38,404 15, and for foreign missions, $59,582 23, making a total of $97,068 38, which is an increase of some $25,000 over the previous year. Of the receipts in 1854 Massachusetts contributes one twenty-fourth, and, in 1853, one-ninth.

CONGREGATIONAL.—A Boston correspondent of a New York paper says:

"In our Congregational churches we fear there is considerable indifference and neglect in reference to infant baptism. In one of our oldest churches in this State there had not been, a few years since, an instance of infant baptism for the seven preceding years. Last year there were seventy Congregational churches in New Hampshire that reported no infant baptisms. This year 96 churches, or about one-half in the State, reported none. If this indifference continues the ordinance will become extinct in the Congregational Church."

The Independent, urging their people to join in public service, not let it be done by proxy, makes this admission to those sitting in the amen corners:

"Yet even in regard to prayer, to a much greater extent than is customary at present in Presbyterian or Congregational churches, the practice of audible assent to and union in the prayer might, perhaps, be adopted without impropriety. There might be opportunity given in the worship for silent prayer, each one for himself, and for his friends, of all the congregation. Nor would there be any impropriety, in our view, in giving to the one inspired and inspiring prayer left to us by our Lord a permanent and prominent place in the public worship of every church, and inviting all to join in it, 'from the least unto the greatest.' And personally we have never been troubled or disturbed, in officiating occasionally for Methodist congregations, when some ardent brother has found it in his heart to respond amen, whenever the Spirit moved him to do it. If all the people should habitually respond 'with loud amen' at the close of the prayer offered by the minister, we are confident that their attention to the prayer would be increased, and their interest made deeper and more personal. Children especially would come to feel, more than they can do now, that it is a public act of divine service in which they have an interest, and in which they should habitually bear their proper part."

PRESBYTERIAN, O. S.—Austin College, Texas, is reported by Dr. Baker, President, as progressing favorably, and promises to be a light in Texas.

Our Presbyterian exchanges regard suspiciously the establishment of a late periodical in Baltimore, the Southern Presbyterian Review, by the Rev. Stuart Robinson, as indicating the determination, on the part of some persons, to renew agitation and controversy in that Church. Alluding to the Boards, this new Review holds this language:

"Changes must come; the more for the peace of the Church if they come through the natural channels. But come they must either peaceably or forcibly, through the Boards or over the Boards."

And again:

"There are radical differences amongst us as to the polity and measure of the Church; in fact, two distinct Presbyterianisms, becoming more and more clearly marked, and promising at some future day to present themselves for choice to every officer in the Church."

And the last Assembly, it is intimated, leaned towards the tenets of the party opposing the present order of things.

PRESBYTERIAN, N. S.—The Christian Observer, of the 10th inst., an organ of what is called the constitutional branch, has news of a N. S. planting in Mobile. Rev. J. M. McLean having been employed by the O. S. as city missionary, raised a church of some twenty members. The O. S. thought to work with a N. S. man; but the harvest has been put into a N. S. barn. At the last session of South Alabama Presbytery, the Church prayed for the erasure of its name. It sets up for itself, in connection with the Newton Presbytery, N. S. Mr. McLane writes:

"Let me add, encouraged by the promise of help, my little band have purchased the house built for them by the friends of Christ in the First Church, at its original cost, about $3,200, for the payment of which they are greatly encouraged and thankful to two friends in the State of Mississippi, who promise each $500. This will reduce our debt materially. Have you no readers whose hearts will be touched to lend us a helping hand? Of the importance of this field for constitutional enterprise, I can say nothing now. Mobile has probably but one superior market in the South. At the head of Mobile Bay, and, at the mouth of Alabama river, and being the terminus of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, all must see its growth is destined to be very great; and this is the first Constitutional Church here, and providentially thrown upon us. Have I not grounds for hope? Yes, I do confidently trust that, as the Lord has begun his work, so will he give it favor among those whom he has enabled to help us. It is said this poor church have lashed themselves to a sinking ship, and must go down unless they cut loose. I ask Constitutional Presbyterians if this is so?"

GENERAL ITEMS.—It is said that $70,000 have been raised for the establishment of a Universalist College, to be located at Salisbury, Ill. Thirty thousand dollars more are required before the charter will take effect, and this, it is believed, will be procured before June next. This, we believe, is the second college connected with the Universalist denomination in the United States, Tuft's College, at Sommerville, Mass, being the first.

The poor clergy of the Established Church are about to petition the Queen and two Houses of Parliament for a more equal distribution of ecclesiastical revenues. The facts on which the petitioners ground their case are, that while Bishops and great dignitaries receive enormous incomes, the yearly income of 10,000 parochial clergymen does not exceed $1000, the yearly incomes of 7800 are under $750, and of 600 under $250. The men who receive these pitiful salaries are the working clergy.

A Conference has recently been held at Manchester, between a committee of the Synod of the English Presbyterian Church and delegates from the five Presbyteries of the United Presbyterians of England, to deliberate on the subject of a union between the two bodies. There was a friendly and agreeable interchange of opinion, which showed the substantial unity between the respective bodies; and a strong hope seemed to be entertained that a formal consummation of union might soon be effected.

The religious census of England gives 229 Socinian congregations, with 29,612 hearers; about 120 each.

The Secretary of the "British Unitarian Association reports:—"Not only are there upward of thirty of our congregations of cems standing now in want of ministers, but the number of such vacancies is rapidly becoming greater, from the removal of some of our brethren by death, and the secession from the pastoral office of others, who seek in other professions and pursuits for employment more congenial with their tastes, or for the means of a decent livelihood, which their ministerial sphere seemed unable to yield to them."

Non-Fraternization—Mormons.

Some hard things are going about of the High Church Baptists. This is a small but growing party, who urge the tenet of close communion to its extreme, and refuse any Christian fellowship or pulpit exchange with Paedo-Baptists. For our part, we are slow to believe that the sound and intelligent body of Baptists can be brought over to such ultraism.

But Mr. Shuck's position, as hereinafter defined, before the latitudinarian legislators of California, will stand approved by Baptists and Paedo-Baptists. Mr. S. is a Baptist. The following is an account of this strange proceeding:

"The Assembly of 1854 had no chaplain. The Assembly passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee to invite all the clergymen in Sacramento City to appear, on alternate mornings, at the opening of the House, and offer gratuitous prayers. Immediately after the passage of that resolution, a letter was received from a Mormon priest, and read. The following is the conclusion and pith of it:

"'Believing it to be inconsistent with the principles of the gospel, the practice of Jesus Christ and the economy of the government of God to sell prayers at the rate of $12 a piece, and not believing that a prayer which costs $12 will have any more influence with the Almighty than one which is offered freely, I propose, should it meet with the approbation of the honorable members of this House, that inasmuch as God bestows his blessings "without money and without price," to offer my services to ask those blessings freely as they are given, and thereby give a slight testimonial of my regard for the interests of the State and community. With great respect, I remain your obedient servant.

'M. D. MERRICK,
'An Elder of the Church of Christ of Latter Day Saints.'
'Sacramento City, January 9, 1855.'

"A motion was made and carried (38 to 14) that Mr. Merrick be considered one of the clergymen invited. The next day a couple of indignant letters were addressed to the House by evangelical clergymen stationed in Sacramento, declining the invitations."

The Rev. J. Lewis Shuck says:

"I am now precluded from accepting the invitation you have extended, from the fact of the Assembly having, by a large vote of yesterday, acknowledged the Christianity of that during imposture of systematized licentiousness, called Mormonism. And with it, or with its elders, I can have no religious sympathy, affinity, fraternity or intercourse. I claim for myself, individually, no superiority in righteousness over other men, but, as a Christian minister, I do claim for Christianity a superiority over every other religious system on the face of this whole earth; and as to Mormonism itself, I regard it as a dishonor to the one living and true God, a libel upon Christianity, a disgrace to the philosophy of human progress, and a bold insult to the intelligence of the nineteenth century."

THE TRACT CAUSE.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Managers of the Tract Society, the following programme of principles was adopted for the government of the Society and its agents. To require that colportage should be self-sustaining, is believed to be the best policy for the Society at present. When the Society gets into full operation, it will not only greatly extend the circulation of Methodist literature, but will be a powerful auxiliary to the Book Establishment.

1. The Tract Society shall be made, in all its operations, an adjunct of the Book Establishment, and all transactions between them be subjects of negotiation between the Book Agents and the General Secretary, under the advice of the Board of Managers.

2. To carry out the designs of the organization, it is proposed to proceed as fast as practicable, with the aid of the Book Editor:

First—To revise and enlarge our present catalogue of denominational tracts, substituting new ones in the place of such as may be deemed inappropriate, and adding to the list from time to time, such as are thought to have an adaptation to the exigencies of the Church and the times.

Second—To issue a large list of those adapted to the promotion of experimental and practical piety.

Third—To issue select works in book form at the cheapest possible rates, to be distinguished from the general issues of the Publishing house as the volumes of the Tract Catalogue.

3. For the present, all moneys received by the Society shall be expended, after defraying the expenses of the organization, in purchasing a portion of the tracts and tract volumes issued for gratuitous distribution, and in cheapening the remainder by paying the Book Agents the difference between the cost of production and the wholesale price, so that all our agents may receive books and tracts at prime cost, and be able to sell them at wholesale prices; colporteurs being required to make their salaries from the proceeds of their sales.

4. To enable them to do this, they shall be furnished with the books of the general catalogue, as well as those of the tract list, but in no case shall these books be sold at any other than the established retail prices.

5. Colporteurs shall be allowed to distribute, gratuitously, tracts and tract volumes to an amount not exceeding 25 per cent. of their sales; these distributions are to be made to the destitute poor who are unable to purchase, but who will promise to read the works if presented to them.

6. Colporteurs shall in no case sell or distribute any book not authorized by the General Editor and the Corresponding Secretary of the Tract Society.

7. As this Society will be by far the largest customer of the Publishing House, and its purchases attended by less risk than ordinary sales, and as its objects are purely benevolent, it is the opinion of this Board that agents should fill its orders at as liberal rate of discount from wholesale prices as the interests of the publishing House will admit.

Instructions to Colporteurs in the employ of the M. E. Church, South:

1. In entering the service of the Tract Society, colporteurs are to employ their time where the Conference agents designate in the sale and distribution of the books and tracts furnished them, and in procuring subscribers for the periodicals of the Church. All the publications furnished will have the price affixed, to which they are to adhere in all cases. In no case are they to sell or distribute books not duly authorized.

2. Colporteurs are allowed to distribute gratuitously books and tracts to the amount of one-fourth of their sales. These donations are to be made to the poor who are unable to purchase, and to those who will not purchase, but who give evidence that they would read the works if they had them. Discretion is to be used in selecting such books and tracts as are suited to the case of those to whom they are given.

3. Each colporteur shall be required to give an exact account of all books and tracts he may take from the Depository, and shall monthly report to the Conference agent the amount of time employed in the sale of the Society since his last report, the amount of books sold, the amount gratuitously distributed, the amount of money received for the Society, and of the number of subscribers obtained for our Church periodicals, according to the form furnished.

4. It is desired and expected that colporteurs will visit every family in the neighborhoods of the territory assigned them, especially the poor. And it is our object to disseminate the largest possible amount of religious publications, and as we are informed, desirous to encourage all to engage in the work of distribution, wherever our itinerant ministers will do so, colporteurs are directed to confer with them, and arrange their work in reference to that fact.

5. That there may be harmony of action and the least possible expense, it is recommended, on visiting a town or circuit, the preacher in charge be seen at the earliest hour, and consulted with in relation to the work; and thus ascertain what portion of the community, if any, he will supply, and what portion the colporteur; and also that the preacher may furnish him a home among the people during his stay in the neighborhood.

6. Colporteurs are expected to encourage religious conversation and prayer in the families with the distribution of books, when it is practicable. And to enable them to do their work successfully, they should, in their leisure hours, read the works they circulate, that they may be qualified to recommend them understandingly and confidently. They should also furnish themselves with information bearing upon and illustrative of their calling.

7. On all proper occasions donations are to be solicited to aid the operations of the Society.—N. C. Advocate.

EVIDENCE OF REACHING HEAVEN.—The best evidence that we shall reach Heaven is that we love Heaven; and the best evidence that we love Heaven is, that we love to look below, and love to sit in heavenly places with Christ.

Notices---Advertisements---Terms.

SEND NOTICE.—"I have not yet received a paper," writes a worthy member of A—— Conference. Looking at the books, we find him in the northern part of the Conference, and his paper still going to last year's post office, in the southern. This is the first notice to change. We desire (it is our interest, as well as theirs) that every member of the patronizing Conferences be in receipt of the popor.

ADVERTISEMENTS.—In regard to advertising, the New York Independent says:

"We must give some space to advertisements. Many readers wieh the information these convey; and since every subscriber gets his paper at less than cost, we must make up the deficiency from our advertising columns."

The Independent is one of the leading papers at the North. The same policy obtains in other cotemporaries of high standing. Besides the pecuniary necessity thus served, judicious advertisements (we decline other sorts, at any price) serve those visiting the city as a business directory. Once one inquire where to buy a family carriage, or family groceries, or clothing, or dry goods, or books and stationery, or carpeting and oil cloths, casting his eye along the advertising columns he will see. Does he want professional services, or to be directed to a cotton factor and commission merchant, there he can find them. More than all, are parents in search of educational institutions, we are always happy to afford them a skeleton from the best.

About these school advertisements. They cost us much as others, and by the large circulation of the Advocate greatly forward the interests of advertisers, and must, therefore, be governed by business terms. To them is given preference, and in large ones a liberal deduction is made. But they must be paid for in advance. Old advertising accounts are the deadest of assets.

TERMS.—In making them emphatic, last week, the clerk reminds us of an error. Here they are, correct: Two dollars in advance; if not paid within six months, two dollars and a half; if payment be delayed a year, three dollars. Our publication, though not exactly according to rule, had the effect of bringing some to a prompt settlement. Give subscribers their full rights. Advance practice, however, suits us best; and they will find their account in it also. The favorite one idea prevailed over us, in keeping with character, if the following be true, which we clip from an exchange:

"An editor became martial, and was created a captain. On parade, instead of 'two paces in front—advance,' he unconsciously exclaimed, 'Cash—two dollars a year in advance.' He was court-martialed."

MARRIAGES.

MARRIED—On the 14th of February, by Rev. C. C. Callaway, Rev. JAMES M. PATTON, of Ala. Conference, to Miss MINERVA E. FALCONER, of Eutaw.

DEATHS.

Mrs. LOUISA D. RATCLIFF, wife of Benjamin Ratcliff, and daughter of John W. and Fany Lindsey, was born in Nash county, N. C., 9th of April, 1828. In Leak county, Miss., in 1842, she was truly born a second time, and immediately joined the M. E. Church, of which she never became ashamed. She died January 19, 1855, leaving behind her a husband and five little ones, to go and join two who had gone to Heaven before. As a Christian she was ever faithful, and at her post. When she came to the brink of the dark, and so much dreaded, stream of Jordan, she could with perfect composure say to Bro. R., her old sainted mother, and other numerous relatives and friends who stood by: "I am ready; I am not scared; I am going to Heaven!" We have had many sweet meetings here; but, if you are faithful, our meeting there (in Heaven) will be much sweeter!"

She rejoiced in view of meeting her two babes and father, who had gone before. She called to her bedside an unconverted brother, and begged him to promise to meet her in Heaven. Obtaining this promise of him, she took her husband by the hand, and said: "My dear, don't weep for me; I am done suffering; love God, and teach our children to love Him, and meet me in Heaven." Then, in her perfect senses, bid them all adieu, and at once ceased to work, and began to live.

LEWIS A. SIMS.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

Anniversaries commemorating the occurrence of important events are common to all lands. From time immemorial the births of great and renowned men, the anniversaries of distinguished battles, and the observance of interesting events have had their due honors. There were these observances in olden and in medieval, as well as in modern times. All countries and all ages have paid them respect.

It is fitting, therefore, that we, who in so many matters of importance and custom follow the example of our predecessors, should regard this law of reverence, and pay to the memory of the Father of his Country a worthy tribute. The war that freed us from servility and gave us a national character depended, for its success, upon nothing more than his intellect and courage. Ever after the wisdom of Adams and the National Legislature—which could not then be called a Congress—had made him Commander-in-Chief, Washington was the controlling spirit of the United States—its ruler and dictator. His opinions, in fact, were law; his wishes outweighed the decisions of all others. From Cambridge to Yorktown, from Trenton to Valley Forge, the war was waged under his direction. He knew every thing, saw every thing, provided for every thing. He fought our battles and provided the means for fighting them. It may well be said, as it has been, that without Washington America would not for ages have had a national existence, and that, therefore, America should pay him the respect due to its creator. In every important sense he made the Union. All the declarations, all the devotion of our forefathers would have been ineffectual if they had not been directed by the controlling influence of his mind, and consummated by the strength of his genius. In fact, Washington was the nucleus and ganglion of our present solemcy. If he did not conceive it he took hold of the conception and rendered it real. He fought for it, he made it practicable; he advised it, he fostered it. There is no one thing to which the present Republic is so greatly indebted as the influence of Washington—no one man to whom it owes so much, either in war or diplomacy.

It is not necessary or important, however, for us, in referring to the anniversary of Washington's birthday, to write out a history of our revolution or a biography of its great hero. Both have been written and both are known over the world—in fact, the two are almost analagous. The fame of Washington is as world-wide as the history of American nationality, and wherever it has gone, it has won applause. The praise of Brougham and Byron, the applause of Guizot, elaborate and eloquent as they were, have failed to embody the popular opinion, and award due honor to the greatest, the noblest, the firmest, the most disinterested man that ever lived. The hearts of the people run far ahead of the pens of the writers, and the feelings of mankind are too warm towards the world's great patriot, to find expression. Moses had his honors for leading the Children of Israel out of captivity; Cincinnatus for defending his own land, without ambition beyond its defence; Archimedes for contributing to the safety of Syracuse; Van Trompter driving the enemy from the shores of Holland; Pym and Cromwell for preserving the liberties of England; Bruce and Wallace for maintaining those of Scotland; Tell for saving those of Switzerland; Tancred and Bayard for upholding those of France. These men were honored, either for foresight, for courage, for honor, for perseverance, for disinterestedness, or for wisdom; but of all the list, no one had the merit or the quality of uniting them all in as high a degree as Washington. He stands in the very foremost ranks of fame, by consent of all. Should America give nothing else to the world, than the fame and the example of Washington, she will have repaid her indebtedness with a vast interest.

May the day of Washington's birth be remembered and observed forever.

NUNNERIES AND ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS. The Massachusetts House of Representatives has instructed its Committee on the Judiciary to consider the expediency of reporting a bill making convents and nunneries and Roman Catholic schools as open and free to public visitation and inspection as Protestant institutions.

And why should they not be? In this country there should be no secret dungeons, no place where the authorities of the State or nation are not allowed to visit. No dark, secret dens, beyond the reach of law. No! never. Let every place be subject to the inspection of the authorities. Let underground rooms be inspected among one sect as well as among others.

COLUMBIA, S. C., Feb. 20.—The mails per steamship Asia have arrived here, and the foreign papers contain a variety of interesting items not contained in the telegraphic accounts:

The tone of opinion in political circles in Russia continues warlike, and the pacific delusions of the Western powers are ridiculed. The Turkish Minister at Vienna had received power to treat for peace.

It was feared that since the recent difference between Austria and Prussia, the former cannot act up to her position as an European power, without dissolving the German Confederation.

It is stated that the Russians continue to send large reinforcements to their army in the Crimea, and that they are also concentrating large forces in Bessarabia.

The mortality among the Allied troops in the Crimea had been immense. The Sixty-Third British Regiment had become extinct, and many others were nearly so.

The whole British force was, at the latest dates from the Crimea, only 11,000 bayonets.

The total Russian loss during last year was 111,000 men.

BUSINESS.—A general depression prevailed Tuesday in almost every department of outdoor business. The reduced stocks of Western produce is one cause; the absence of demand in other staples, with a temporary pressure in some circles for money, had their influences on the general trade. In exchange there was nothing done, excepting small sales at the counters of the several banks.

We are happy to say, if telegraphic advices are to be confided in, this state of things will not be of any duration. Being Shrove Tuesday, our streets had the appearance of liveliness and briskness after the close of business, to indicate that we are a joyous community.

A mule child, only a day or two old, was discovered one cold morning a few days ago, in Ninth street, New York, lying in the snow with no covering to shield its tender frame from the frosty air, save a newspaper wrapped about it. The little outcast was sent to the Alms-House, and, notwithstanding its exposure to the severe weather, was likely to do well.

Mrs. Alonzo Davenport, and one hundred and forty-two other ladies of New Bedford, have presented a petition to the Legislature of Massachusetts, praying for the establishment of a Female Medical College. They say that, as the men of Massachusetts all confess that they are "Know-Nothings," it is time that the woman should endeavor to know something, and especially such knowledge as concerns their own sex.

THE ENGLISH MINISTRY.

The English Ministry has been again changed, and Lord Aberdeen has gone out of office quite as ingloriously as the Earl of Derby, although Lord Palmerston does not come in with many of the advantages of either. The event was not unlooked for in England nor this country. Lord Aberdeen did not form a popular cabinet, did not pursue a popular policy, and when the war commenced with such high expectations, was found to be a failure in every respect; when Napier sailed out from the Baltic with no laurels and no prizes; when Dundas returned from the Black Sea and his career of masterly inactivity; when the army at Sebastopol was pronounced a mob; when Lord Raglan was denounced as a humbug; when the Times told the truth and published the real state of affairs, the downfall of Aberdeen became a certainty. The English nation expected an early and an easy victory over the Czar. It might be owing to the weakness or the want of foresight in the Cabinet that no victory was gained, whilst a hundred million of pounds were expended. Whatever the cause was the commonality felt that the government was inefficient and lost confidence in it. That moment its downfall became certain.

We have no opinions to express concerning the acts of the late Cabinet. The reviews of it by the English press, particularly the Times, that have ap eared in our columns from time to time, are sufficient to convey a proper idea of the manner it was judged at home. We may, nevertheless, speak of the new Cabinet and the men that compose it. Most prominent of all is the Viscount Lord Henry Temple Palmerston, Secretary-at-War for nineteen continuous years under the administrations of Perceval, Castlereagh, Liverpool, Canning and Goderich, from 1809 to 1828; foreign Secretary from 1830 to 1834, and then from 1835 to 1851; always a member of parliament, and one of the most prominent English statesmen of the present day. His political character has been somewhat changeable. Under the administrations of Pitt and Portland he was a supporter of the ministry: under those in which he held the Secretaryship of War—as widely different as the poles in their principles—he managed to be on friendly terms with each and was generally pronounced a "trimmer." He has been a tory and a whig, a conservative, and a liberalist.

At the present time, when party organization is broken up in England, almost as much as it is in this country, Lord Palmerston is believed to be in favor of the progressive and liberal doctrines of the day. He strongly supported the first reform bill in the House of Commons, in 1831, and aided the Peel and Wellington cabinet in the removal of the Catholic disabilities. There is very little conservatism in Lord Palmerston. He is for progress, for go-aheadativeness, for the nineteenth century. He is for intermeddling with the affairs of all other nations, and having Great Britain as sovereign over the world, as she was under Cromwell. Though an old man—being born in 1784—he is as active as a boy, and runs up-stairs with all the agility of youth. He is learned in political economy and the routine of State business, and has a far greater experience than Russell or Aberdeen, or any other living Englishman. He is in favor of prosecuting the present war with all the force of the nation, and it is probably this which enabled him to form a cabinet when Derby and Lord John Russell failed.

Lord Panmure, formerly Fox Maule, is not so well known, on this side of the water, as any of the other leading members of the new Cabinet. He is fifty-four years of age. He entered the army in 1818 as an ensign, and served in Canada up to 1831, when he resigned, with the rank of captain. He commenced his political life in the Scotch county of Perth, in 1832, and in 1835 was elected to Parliament. He was Under Secretary of State for the Home Department; under the Melbourne administration, and in 1841 accepted the Vice Presidency of the Board of Trade. The chief event of his political career has been his strong and hearty defence of the religious establishment of Scotland, when its interests were at stake; and the ardor with which he enlisted in the cause of the Free Church after a secession became necessary. He was a warm friend of Chalmers, and one of his right hand men in the erection, support and defence of the Free Church system.

THE TWENTY-SECOND.—The one hundred and twenty-second anniversary of the birth of George Washington occurred yesterday, and was more generally and extensively observed in this city than any other great celebration of the year past. The day was ushered in with a salute of thirty-one guns on Lafayette and Congo Squares, flags were hung out by the shipping, the theatres, hotels, printing-offices and cabarets. At an early hour of the morning the military met in Lafayette Square and proceeded through the principal streets with full ranks and with a most military presence. All the banks and insurance offices, together with many stores and private establishments, were closed in the afternoon.

The early part of the day, yesterday, was very pleasant and sunny, and the pavements were thronged with great numbers of people, particularly ladies and children. Every one seemingly turned out to celebrate the occasion and observe the military. In the afternoon the people had returned to their homes fatigued, the military had disbanded, the stores closed, and a general quiet succeeded the previous tumult.

Long may it be that the memory of Washington shall secure to him these deserved honors and that the American people, appreciating his character and the measureless benefits conferred by him upon succeeding generations, shall make of his Birth-day an anniversary and jubilee.

DR. CLEFT'S NEW CHURCH.—We perceive that this magnificent edifice, at the corner of St. Charles and John streets, is rapidly approaching completion. It has not been found expedient to carry out fully at present the details of the original design, and although thus shorn in some essential particulars of its completeness, the building as it stands presents a most imposing appearance, and is a fine specimen of architecture, and of the skill of the builder.

The original plan embraced a third octagon rising from the second, and from that an open spire of tracery-work more than a hundred and fifty feet in height, each octagon connected from base to spire by flying buttresses, also filled in with elaborate tracery. Had this design been carried out, it would have produced an edifice unrivaled in its proportions and details. We may at some future day see it completed.

Mr. John Harnett is the architect of the building.

A CENTENARIAN.—The Barre (Mass.) Patriot of the 9th inst., states that Mrs. Mary Farrar of Petersham, recently celebrated her one hundredth birthday by attending meeting at the Unitarian Church. She appeared in good health—rose and stood unsupported during the singing, and after the congregation was dismissed, remained to join in the communion service. The thermometer stood in the morning only two degrees above zero, and a strong wind blew from the north-west through the day.

THE KANE EXPEDITION.—The President has signed a resolution directing vessels to be sent to the relief of Dr. Kane.—Steps are to be immediately taken for the departure of the expedition.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

ARRIVAL OF THE BLACK WARRIOR

Great Excitement Throughout the Island.

The United States mail steamship Black Warrior, T. D. Bullmer, Commander, left Havana on the evening of the 15th inst., and arrived at her wharf on the 18th inst.

The whole Island was in a state of the greatest excitement in regard to the rumored expedition of the Gen. Now, companies of militia were being formed, and the troops were daily reviewed, and harangued by the Captain General, who declares that the arrival of the hostile expedition may be soon expected. According to the Havana papers, all profess to be zealous of the honor of defending the safety and honor of the Government, even at the price of their own lives and estates. The authorities, however, seem confident in their own resources and power to crush at once any invading force that may effect a landing, and it is formally announced that the terrible and irreconcilable doom of the filibusters is inevitable, and but awaits their coming. In the meantime, the theaters, balls, and other places of amusement, are generally well attended.

The English frigate Vestal was in port. Her Brittanic Majesty's ship-of-war Medea had arranged to convey a cargo of Spanish troops to the Fuerta de Abajo, and the circumstance had caused some rejoicing among the Spaniards, who deemed it a manifestation of good will from England, valuable from its moral influence.

Col. Garcia de Mauriz has been appointed Governor of Havana in place of Echavarria, who had been sent with troops to Trinidad. His nomination to so high a post was due, it is said, to his staunch patriotism, valor and military usefulness, particularly shown in the campaign of 1851, which rendered him extremely popular on the Island.

The Diario de la Marina, from which we extract the principal portion of our news, has not a word in regard to the recent arrests. If any have been made since the departure of the previous steamer, which is altogether probable, they are from some cause not mentioned. The Island has been placed under martial law and all the seaports are in a state of blockade, but the civil courts are in force. The Diario de la Marina contains a decree to this effect, and nobody will be permitted to land on the Island while it is in force, even though their papers should be found correct. Persons found without passports or in possession of weapons, will be arrested and treated as pirates. The sale of arms of any sort is strictly prohibited. Volunteer forces are being raised, and fresh defences are to be built around the city of Havana.

By Magnetic Telegraph.

NEW YORK, Feb. 21, 1855.—The Cunard steamship Baltic, Capt. Comstock has arrived at this port with one week's later intelligence from Europe. Her dates from Liverpool are to Saturday, the 10th inst., and those from London and the continent correspondingly late. Beyond the formation of a new ministry in England, with Lord Palmerston as Premier, and a reported Turkish victory on the Danube, there is no news of striking importance.

Sir Charles Napier had made a savage speech against the vacillating policy of the British Government.

New British Ministry.

A new British ministry had been formed, composed of the following elements:

President, Lord Palmerston.

Minister of War, Lord Panmure—formerly "Fox Maule."

Foreign Secretary, Earl Clarendon.

Home Secretary, Mr Sidney Herbert.

Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir G. Cornewall Lewis.

First Lord of the Admiralty, Sir James Graham.

Chancellor, Lord Granworth.

President of the Council, Earl Granville.

Privy Seal, the Duke of Argyle.

President of the Board of Public Works, Sir William Molesworth.

President of the Board of Control, Sir Charles Wood.

Postmaster General, Lord Canning, without a seat in the Cabinet.

The above form the new Cabinet. The Earl of Aberdeen, Duke of Newcastle and Lord John Russell retire from office. Lord Panmure is a new member, and the balance are the same as in the late ministry.

There is very little other news of interest by the Baltic.

France.

M. Magne has been appointed French Minister of Finance, and M. Rouher, Minister of Agriculture.

The Peace Conference.

The peace conferences at Vienna had not yet been opened.

The Crimea.

Affairs in the Crimea present no feature of importance. The Russians continued to make sorties, in one of which, made on the 24th ult., the French sustained great loss.

Supplies were reaching the British Camp in abundance. The siege works were advancing. The army was still sickly. The nights were frosty, but the days fine and mild.

The latest despatches received from Lord Raglan, bearing date of the 23d and 24th January, speak cheeringly of the future prospects of the Allied Army.

The Earl of Lucan has been recalled from the command of the British Cavalry in the Crimea.

It was rumored that a retreat from the Crimea was contemplated on the part of the Allies, but the report is doubtless incorrect.

An apology had been made to Omar Pasha by the Sultan, and he had withdrawn his resignation of the offices of Commander-in-Chief of the Turkish forces.

Turkish Victory on the Danube.

It was reported that a battle had occurred between the Russians and Turks, on the Danube, and that the Turks were victorious.

Mutiny of Troops.

A mutiny of Zouaves is reported to have taken place in the Crimea, and four hundred of the mutineers sent prisoners to Constantinople.

Prussia.

France has signified her willingness to negotiate a separate treaty with Prussia, provided she will bind herself to the same obligations to which Eng and, Austria and France are subject by the treaty of December 24.

Turkey.

The feeling at Constantinople was strongly in favor of peace.

The Sultan intends to raise a voluntary national loan.

Holland and Denmark.

These powers are seeking to join the Western alliance.

Austria.

Eight Austrian merchant ships in port at Galatz had been fired into by the Russians. Austria has demanded an explanation of the affair.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

Messrs. Milligan, Evans & Hemphrey, in their circular of the 10th inst., report the sales of the week at 35,000 bales, at prices showing no change since the departure of the Asia on the 31 inst.

The closing quotations were 5⅝ pence for Fair Orleans, 5¼ pence for Middling Orleans, 5⅛ pence for Fair Uplands, and 5 pence for Middling Uplands. The demand closed moderate.

Of the sales of the week, 1000 bales were to speculators and 2000 bales for export. The imports of the week were 11,000 bales.

Breadstuffs.

The speculative demand for Breadstuffs in the Liverpool market had ceased, and prices were tending downward. The closing quotations were, for Western Canal, ——; and Ohio, hands 35 6d. Yellow Corn 44 and White 44, establishing a slight decline in all descriptions. For Wheat nothing there was but a moderate demand, at prices rather in favor of buyers.

State of Trade.

The reports of the Manchester market indicate a slight decline in all descriptions of manufactured goods.

Provisions.

For Lard, in the Liverpool market, prices were fair and holders were firm with moderate sales to the trade. Provisions generally were unchanged in prices, and dull.

SHIP BUILDING AT OCEAN SPRINGS, MISS.—We learn from the Ocean Springs Gazette, that a fine schooner the Oceana owned and built by Mr John Rodrigues, was launched at that place on Tuesday last. The Gazette says the Ocean Springs possesses many advantages for ship-building. Timber is abundant in the vicinity.

We learn from the Mobile papers of Sunday that the Alabama river had commenced rising, and the larger class of boats had began their trips.

COUNTY HOSPITAL.—The following is the report of this institution for the week ending at 5 o'clock Saturday evening:

SIXTH DISTRICT COURT, Judge Cotton.—Monday the trial of the following cases was taken up:

I proceed upon a statement prepared by the heirs, and an attempt on their behalf on the 1st to dispose of the important cause appealing to the best of my judgment and without prejudice, a sterling to the law in the case. I regret to say it is my conviction that the law applicable in this case will not permit me to adjudge for the right. This unfortunately is a question of principle and entirely free from principles of abstract justice which I will endeavor to apply in the fairest manner possible. I am bound to say that the law is in favor of the defendant. Yet there is a principle involved in the case

BY THE STEAMSHIP ATLANTIC.

Almost the only intelligence of interest brought by this arrival is to be found in the proceedings of the British Parliament, in which the conduct of the war has been discussed in a spirit very much the reverse of favorable to the Government.

Most of the nations of Europe are placing their armies on a war footing. Opinion changes several times a day as to the prospect of an early peace.

As hopes of a speedy settlement recede, fears of an extension of the area of hostilities increase, and in Paris it is no uncommon to remark that spring will see a French army marching on the Rhine.

Messrs. B. Thompson, of Liverpool, have suspended payment in £60,000, chiefly owing to losses in the Australian trade.

Various minister rumors were in circulation on Liverpool change, to the effect that a number of other heavy failures are imminent.

Hope, Sugar & Co., London, have suspended in £100,000.

Turtle & Sharp, iron dealers, New Cumnock, Scotland, have also suspended for a large amount.

Siege of Sebastopol.

In the night, between the 11th and 12th, 150 Russians made a sortie, but were driven back, after a hand-to-hand fight of some minutes. They left in our works 7 killed and 2 prisoners wounded. Of ours was 5 wounded.

JANUARY 12.—Considerable reinforcements reached the Allies. Liprandi has again advanced his outposts to the Tchernaya. 40,000 Russians, with eighty guns, were said to be at Perekop.

Letters of 12th January state that the Flagstaff Battery had been mined by the French, who only waited a favorable opportunity to blow it up.

Sickness was on the increase in the camps. Menschikoff is reported to have said, "Our troops may rest. Generals January, February and March will fight our battles far better than we can."

A letter from Odessa of the 9th in the Ost Deutsche Post, says that the Russians have taken all the necessary measures for assuming the offensive in the Crimea.

It was positively asserted that Omar Pacha's force would begin operations on the 18th January, by advancing under cover of the artillery of the fleets along the coast towards the Alma and the Belbek.

A despatch from Admiral Brust, of date January 13th, thus reports progress: "The cold has been pretty sharp the past few days. Since yesterday the weather is milder, and the snow has thawed, though the wind is still from the north."

Another despatch which arrived at Marseilles, January 23d, stated that the Allies had not undertaken anything new in the Crimea, as they were waiting until the Turkish Army had all arrived at Eupatoria. No battle had been fought, as was reported. The besieged had repaired and re-occupied the quarantine fort. General Brown was about to resume his command in the Crimea.

The Wanderer, of Vienna, of the 20th says, that the exertions made to send large bodies of troops to the Crimea from the Danube are incessant. General Gortschakoff, on the 5th, ordered General Luders to make a diversion into Dobrudscha in order to prevent, if possible, the Turks from leaving Varna for the Crimea. This order led to the movement of General Paulof, on the 8th and 9th. Large bodies of Russian troops have been ordered to concentrate themselves at Perekop, so as to be towards advance on Eupatoria and attack the place by assault if necessary.

A letter from Kamiesch, of January 5th, says: "The batteries of mortars of the French army cause considerable annoyance to the Russians, who have retreated in great numbers toward Simpheropol."

Menschikoff's Latest.

JANUARY 17.—The following dispatch is published from St. Petersburgh, 25th January, [illegible] received from Prince Menschikoff under date January 17:

"The siege operations do not advance. Two successful night sorties were made on the 15th and 16th January. We took 14 English and 9 French prisoners. The Allies lost a considerable number in killed. Arab deserters say that the Turks are treated with very little consideration by the Allies, who employ them to carry provisions, provisions, and other loads from Balaklava."

Position of Prussia.

The Paris Constitutionnel publishes news from Berlin, but without guaranteeing its authenticity, that the Allies have decided not to allow Prussia to participate in the Vienna Conference, except on the following conditions:

1. That Prussia accede to the treaty of December 2.

2. That she does not oppose the demand made by Austria for the mobilization of the federal contingents.

3. That she herself shall mobilise a force of 200,000.

On the other hand Prussia claims a right to participate in these conferences, in her capacity as a great European power, and because she was a contracting party to the treaties which are under revision. Prussia has therefore sent a despatch to the Cabinets of Vienna, Paris and London, against the validity of any resolutions that are passed without her participation in the conference.

Great Britain.

Both Houses of Parliament re-assembled on Tuesday evening, the 23d, after the adjournment.

In the House of Lords the sitting was occupied with discussions on the subject of issuing warrants to the army in the Crimea. The points at issue were chiefly as to the shortfall to be issued to the whole army, or only to those who have distinguished themselves under fire.

Lord Lyndhurst has given notice that on Friday, the 2d of February, he will move the following resolution:

"That in the opinion of the House the expedition to the Crimea was undertaken by her Majesty's Government with very inadequate means, and without due caution or sufficient inquiry into the nature and extent of the resistance to be expected from the enemy; and that the neglect and mismanagement of the Government in the conduct of the enterprise have led to the most disastrous result."

In the House of Commons, Mr. Layard questioned Mr. Vernon Smith, President of the Council "whether he would lay on the table the correspondence that had taken place with the Powers, with reference to the treaty of the 2d of December, 1854, and especially any document communicated to the Government concerning the interpretation put by the British and French Governments on the four points—not for negotiation, but for acceptance?"

Lord John Russell could not say whether or not the correspondence could be laid on the table. He would, however, state generally what had occurred with respect to the four points. In this state the question stands at present. At the end of November, the Austrian Government, through their Minister at Vienna, declared their acceptance of what are called the four points. On the 2d of December, a treaty was signed by France, England and Austria, and on the 15th of December, a meeting was held by the Ministers of France, England and Austria, at Vienna, with Baron Meusebach, the Minister of Bavaria. At that meeting the French Minister read, on the part of his Government, and of the Governments of England and Austria, the interpretation which those powers put on the four points, and which should be considered as the basis of negotiation.

I will mention only (said Lord John Russell) that, with respect to the third point, it was proposed that the interpretation to put an end to the preponderance of Russia in the Black Sea. Prince Gortschakoff stated that he would not agree to the proposed interpretation of the Four Points, but that he [illegible] Russian Government would [illegible] Count Buol that he had [illegible] and on the 7th or 8th of January the meeting was held at which Prince Gortschakoff [illegible] Minister for Foreign Affairs, [illegible] which he said he had received the views of his [illegible]

France.

The Moniteur has several congratulatory articles on the remarkable success of the loan. Not less than 1,700,000,000 francs—if we may believe the statements—have been placed at the disposal of the Government, which asked no more than 5,000,000, and the number of subscribers is 177,000, a large proportion of whom are for sums under or not much over 500 francs.

Generals Pelissier, Rivet and Devilliers have left for the Crimea.

The Moniteur publishes the bill adopted by the Legislative Corps calling out 140,000 men of the class of 1854.

Symbolical of the good understanding that at present exists between France and Austria, Count Buol has received the grand cross of legion of honor; and M. Drouyn de L'Huys has been decorated with the grand cross of the order of St. Stephen of Austria.

Spain.

Accounts from various parts of Spain give indications of an approaching Carlist insurrection.

Reports are spread that Cabrera has entered Spain, but they are, as yet, doubtful.

Senor Sovillano, Minister of Finance, has resigned, and is succeeded by M. Mailos.

On the 19th of January a motion of want of confidence in the Ministry was brought forward in the Cortes, and, after some discussion, was rejected by 186 votes against 68.

Austria.

Activity continues exhibited in the War Department.

Baron Bruckgartner has resigned the Ministry of Finance and Commerce. He will be succeeded by Baron Bruck, who, in turn, will be succeeded as Minister at Constantinople by Baron Koller.

China.

Telegraphic accounts from China, of date December 12, mention a slight rise in the rate of exchange, tending to increase the shipments of silver from Britain. The export of tea to date was 44,000,000 pounds, and as the total, which lately showed a deficiency, has thus reached an amount exactly equal to the export up to the corresponding period of last year, and no supplies are coming from Canton, the shipments from Foochow and Shanghai must have been unexpectedly active. Of silk the export was 26,000 bales, against 28,000 last year, and the stock at Shanghai was only 1000 bales, of inferior quality.

Political affairs in the South were in a position more critical than ever, and the Canton authorities had applied officially for assistance to the American and English Consuls, with what result is not stated, although it is to be presumed all interference will be avoided. No province had arrived from the interior, and the trade of the port was completely suspended. The long-vexed question as to the payment of the arrears of export duties on tea, at Shanghai, claimed by the Imperial Government, in the absence of all power to collect them, is stated to have been settled, as far as the Americans are concerned, by an agreement to pay up one-third.

From Buenos Ayres.

By the arrival at New York of dates have been received from Buenos Ayres to the 24th December. The news in regard to the progress of the civil war in the Argentine Confederation is interesting. A battle had taken place of late between the Buenos Ayrean forces under Gen. Hornos, and the troops of Urquiza, in which the latter were defeated and put to flight. We make the following extract from the bulletin of the victorious General:

In this defeat, Mr. Minister, the enemy have been completely demoralized, leaving on the field of battle about twenty killed, including two chiefs and eight officers, along with them a considerable number of wounded, to whom several hats have been left in the adjacent villages. All their baggage, two pieces of artillery, and about one hundred new lances, upwards of 200 muskets, a number of swords, the regimental colors, several tents, all their papers and correspondence, etc., etc.

On our side we have the deplored loss of ten cavalry and two infantry soldiers killed, and 19 soldiers and officers wounded, with several individuals missing, dispersed among the thickets during the charges and interminable pursuits.

The papers of Buenos Ayres appear to despair of an immediate peace with Urquiza, who has been crowned and installed, just as he is acknowledged the legal President of the Confederation by all the provinces except Buenos Ayres, this is not likely soon to take place.

Trade with all ports still with heavy arrivals from the United States and several cargoes had been shipped to the Pacific, rather than submit to the ruling low prices, or wait for a favorable change.

A DELEGATION OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS ON THEIR WAY TO WASHINGTON.—We were this morning honored by a visit from the celebrated Grand Sachem of the Chippewa tribe of Indians, Pah-to-way-gee-shik; or, rendered into English, "Hole-in-the-day." He was accompanied by Edward Ashquam, a blood cousin, and a most intelligent and accomplished half-breed, who acted as interpreter. This is the first time for so great a distance he has made an excursion into pale faces, and, of course, he was much that is strange to him. Hole-in-the-day is the son of a distinguished chief of the same name, who died about eighteen years ago. His age is about twenty-five years. His height five feet ten inches, weight about one hundred and sixty pounds, and certainly as fine a looking specimen of the aboriginal as we ever saw. He is represented by the interpreter to be very wise, of great weight in council, and an orator remarkable in the line of his people.

He has had many bloody fights with the Sioux, and he arrived at St. Paul's with a band of about 200 warriors. A very considerable number of the braves of this tribe armed, congregated in front of the hotel where Hole-in-the-day was stopping, and he sent out to have inquiry made what they desired in thus congregating. The answer was, that they wished to look upon the renowned chief of the Chippewas. He said if that were all, they should be gratified, and accordingly, he went to the balcony, where his savage enemies gazed long and earnestly upon him. He then sent word, that if there were any chiefs or braves wished to see him he should be happy to receive them in his room. Five came forward, left their arms in the hall of the hotel, and paid a visit to him. Though they could not converse they smoked the pipe of peace, and after a brief visit took their departure. Governor Sherman, anticipating disturbance, had the Sioux removed eight miles from the city.

Accompanied by this great chief, there are five other chiefs, who will go with him to Washington, where they will treat for the disposal of their lands. The United States interpreter, Truman Warren, accompanies the delegation. The names of these distinguished sons of the forest are as follows:

Pah-go-way-gha ahif; or, "Hole-in-the-day."
Ah-yuh-jah-we-ghe; or, "Crossing Sky."
Qua we-ban-dosh; or, "Bad Boy."
Ka-gwa-dosh; or, "Swift Sailor."
Kah-kish-ke-we-gwim; or, "Crow Feather."
Mah-squa-way-ganing; br, "Dying Echo."

It will be remembered that this tribe of Indians treated with their White Father last summer, and disposed of a large body of land on the North-western shores of Lake Superior. Hole-in-the-day thought that the terms of the treaty were not advantageous, yet signed it. He now goes to Washington, by invitation, to confer with this Government in regard to disposing of a large body of land which immediately surrounds the head-waters of the Mississippi river. The head-quarters of the tribe are about six miles north of Crow-Wing, and one hundred and fifty north of St. Paul's. (Cleveland Plaindealer, Feb 8.

FEARFUL DEATH.—A French paper says that a workman engaged in digging a well near Bayeux, was recently buried by the fall of a large body of earth. A shaft was immediately sunk through the fallen material to the depth at which the man was supposed to be, and excavations were made in every direction from the bottom, in the hope of rescuing him from death. Soon his voice was heard calling to them, and although they could not tell from what direction it came, they continued their labors, until he was found imbedded in a quantity of wood-work a few feet above the place where they had commenced their search. The upper part of his body was free, but the lower portion was so fast jammed that all efforts to extricate him were ineffectual. Every effort would cause a fall of sand which endangered the lives of the workmen. The work was finally given over in despair; but after an interval of several hours, five gallant men volunteered to make a last attempt to rescue their unfortunate fellow laborer.

They descended and set to work with renewed energy. They excavated enormous quantities of sand, and passing in the end-over to pull him out. Their united efforts did not move him an inch, and at length finding themselves useless to continue their efforts and unable to do more, they left the pit. The man was then without hope, resigned to his fate which awaited him. The suspension of work was then formally ordered by the priest, the hope which had lingered in the hearts of the bystanders was abandoned, and the engineers proceeded to take measures for preserving the adjacent houses from damage in case the earth near the shaft should give way. Nothing more was seen or heard of the doomed one—nothing was known of the secret of his last agonies as he waited the approach of death to that lonely pit.

The number of musical instruments manufactured in Saxony is truly enormous. Two small villages (Seorichen and Klingenthal) alone send off yearly about 10 000 pianos, at 5 to 10 thalers; 200 dozen at 1200 thalers; 1 dozen at 4 000 thalers; 300 dozen at 1200 thalers; 10 dozen at 600 thalers; altogether 12 810 dozen realize at 44 400 thalers. They also export 2 643 dozen guitars at 22 800 thalers; 6 000 double basses at 4 000 thalers; 2 000 violoncellos at 5 000 thalers, and strings to the amount of 60 000 thalers. The finest part are sent out of Germany, but where in all the world 31 500 guitars, manufactured anonally, go to, we are at a loss to find out.

An interesting archæological discovery has just been made at Conligny, near Beaumont, of a Roman tomb containing a large earthen vase, in which was another of glass of a square form. The contents of this consisted of bones, ashes two rings, and four Roman coins—one of Faustina, the wife of Marcus Aurelius, and the other three of Lucilla the sister of Commodus. Between these lay a lozenge ring with the inscription, Vita Amor, and on the agoden ring, set with a ruby, and a clasp set with jewels. These trinkets denoted the tomb to be that of a woman. All these objects have been bought by the Cantonal Museum of Lausanne.

A despatch of the 12th from Cleveland, Ohio, stated that an engine and six freight cars were thrown off the track and down an embankment at Conneaut, and two men severely injured.

The Mormon Temple, begun at Salt Lake City, will be much larger than the temple built by the Mormons at Nauvoo. It will require ten years to complete it, and will cost several to millions of dollars.

AMERICANS IN PERU.—It is stated that fifty Americans (disappointed gold hunters) participated in the late revolution in Peru. Gen Castilla, the successful hero, in his dispatches, is represented to have stated that the Americans did nearly all the fighting.

A SUBSTITUTE FOR MARBLE.—Dr. Benjamin Workman, in a lecture before the Natural History society of Montreal, mentioned that a process has recently been discovered, by which slate may be rendered white in color and made to take a polish like alabaster or Carrara marble; this transformation is produced by the use of certain chemicals and the application of friction, and while adding greatly to the value of the slate, is unattended by any heavy outlay. The process was first made public at the London exhibition, and has been patented.

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE respectfully announce that the present number contains the conclusion of the "Memoirs of Napoleon Bonaparte," which have so long formed an important portion of the Magazine. They have made arrangements to supply its place with articles which they hope will prove equally attractive. Among these already in course of preparation are the following:

I. DOMESTICITIES OF DISTINGUISHED AMERICANS, illustrated from original drawings by our most eminent artists. The biography of Andrew Jackson, to be the number for January, is the first of the series, which will include the principal heroes of our two wars with Great Britain. Among the articles already prepared are Biographies of Putnam and Marion.

II. ILLUSTRATIONS OF AMERICAN SCENERY, LIFE, AND MANNERS. The article, "Virginia Illustrated," in the present number, will give an idea of the scope and design of this series. Papers and illustrations have been engaged from our most accomplished authors and artists. They will present in succession delineations of the scenery and social peculiarities of every section of our country.

III. THE AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS OF THE UNITED STATES.—This series will be prepared by the author of the papers already published upon "Sugar" and "Cotton." The illustrations will comprise the most interesting features in the cultivation and preparation of our principal agricultural staples.

IV. NARRATIVES OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPEDITIONS.—The series will embrace accounts of the principal exploring expeditions sent out from this country. They will, in all cases be prepared from papers, and illustrated by drawings furnished by those who have taken part in the enterprises. The first article of this series, which will appear in the number for March, will contain the commencement of the "Narrative of the Dutien Expedition," under command of Lieut. Strain.

V. VOYAGES, TRAVELS AND SKETCHES in various parts of the world. To this department papers have been engaged, and are now prepared, and in course of preparation by different authors, relating to China, Madras, Java, the Malay countries, Russia and Brasil. No expense will be spared to produce for the articles a series of superb illustrations, in most cases after drawings by the authors themselves.

VI. SOCIAL, POLITICAL AND RELIGIOUS SKETCHES IN EUROPE by the accomplished and spirited author of "Sights and Principles Abroad." These will be accompanied by numerous characteristic illustrations. The opening article of this series appears in the present number, and presents a graphic view of life and morals in Italy, showing the effects of Romanism on society.

VII. THE HOLY LAND AND THE ADJACENT COUNTRIES.—This series of elaborately illustrated articles, by Jacob Abbott, will be still further continued.

VIII. ILLUSTRATIONS OF NATURAL HISTORY.—The article upon Alligators, in the December number, is a specimen of the style and manner of illustration in which a large number of subjects belonging to this department will be treated.

IX. CONSULAR EXPERIENCES.—A series of papers by our Consuls abroad. The first of these sketches, by Donald G. Mitchell, author of "Reveries of a Bachelor," giving an account of his consulship at Venice, will appear in an early number.

X. MEMOIRS OF THE REIGNING DYNASTIES OF EUROPE.—The brilliant paper in the number for January, upon the "House of Romanoff," will be followed by others upon the various European dynasties. The next paper of this series will give the "Memoirs of the Spanish Bourbons." These memoirs present a vivid picture of the characters of those monarchs who claim to reign by "Divine Right."

XI. In addition to the different series of illustrations enumerated above, the Publishers have made ample arrangements for papers upon subjects of general and current interest. Illustrations will be profusely furnished wherever the value of the paper will be at all enhanced by them. Besides the foregoing series of articles, the pages of the Magazine will be filled with [illegible] and miscellaneous matter, furnished by American writers, or selected from the whole field of Foreign literature. The Editorial Department will preserve the same distinguished features that Oasy Chair has so long characterized it. The Publishers are confident that this programme of a portion of their arrangements for the present year will be accepted by the public as evidence of their determination and ability to make their Magazine the most interesting and valuable, as well as the most widely circulated periodical in the world.

TERMS.—The Magazine may be obtained of Booksellers, Periodical Agents, or from the Publishers, at Three Dollars a year, or Twenty-five Cents a number. The semi-annual volumes, as completed, neatly bound in cloth are sold at Two Dollars each, and Muslin covers are furnished to those who wish to have their back numbers uniformly bound, at Twenty-five Cents per number. Nine Volumes are now ready.

The Publishers will supply specimen numbers gratuitously to Agents and Postmasters, and will make liberal arrangements with them for circulating the Magazine. They will also supply Clubs of two persons at Five Dollars a year, or five persons at Ten Dollars. Clergymen supplied at Two Dollars a year.

This institution is situated in Summerfield, Alabama—as healthy a location, we believe, as there is in all the South. It is under the guidance and instruction of an able and experienced Faculty. No one of the Professors or Teachers, whose names appear above, needs the support of a recommendation.

Heretofore all the departments have been under the superintendence of Dr Mitchell; but it has been thought best by the Trustees and Faculty to place each department under a separate jurisdiction. Accordingly, Dr. Mitchell will hereafter devote his whole time and his distinguished talents to the Female College. With him will be associated three experienced Professors, and as many Ladies as the circumstances may require.

One of the Professorships is now vacant, but it is certain to be filled before the beginning of the ensuing session, by some gentleman of established reputation.

The Trustees most confidently invite a comparison of the advantages thus presented to parents for the education of their daughters, with those afforded by any female College in the South.

The Male Academy, under the direction of Professor PRO, aided by Professor Dunklin, (and others if necessary) cannot fail to secure and retain a large share of the public patronage.

The Preparatory School has been placed under the charge of Professor Bragg, in order that the children may be properly trained and prepared to enter the higher departments of the Institute. A new building for it is already under contract. The buildings of the Female College are also being greatly enlarged and improved. Some ten or twelve thousand dollars will be expended in purchasing and furnishing them.

The Trustees and friends of the Institute have resolved to leave nothing undone to place it above every similar institution in the country.

W. H. HARRISON, Secretary of the Board.

N. B.—The Trustees have thought proper, from motives of economy, to require the young ladies to dress in uniform, except in the school-room, and strictly forbid the wearing of any jewelry except a plain breastpin.

The uniform for winter is green worsted; for summer, white muslin. aug1—tm26

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.

—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others subject them on an uncertainty; and although he be ever aiming to better his gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and mote well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

THE undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements for the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of a high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own and the adjoining States, the adoption of a plan, which we trust will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. C. Thweatt, (well-known throughout the state as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South) has been engaged as President of the Institution. The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweatt is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield having subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the meantime, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured, that no school can be found in the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning as may be found necessary. To OLD HYMNS.

The favorito hymn, "Jerusalem, my happy homo," has been ascribed to the 17th century. A writer in "Excelsior," however, traces it back, through various South, English and French publications, to Augustino's "Meditations." Somo of the changes aro as follows:

(A. D. 1700.)

O, mother dear, Jerusalem,
When shall I come to thee?
When shall my sorrows have an end?
Thy joys when shall I see?

(1650.)

Jerusalem, Jerusalem,
Would God I were in thee!
O, that my sorrows had an end,
Thy joys that I might see!

(1601.)

Hierusalem, thy joys divine,
Noe joys may be compared to them;
Noe people blessed noe as thine,
Noe cittie like Hierusalem!

This old hymn has, in somo versions, eight, nineteen, twenty, twenty-six and sixty stanzas.—Norton's Gazette.

OUR ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LATE REVEREND DOCTOR BEAUMONT.

Many of your readers will be aware of the sudden death of this distinguished and popular minister. Though belonging to the English Wesleyan denomination, he was so generally known that we are convinced a few observations on his life and character will not be considered inappropriate.

We believe the late Dr. Beaumont was himself the son of a Wesleyan minister, who will be mainly remembered as the composer of some very beautiful melodies. In common with the sons of many Wesleyan ministers, the Doctor received the rudiments of his education at the well known Kingswood School, founded by Mr. Wesley, and on leaving that institution was apprenticed, if we mistake not, to a druggist. On completing the term of his servitude, having been the subject of deep religious impressions during its course, he offered himself as a candidate for the Christian ministry among the Wesleyans, and received his first appointment from the Conference of that body in 1813. Two several years he occupied comparatively unimportant stations, though even then his preaching was rich in promise; but the effect was, unfortunately, marred by an unconquerable impediment, amounting to a confirmed stutter in his enunciation, and which was supposed to be occasioned by some natural defect in the construction of the palate. Indeed, so painful was this impediment, that many who have heard his early public efforts have been astonished in listening to his later eloquence, and have not been slow to express their wonder at the almost entire victory persevering use, aided by some scientific appliance, had enabled him to obtain over it. In 1819 he was stationed in Scotland, and soon after entered himself as a student in one of the universities, pursuing the "humanity course" in conjunction with his ministerial duties, and in due time took the degree as Master of Arts. During a subsequent residence in Edinburgh, having directed his attention to physic, he received the diploma as Doctor of Medicine. It was, we learn, while stationed in Scotland that his pulpit talents became generally appreciated, and that he began to be looked upon as one of the rising stars in the Wesleyan connexion. On his return to England, in 1824, his fame as a preacher speedily grew, and it continued steadily to advance, till at length it rivalled that of his most able contemporaries, and rendered him latterly the most popular orator of his own denomination; and it is while in the meridian of that popularity that his sun has suddenly gone down. On Sunday morning, the 21st of January, 1855, in the midst of a crowded congregation at Hull, while conducting with his accustomed energy those sacred services in which he delighted, he fell into the arms of death, leaving behind him a name which will be embalmed in the memory of thousands, which will live long in Methodistic tradition, and which will be honorably mentioned in the archives of the religious body to which he belonged. To die on the floor of the House of Lords was the startling but appropriate end of a Chatham, and to expire in the pulpit was the no less fitting termination of the earthly career of a Beaumont.

We feel that to do justice, and nothing but justice to his character as a public speaker, is both a delicate and difficult task. We will, however, endeavor to form as accurate an estimate on the subject as our critical abilities, such as they are, will allow. As a preacher, the matter or substratum of his discourse was both eminently evangelical and solid, not failing to exhibit prominently the doctrinal peculiarities of Methodism. These peculiarities, however, in his hand were divested of that technical phraseology which is usually associated with them, and frequently bore to very many minds an appearance of novelty, or at least of freshness. His discourses were not distinguished by any remarkable profundity of thought, and yet he often displayed a power of generalization which bespoke no inconsiderable intellectual depth. No extraordinary logical acumen was visible in him, nor did he usually deal in nice metaphysical distinctions; and yet he had sufficient reasoning power to render the arguments he advanced clear, sound, and often effective. But one thing which rendered him so captivating was the astonishing brilliancy of his imagination, and the magnificent affluence and splendor of his imagery. In these respects he almost equaled Jeremy Taylor, reveling himself and making his hearers revel in a crowd of bold and beautiful figures. The fertility and felicity of his illustrations, too, were beyond those of most other orators. They were derived in abundance from nature, science, art and theology. Perhaps he manifested some preference for illustrations suggested by his studies in particular branches of natural philosophy, but generally speaking the whole world of matter and of mind seemed ready for his use. And then his vocabulary was probably as extensive as that of any living man; indeed, there was occasionally a redundancy in his language which was favorable neither to precision nor effect. Add to this that he was of an ardent temperament, and considerable physical energy, which, combined, produced frequently a violence in his manner of delivery which, though aiding his popularity with the multitude, was nevertheless sometimes so excessive as to constitute in the eyes of men of taste a decided blemish on his oratory. But, beyond all these, he unquestionably possessed the undefinable and unacquirable faculty of genius. This was his most distinguishing characteristic, and its sudden flashes threw a new light on time-worn topics; startling, amazing, fascinating and instructing his hearers. And thus gifted he was a great man; and well he used his powers. There was no indolence about him, as there is about many men of genius; for in journeys and labors he was probably more abundant than, with one exception, any minister of the very itinerant connection with which he was identified. Whether, too, in the pulpit, or on the platform, or in the lecture room, you could perceive both the sweat of his brain and the sweat of his brow. And, to crown the whole, he labored both physically and intellectually, not for himself but for others. Though possessing powers which, in their positions both in the establishment and in the world would have probably procured for him an ample income, he contented himself with the comparatively scanty provision afforded by his denomination, even to their greatest men, and expended his energies and his life in endeavoring to do good. He adhered faithfully to the church of his first choice in spite of temptation to leave her, and through both good and evil report. Such a man was worthy of at least as great honor as he ever received from his own people, and his death ought to throw thousands into mourning. The words of David in reference to Abner are applicable to the occasion: "Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen in Israel?"

Dr. Beaumont is reported to have been a liberal in Methodist politics, and to have held a position in its Conference analogous to that of the leader of the Opposition in Parliament. He is represented as being bold and skillful in debate, if not occasionally even fierce. He never stooped to low game; fearlessly and honorably spoke out his mind before the face of his antagonists; almost invariably commanded attention; sometimes delighted his auditory by his wit, sometimes scorched by his sarcasm, sometimes confounded by his argument, and sometimes dazzled and overwhelmed by his impetuous eloquence, not unfrequently creating a storm of applause or disapprobation unusual in such an assembly. Whatever opinion may be entertained by different parties as to the quality of his ecclesiastical views, all will admit that he was a manly opponent, never skulking into holes and corners to pour out his complaints, receiving a hard blow with as good a grace as he dealt one, and all the generous hearted among his ministerial brethren will regret that his plume will no longer wave in the thick of their intellectual conflicts. Faults he doubtless had, for he was human; but take him all in all, we shall rarely "look upon his like again."

Our readers will have perceived that we do not consider his oratory to have been without its blemishes. The intonations of his voice were sometimes far from agreeable; his distribution of emphasis was somewhat too liberal, and his vehemence was often unnecessarily great. But his eloquence was his own, and possessed beauties which more than counter balanced its defects. It often rushed on like a mountain torrent, flashing and sparkling in its headlong course, and carrying away on its foaming tide all who came within its reach. Sometimes it produced an electric effect, and one might see the vibration of its shock run through a vast congregation. Occasionally, too, it was soft, tender and pathetic, but in its very gentleness it often had a power like the rod of Moses, and so smote the rock of many hardened hearts that they gushed forth in tears. Rich and poor, learned and illiterate, alike felt its magic. Its fame brought a Bishop of the established church within the walls of a Wesleyan Chapel, and the late Sir Robert Peel listened to it with marked attention and approbation. Often it compelled multitudes to bow before it like the trees of the forest to a mighty rushing wind, and on one occasion it made them so far forget themselves as to cry out, "Go on," at the apparent termination of a magnificent discourse. But that eloquent tongue is now motionless, and that "pleasant voice which was as a very lovely song" is hushed forever!

We understand that a movement is in progress among the friends of the deceased for making a better provision for the helpless members of his bereaved family than he was able to make. We wish it success.

UNIFORMITY OF WORSHIP.

"Question 1. What direction shall be given for the establishment of uniformity in public worship among us on the Lord's Day?

"Answer 1. Let the morning service consist of singing, prayer, the reading of a chapter out of the Old Testament, and another out of the new, and preaching.

"2. Let the afternoon service consist of singing, prayer, the reading of one or two chapters out of the Bible, and preaching.

"3. Let the evening service consist of singing, prayer and preaching.

"4. * * * Let the Lord's prayer also be used on all occasions of public worship, including the first prayer and the apostolic benediction, 2 Cor., xiii., 14, in dismissing the congregation."—See Discipline, chap. iii., Sec. vi., pp. 104, 105, new edition.

By the above extract it will be seen that our Church has made provision for uniformity in public worship on the Lord's Day throughout our wide-spread connection in this country. It is needless to say that such a provision is an essential element in church organization, and an important and distinctive feature in ecclesiastical economy. This is known and admitted by every one. The conduct of public worship is the great business of the Church, and it therefore becomes a part of the organization, as well as the duty of every ecclesiastical body, to prescribe the manner and order of worship to be observed among them. On this principle the Methodist Church has acted in the adoption of the above rule, and that it should be uniformly observed is manifest to all.

Methodism, in all its important and distinctive features, is a unit—everywhere the same. Its itinerancy, doctrines, general rules, class meetings and love feasts are the same in every part of this country, and Europe also; the Calvinistic fragment in Great Britain is, perhaps, the only exception.

According to the design of Mr. Wesley, as set forth in the original form given to the Church in the United States, and from the provisions of the Discipline at the head of this article, we see that uniformity of worship has been designed and provided for. But what is our practice, and how near do we come to it, is a question worth looking into. Whatever may be our boasted unity in other things, in this there is none. From the bishops down our variance from the course prescribed is more common than the observance of it; insomuch that the observance has become the exception, and the breach of it the common custom.

It was the good fortune of the writer of this article to be present at the late General Conference, held in Columbus, Ga., and to hear several of the bishops and some of the most prominent ministers composing that body preach during the session; and even there the same disregard to the rule was common. It is true I did not hear them all, nor could any one well do so, for almost every pulpit in the city was occupied by our ministers, and often at the same time. But as far as my observation extended, the neglect of the course prescribed by the Discipline was common. Indeed, no one who did not know of the existence of such a rule would ever have supposed, from the course pursued, that such a rule existed. In some instances one of the lessons was omitted, in others both; so that a morning's service on the Lord's Day would pass away, and not a portion of the Word of God be read, except the text; and this occurred on one occasion when a bishop ministered! And, with two or three exceptions, the Lord's prayer was omitted in every service I attended. How can we expect our ministers generally, and especially the younger part of our ministry, to have respect for this rule, or any other pertaining to the order of the Church, when such a custom becomes common among us? If the example of our distinguished and venerable men is against the rule, our veneration inclines us to respect the example more than the rule, and thus it is many are misled. With all due regard for our elder brethren, and "those who have the rule over us," we feel that this is an evil, and ought to be corrected. Our laymen have observed it and complained.

In these days, when so many are claiming to be independent of old landmarks, and boasting of their freedom from conventional usages, are we not liable, by such a course, to foster and strengthen that disposition? And may not those so inclined plead the examples here referred to, and argue the right to persist in their own course, making their cases a precedent, from which discord, if not disaster, may flow?

It is not our province nor our purpose, in this article, to discuss the propriety of the rule regulating public worship on the Lord's Day among us; but we may add just here that any one acquainted with the history of Church, or the custom of the early preachers of Christianity, including the great Teacher himself, can at a single glance discover the propriety of the course recommended by our Discipline, and that the usage has both antecedent and Scripture to sustain it. But from the latitude we have allowed ourselves, we have fallen into a habit that in many instances public worship is conducted, even on the Sabbath, without the least regard to this rule, and that, too, in some of our most populous cities. But seldom is the Lord's prayer heard in some of our pulpits, and to hear the benediction in the simple apostolic form, as in 2 Cor., xiii., 14, is truly refreshing.

In connection with this subject, and by way of illustration, I will relate an incident that occurred in one of our Southern Conferences a few years ago. Shortly after the General Conference adopted the regulation in reference to receiving probationers into full membership, (Chap. iii., Sec. I, Ans. 3d, pp. 96, 97,) a preacher was complained of by his P. E. for the course he pursued in carrying out that regulation. That he previously notified the members of his charge that on a certain day he would administer the "ecclesiastical oath and swear them into membership." Of course such a notice excited no little degree of curiosity among the good people round about that region. Accordingly, when the day arrived, he called them up, (some of whom had been in the church long previous to any rule requiring formal notion on that subject,) and proceeded, as he told them, to administer the "ecclesiastical oath, and to swear them in." It afforded no little amusement at his expense, while it proved a source of mortification to many of the body, as well as to the members of that charge, who had been made unwilling actors in such a farce.

Another case not long since occurred in reference to the same thing, which if not as absurd, was equally foreign from the design and custom of our Church. A minister of high repute, in charge of a very important station, advertised that on a certain day the "confirmation of the members on probation would take place." And, accordingly, at the appointed hour, and in the presence of the whole congregation, and under that term, and as near as possible to the rite, without the laying on of hands, the thing took place; and some of the members speak of it as the time when they were confirmed.

Now the only difference between the two, in our opinion, was a matter of taste. One preferred the forensic style or form, while the other preferred the prelatic style and form of procedure, but each was equally foreign from the design of the Discipline.

These and similar occurrences grow out of a want of uniformity of action among the conductors of public worship. If our rule on that subject is to become obsolete, let it be left out of the book, as unfit for our independent and "progressive age." Let it go, as did the clause on "high heads and enormous bonnets," with some other rubbish that savored too much of the fashion of the age when they were adopted. But if the rule is right, founded on the ancient usage of the people of God, and supported by fair Scriptural inference, let it stand, let it be recognized as binding, and give it the influence of the example of our bishops and distinguished ministers, and we shall soon secure what we so much desire—uniformity in public worship."

OBSERVER.

ELOQUENCE.

Eloquence is not only the art of addressing men in public, it is the gift of strong feeling, accurate thought, extensive knowledge, splendor of imagination, force of expression, and the power of communicating, in written or spoken language, to other men, the idea, the feeling, the conviction of truth, the admiration for the beautiful, the disposition to uprightness, the enthusiasm for virtue, the devotion to duty, the heroic love of country, and the faith in immortality which make men honorable—the feeling heart, the clear head, the sound judgment, the popular knowledge, the artistic imagination, the ardent patriotism, the manly courage, the attachment to liberty, the pious philosophy, and, lastly, the religion consonant with the most exalted idea of the Divinity, which render the individual good, the people great, and the human race sacred.—It supposes in us the possession and exercise of all the intellectual and moral faculties that are involved in speech—the power of the human word.—Lamartine.

PROFITABLE AUTHORSHIP.—It is stated that Fanny Fern's portion of the profits on the sale of "Ruth Hall" already amount to about $15,000, and the profits of the publishers to nearly an equal sum. She has published a letter stating that she knows nothing about the life of herself which has been announced, and believes it to be a catch-penny.

ENGLISH CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This institution has an annual income of £120,000, or about half a million of dollars. Its mission agents now include above 200 Europeans, exclusive of their wives, spread over its stations throughout the heathen world; its native born catechists amount to 1,600; its communicants number near 16,000.

Pontius Pilate at Vienne.

An abridged Translation from the "Courrier des Etats Unis," for the Louisville Journal.

Vienne in Dauphiny, a province of France, the ancient capital of transalpine Gaul under the Romans, is situated on the river Rhone There, on the left bank of that beautiful stream, is seen a tomb of ancient architecture, which, according to tradition, is the tomb of Pontius Pilate—Pilate, under whose government Jesus Christ suffered. Passus est sub Pontio Pilato. It was in Vienne also that the Wandering Jew revealed himself in 1774—a most remarkable occurrence, the spot that contained the ashes of the judge of the Righteous, was to be trodden upon by a descendant of his accuser.

The following chronicle was extracted from an old latin manuscript found in a monastery near Vienne.

It was under the reign of Caligula, when C. Marcius was prætor at Vienne, that an old man, bent with age, yet of a tall stature, was seen to descend from his litter and enter a house of modest appearance near the temple of Mars Over the door of this house was written, in red letters, the name of P. Albinus. He was an old acquaintance of Pilate's. After mutual salutations, Albinus observed to him, that many years had elapsed since their separation. "Yes," replied Pilate, "many years—years of misfortune and affliction. Accursed be the day on which I succeeded Valerius Gratus in the government of Judea! My name is ominous; it has been fatal to whomsoever has borne it. One of my successors imprinted an indelible mark of infamy on the fair front of Imperial Rome, when the Romans passed under the Caudine Furculæ in the Samnite war. Another perished by the hands of the Parthians in the war against Armenius. And I—miserable me!—

"You miserable?" asked Albinus; "what have you done to entail misery on you?—True, his injustice of Caligula has exiled you to Vienne, but for what crime. I have examined your affair at the Tabularium. You are denounced by Vitellius, prefect of Syria, your enemy, for having chastised the rebellious Hebrews, who had slain the most noble of the Samaritans, and who afterwards withdrew themselves on Mount Garizim. You are also accused of noting thus out of hatred to the Jews."

"No!" replied Pilate, "No! by all the gods, Albinus, it is not the injustice of Cæsar that afflicts me."

"What, then, is the cause of your affliction?" continued Albinus. "Long have I known you, sensible, just, humane. I see it—you are the victim of Vitellius."

"Say not so, Albinus. Say not that I am the victim of Vitellius. No; I am the victim of a Higher Power! The Romans regard me as an object of Cæsar's disgrace; the Jews, as the severe Procurator; the Christians, as the executioner of their God!"

"Of their God, did you say, Pilate? Impious wretches! Adore a God born in a manger, and put to death on the cross!"

"Beware, Albinus, beware!" continued Pilate. "If the Christ had been born under the purple, he would not have been adored. Listen. To your friendship I will submit the events of my life; you will afterwards judge whether I am worthy of your hospitality."

On my arrival at Jerusalem, I took possession of the Pretorium, and ordered a splendid feast to be prepared, to which I invited the Tetrarch of Judea, with the High Priest and his officers. At the appointed hour, no guest appeared. This was an insult offered to my dignity. A few days afterwards the Tetrarch deigned to pay me a visit. His deportment was grave and deceitful. He pretended that his religion forbade him and his attendants to sit down at the table of the Gentiles, and to offer up libations with them. I thought it expedient to accept his excuse; but from that moment I was convinced that the conquered had declared themselves the enemies of the conquerors.

At that time Jerusalem was, of all conquered cities, the most difficult to govern. So turbulent were the people that I lived in momentary dread of an insurrection. To repress it, I had but a single centurion and a handfull of soldiers. I requested a reinforcement from the Prefect of Syria, who informed me that he had scarcely troops sufficient to defend his own province. Insatiate thirst of empire—to extend our conquests beyond the means of defending them!

Among the various rumors which came to my ears, there was one that attracted my attention A young man, it was said, had appeared in Galilee, preaching, with a noble unction, a new law in the name of the God who had sent him. At first, I was apprehensive that his design was to stir up the people against the Romans; but soon were my fears dispelled. Jesus of Nazareth spoke rather as a friend of the Romans than of the Jews.

One day, in passing by the place of Silos, where there was a great concourse of people, I observed, in the midst of the group, a young man leaning against a tree, who was calmly addressing the multitude. I was told that it was Jesus. This I could easily have suspected, so great was the difference between him and those who were listening to him. He appeared to be about thirty years of age. His golden colored hair and beard gave to his appearance a celestial aspect. Never have I seen a sweeter or more serene countenance. What a contrast between him and his hearers, with their black beards and tawny complexions! Unwilling to interrupt him by my presence, I continued my walk, but signified to my Secretary to join the group and listen.

My Secretary's name was Manlius. He was the grandson of the chief of the conspirators, who encamped in Etrusia, waiting for Catalina. Manlius was an ancient inhabitant of Judea, and well acquainted with the Hebrew language. He was devoted to me, and was worthy of my confidence.

On returning to the Pretorium, I found Manlius, who related to me the words that Jesus had pronounced at Silos. Never have I heard in the Portico, or read in the works of the philosophers, any thing that can be compared to the the maxims of Jesus. One of the rebellious Jews, so numerous in Jerusalem, having asked him if it was lawful to give tribute to Cæsar or not, Jesus replied: Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's.

It was on account of the wisdom of his sayings that I granted so much liberty to the Nazarene; for it was in my power to have had him arrested and exiled to Poutus; but this would have been contrary to that Justice which has always characterized the Romans. This man was neither seditious nor rebellious. I extended to him my protection, unknown perhaps to himself. He was at liberty to act; to speak, to assemble and address the people, to choose disciples, unrestrained by any pretorian mandate.

Should it ever happen—may the Gods avert the omen!—should it ever happen, I say, that the religion of our forefathers should be supplanted by the religion of Jesus, it will be to his noble toleration that Rome shall owe her premature obsequies—whilst I, miserable wretch—I, shall have been the instrument of what the Christians call Providence, and we—Destiny.

But this unlimited freedom granted to Jesus, revolted the Jews—not the poor, but the rich and powerful. It is true, Jesus was severe on the latter; and this was a political reason, in my opinion, not to control the liberty of the Nazarene. "Scribes and Pharisees!" he would say to them, "you are a race of vipers!—you resemble painted sepulchres!" At other times he would rear at the proud alms of the Publican, telling him that the mite of the widow was more precious in the sight of God.

New complaints were daily made at the Pretorium against the insolence of Jesus. I was even informed that some misfortune would befall him; that it would not be the first time that Jerusalem had stoned those who called themselves prophets; and that, if the Pretorium refused justice, an appeal would be made to Cæsar.

This I had prevented, by informing Cæsar of all that happened. My conduct was approved of by the Senate, and I was promised a reinforcement of troops after the termination of the Parthian war.

Being too weak to suppress a sedition, I resolved upon adopting a measure that promised to re establish tranquility in the city, without subjecting the Pretorium to humiliating concessions. I wrote to Jesus, requesting an interview with him at the Pretorium. He came.

Oh, Albinus! now that my blood runs cold in my veins, and that my body is bent down under the load of years, it is not surprising that Pilate should sometimes tremble; but then I was young; in my veins flowed the Spanish mixed with the Roman blood, as incapable of fear as it was of puerile emotions.

When the Nazarene made his appearance, I was walking in my basilick, and my feet seemed fastened with an iron hand to the marble pavement. He was calm, the Nazarene; calm as innocence. When he came up to me, he stopped, and, by a simple gesture, seemed to say to me: here I am.

For some time I contemplated, with admiration and awe, this extraordinary type of a man; a type unknown to our numerous sculptors; who have given form and figure to all the gods and all the heroes.

"Jesus," said I to him at last, and my tongue faltered; "Jesus of Nazareth, I have granted you, for the last three years, ample freedom of speech; nor do I regret it. Your words are those of a sage. I know not whether you have read Socrates and Plato; but this I know, that there is in your discourses a majestic simplicity that elevates you far above these great philosophers. The Emperor is informed of it, and I, his humble representative in this country, am glad of having allowed you that liberty of which you are so worthy. However, I must not conceal from you that your discourses have raised up against you powerful and inveterate enemies. Neither is this surprising. Socrates had his enemies, and he fell a victim to their hatred. Yours are doubly incensed against you, on account of your sayings; against me, on account of the liberty extended towards you. They even accuse me indirectly of being leagued with you, for the purpose of depriving the Hebrews of the little civil power which Rome has left to them. My request—I do not say my orders—is that you be more circumspect for the future, and more tender in running the pride of your enemies, lest they raise up against you the stupid populace, and compel me to employ the instruments of justice.

The Nazarene calmly replied,

"Prince of the earth, your words proceed not from true wisdom. Say to the torrent to stop in the midst of the mountain because it will uproot the trees of the valley; the torrent will answer you, that it obeys the laws of the Creator. God alone knows whither flow the waters of the torrent. Verily, I say unto you, before the rose of Sharon blossome, the blood of this just will be spilt."

"Your blood shall not be spilt," replied I, with emotion. "You are more precious in my estimation, on account of your wisdom, than all these turbulent and proud Pharisees, who abuse the freedom granted them by the Romans, conspire against Cæsar, and construe our bounty into fear. Insolent wretches! They are not aware that the wolf of the Tiber sometimes clothes himself with the skin of the sheep. I will protect you against them. My Pretorium is open to you as a place of refuge; it is a sacred asylum."

Jesus carelessly shook his head and said with a graceful and divine smile:

"When the day shall have come, there will be no asylum for the Son of Man, neither on earth nor under the earth. The asylum of the just is there, (pointing to the heavens.) That which is written in the books of the prophets must be accomplished."

"Young man," answered I, mildly, "you oblige me to convert my request into an order. The safety of the province, which has been confided to my care, requires it. You must observe more moderation in your discourses. Do not infringe my orders; you know them. May happiness attend you. Farewell."

"Prince of the earth," replied Jesus, "I come not to bring war into the world, but peace, love and charity. I was born the same day on which Cæsar Augustus gave peace to the Roman world. Persecution proceeds not from me. I expect it from others, and will meet it in obedience to the will of my Father, who has shown me the way. Restrain, therefore, your worldly prudence. It is not in your power to arrest the victim at the foot of the tabernacle of expiation.

So saying, he disappeared like a bright shadow behind the centaine of the basilick.

Herod, the Tetrarch, who then reigned in Judea, and who died devoured by vermine, was a wonk and wicked man, chosen by the chiefs of the law to be the instrument of their hatred. To him the enemies of Jesus addressed themselves, to wreak their vengeance on the Nazarene. Had Herod consulted his own inclination, he would have ordered Jesus immediately to be put to death; but though proud of his regal dignity, yet he was afraid of committing an act that might diminish his influence with Cæsar.

Herod called on me one day at the Pretorium, and on rising to take leave, after some insignificant conversation, he asked me what was my opinion concerning the Nazarene.

I replied that Jesus appeared to me to be one of those grave philosophers that great nations sometimes produce; that his doctrine was by no means dangerous; and that the intention of Rome was, to leave him that freedom of speech which was justified by his actions. Herod smiled maliciously, and saluting me with ironical respect, he departed.

The great feast of the Jews was approaching; and their intention was to avail themselves of the popular exultation, which always manifests itself at the solemnities of the passover. The city was overflowing with a tumultuous populace, clamoring for the death of the Nazarene. My emissaries informed me that the treasure of the temple had been employed in bribing the people. The danger was pressing. A Roman centurian had been insulted.

I wrote to the prefect of Syria, requesting a hundred foot soldiers and the same number of cavalry. He declined. I saw myself alone with a handful of veterans in the midst of a rebellious city, too weak to suppress disorder, and having no other choice left than to tolerate it.

They had seized upon Jesus; and the seditious rabble, although they knew they had nothing to fear from the Pretorium, believing, on the faith of their leaders, that I winked at their sedition, continued vociferating, "Crucify him, crucify him!"

Three powerful parties at that time had combined together against Jesus. First, the Herodians and Sadducees, whose sedition, doubtless appeared to have proceeded from a double motive; they hated the Nazarene, and were impatient of the Roman yoke. They could never forgive me for having entered their holy city with banners that bore the image of the Roman Emperor; and although, in this instance, I had committed a fatal error, yet the sacrilege did not appear less heinous in their eyes. Another grievance also rankled in their bosoms. I had proposed to employ a part of the treasure of the Temple in erecting edifices of public utility. My proposal was scouted at. The Pharisees were the avowed enemies of Jesus. They cared not for the Governor; but they bore with bitterness the severe reprimands which the Nazarene had, during three years, been continually throwing out against them wherever he went. Too weak and too pusillanimous to act by themselves, they had eagerly embraced the quarrel of the Herodians and Sadducees. Besides these three parties, I had to contend against the reckless and profligate populace, always ready to join in a sedition, and to profit by the disorder and confusion that result therefrom.

Jesus was dragged before the Council of the Priests and condemned to death. It was then that the High Priest, Caiaphas, performed a solemn act of submission. He sent his prisoner to me to pronounce his condemnation and secure his execution. I answered him that, as Jesus was a Galilean, the affair came within Herod's jurisdiction, and ordered Jesus to be sent thither. The wily Tetrarch professed humility, and protracting his defence to the lieutenant of Cæsar, he committed the fate of the man to my hands.

Soon my palace assumed the aspect of a besieged citadel; every moment increased the number of the seditious. Jerusalem was inundated with crowds from the mountains of Nazareth, the towns of Galilee, and the plains of Esdreloth. All Judea appeared to be pouring into that devoted city.

I had taken to wife a girl from among the Gauls, who pretended to see into future. Weeping and throwing herself at my feet, "Beware," said she to me, "beware, and touch not that man, for he is holy. Last night, I saw him in a vision. He was walking on the water—he was flying on the wings of the wind. He spoke to the tempests, to the palm trees, to the fishes of the lake, all were obedient to him. Behold! the torrent of Mount Cedron flows with blood, the statues of Cæsar are sold with the filth of the gemonies; the columns of the Pretorium have given way, and the sun is veiled in mourning like a vestal in the tomb! O, Pilate! evil awaits thee. If thou wilt not listen to the words of thy wife, dread the curses of a Roman Senate, dread the frowns of Cæsar!"

By this time my marble stairs groaned under the weight of the multitude. The Nazarene was brought back to me. I proceeded to the Hall of Justice, followed by my guards, and asked the people in a severe tone, what they demanded? "The death of the Nazarene," was their reply. For what crime? "He has blasphemed; he has prophesied the ruin of the Temple; he calls himself the Son of God, the Messiah, the King of the Jews." Roman justice, said I, punisheth not such offences with death. "Crucify him, crucify him!" shouted forth the relentless rabble.

The vociferations of the infuriate multitude shook the palace to its foundation. One man alone appeared calm in the midst of the tumult. He was like unto the Statue of Innocence placed in the temples of the Eumenides. It was the Nazarene.

After many fruitless attempts to protect him from the fury of his merciless persecutors, I had the baseness to adopt a measure which, at the moment, appeared to me to be the only one that could save his life. I ordered him to be scourged, then, calling for a ewer, I washed my hands in presence of the clamorous multitude, thereby signifying to them my disapprobation of the deed.

But in vain. It was his life that these wretches thirsted after. Often, in our civil commotions, have I witnessed the furious animosity of the multitude; but nothing could ever be compared to what I beheld in the present instance. It might have been truly said that, on this occasion, all the phantoms of the infernal regions had assembled together at Jerusalem. The crowd appeared not to walk; they were borne off and whirled as a vortex, rolling along like living waves, from the portal of the pretorium even unto Mount Zion, with howlings, screams, shrieks and vociferations, such as were never heard either in the seditions of Panonia, or in the tumults of the Forum.

By degrees the day darkened like a winter twilight, such as had been seen at the death of the great Julius Cæsar. It was likewise towards the idee of March. I, the condemned Governor of a rebellious province, was leaning against a column of my basilick, contemplating athwart the dreary gloom, this Theory of Tartarus dragging to execution the innocent Nazarene. All around me was a desert. Jerusalem had vomited forth her indwellers through the funeral gates that lead to the Germonies. An air of desolation and sadness enveloped me. My guard had joined the cavalry, and the Centurion, to display a shadow of power, was endeavoring to maintain order. I was left alone, and my breaking heart admonished me, that what was passing at that moment appertained rather to the history of the gods than to that of man. Loud clamors were heard proceeding from Golgotha, which borne on the winds appeared to announce an agony such as never had been heard by mortal ear. Dark clouds lowered over the pinnacle of the Temple, and their large ruptures settled over the city and covered it as with a veil. So dreadful were the signs that were manifested both in the heavens and on the earth, that Dionysius, the Areopagite, is reported to have exclaimed: "Either the Author of Nature is suffering, or the Universe is falling apart."

Towards the first hour of the night, I threw my mantle around me, and went down into the city towards the gate of Golgotha. The sacrifice had been consummated. The crowd were returning home; still agitated, it is true, but gloomy, sad, taciturn and desperate. What they had witnessed had struck them with terror and remorse. I also saw my little Roman cohort pass by mournfully, the standard bearer having veiled his eagle in token of grief, and I overheard some of the soldiers murmuring strange words which I did not comprehend. Others were recounting prodigies almost similar to those which had so often smote the Romans with dismay by the will of the gods. Sometimes groups of men and women would halt; then, looking back towards Mount Calvary, would remain motionless, in the expectation of witnessing some new prodigy.

I returned to the Pretorium, sad and pensive. On ascending the stair, the steps of which were still stained with the blood of the Nazarene, I perceived an old man in a suppliant posture, and behind him, several women in tears. He threw himself at my feet and wept bitterly. It is painful to see an old man weep. "Father," said I to him mildly, "who are you, and what is your request?" "I am Joseph, of Arimathea," replied he, "and I am come to beg of you, on my knees, the permission to bury Jesus of Nazareth." "Your prayer is granted," said I to him; and, at the same time, ordered Manlius to take some soldiers with him, to superintend the interment, lest it might be profaned. A few days afterwards the sepulchre was found empty. The disciples of Jesus published all over the country that he had risen from the dead, as he had foretold.

A last duty remained for me to perform, it was to communicate to Cæsar the details of this deplorable event. I did it the same night that followed the fatal catastrophe, and had just finished the communication when the day began to dawn.

At that moment, the sound of clarion playing the air of Diana, struck my ear. Casting my eye towards the Cesarean gate, I beheld a troop of soldiers, and heard at a distance, other trumpets sounding Cæsar's march. It was the reinforcement that had been promised me—two thousand chosen men, who, to hasten their arrival had marched all night. "It has then been decreed by the Fates," cried I, wringing my hands, "that the great iniquity should be accomplished—that, for the purpose of averting the deeds of yesterday, troops should arrive today! Cruel destiny, how thou sportest with the affairs of mortals! Alas! it was but too true, what the Nazarene exclaimed when writhing on the cross: All is consummated!"

The Western telegraph companies held a meeting on the 13th inst., although each director remained at his home in Wheeling, Zanesville, Cincinnati, Madison and Louisville. The President, at Pittsburg, took the chair and called the meeting to order, while the Secretary, at Dayton, recorded the proceedings. Motions were made and seconded, and speeches delivered, over the wires, with wonderful pith and point. There were no flowers of rhetoric and no talking for buncombe. Facts and figures were put into very small but compact nut-shells.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1855.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.—Hon. J. Perkins, of Louisiana, for his able speech on the "Consular System of the United States." We are glad to see, by dispatches, that it is allowed. Mr. Perkins' efforts have been judicious and successful, and he has done the country service therein.

MINUTES OF THE LOUISIANA CONFERENCE are before us. The Publishing Committee have sent by mail to each subscriber of the Advocate, within bounds of the Conference, a copy.

A CORRECTION.

COLLEGE HILL, Feb. 20, 1855.

Mr. Editor: In my recent communication there were two errors. Bishop Capers was born at Cain Hoy, St. Thomas Parish, South Carolina, and not in Sumpter, as I stated. Also, his brother John was sixteen years a preacher, though not an Itinerant during the whole time, as he located several years before his death.

Yours, truly. TUSCULUM.

BE A WHOLE MAN.

The late John Joseph Gurney, whose memory is still fragrant among all good people, in writing a short letter of counsel to his sons at school, gave them this sententious injunction: "Be a whole man to every thing. At Latin, be a whole man to Latin; at geometry or history, be a whole man to geometry or history; at play, be a whole man to play; at washing and dressing, be a whole man to washing and dressing; above all, at meeting [i. e., church] be a whole man to worship." Nearly all the differences among men, as to force and influence of character, are to be attributed to the observance or neglect of the spirit of this maxim. A man may have only a thimble full of brains, yet he if he will put them all at the object he has at hand, and only at that, it is wonderful what he will effect. Momentum in physics, properly directed, will drive a tallow candle through an inch board: just so will concentration—being a whole man at whatever one undertakes—cause even a poor washing to leave his mark upon his age. Firemen's Celebration on the Sabbath.

Can it be that this is to come off on next Sabbath? The long and gorgeous procession, with banners and horses, engines and music, to wind through our streets; just at the time, too, when the churches of God should be in worship: all to bring up at the St. Charles Theater, where the orator of the day, M. Foote, is to deliver the address!

The fireman is a nobleman at the beat of the alarm bell. We love to honor him. But is not this community far enough advanced in morals to rebuke such profanity.

Places for the Mayor and Judges of our Courts are provided in the procession!

In these companies are sons of pious parents and those who are or ought to be members of the church. By such parades, the moral are ruled out. This is not the way to improve them.

A poor compromise is offered to the churches, and that sentiment (we hoped it was growing) which builds and fills them, in the item of the advertised programme:

"The bells on the hose carriages of tenders and those attached to engines, shall be muffled while passing any church in which service is going on.

"The aids to the grand marshal and the marshals of the respective companies, are specially directed to require that no band of music be heard within three hundred feet of any church, between the hours of 11 o'clock A. M. and 1 P. M."

First on the programme is the "Davy Crockett Fire Company No. 1." We knew John W. Crockett, son of Davy. He was a popular orator. In 1849 he was elected to deliver this annual address. He accepted; but finding afterwards that the celebration was arranged for Sabbath, he declined. We wish this fact could be posted, for shame, on the engine that is to be hauled through our streets next Sabbath at the head of the impious procession.

A TEMPERANCE SOLDIER.—"I have not slept one night in bed," says a soldier, smiling from the [illegible], "but mostly on the ground, and the deck of a ship; still I am well as ever. I owe it to not drinking. Those who drink are most subject to illness, and those who died were hard drinkers. Water is the best plan here."

Know-Nothingism and Methodism.

Under this head, the Courier, of February 25th, (the official Journal of Louisiana,) makes the following editorial remarks:

"We were as much pained as surprised to hear, through undoubted authority, that at the late session of a Methodist Conference, held at Jackson, in this State, two entire days, out of a session of four, were taken up in initiating circuit riders into the new order. And we have also been informed, on most respectable authority, that, on the occasion of an election for District Judge, the most active partisans on the day of election, and those who were the most conspicuous in the distribution of tickets for the so called American candidate, were the professors and president of the Centenary College, an institution under the direction of the Methodist Church.

"From various other parts of Louisiana and the South we have learned, also, that many Methodist preachers are conspicuous for their zeal in behalf of the new order."

The Courier's "undoubted authority" should have been doubted. It is more than doubtful: it is palpably incorrect. The Mississippi Conference met in Jackson, La., November 8, and adjourned on the 15th. A session of eight days, instead of four!

The very respectful style in which the Methodist ministers of Mississippi are alluded to hardly disguises the sympathies of the Courier towards that large and respectable body of Protestant Christians. "Two entire days, out of a session of four, were taken up in initiating circuit riders!" We were there. Not one day, nor one hour, nor one minute was so "taken up." It is a sheer fabrication.

A few meetings of the "Social Circle," a temperance promoting organization, were held at intervals of the Conference sessions. Some of the ministers may have been initiated into that order.

Touching the judgeship, the "respectable authority" of the Courier will turn out, on scrutiny, to be on a par with its "undoubted authority." Either of the candidates was worthy of the office, and would have been an honor to it. Both could not be elected. The defeated gentleman was a worthy Methodist, a trustee of Centenary College, and one of its executive committee. The college, at the time, was without a president. He could not, therefore, have been "conspicuous in the distribution of tickets for the so called American candidate."

What the professors did, we do not know. As they are gentlemen, and have character for judicious conduct, we presume they did not forfeit it; and as they are free men and citizens, they doubtless cast their votes, and feel under no obligations to render to the public an account of the same.

An esteemed professor in the college (we do not know whether he is now connected with it) is a foreigner by birth. The address of last commencement was delivered by the Hon. Mr. Roselius, who, we believe, was not born to this manor, though an honor to it.

Do not these facts present the college in a different light from that in which the Courier seeks to place it? Is there a motive in this studied and outrageous misrepresentation?

We call upon the Courier to correct its statements and withdraw the charges based upon them.

If what the Courier has learned from "various other parts of Louisiana and the South" be on the same authority quoted, it needs no answer.

We are not a Know Nothing—have never been. But ministers and members of the Methodist Church and professors of colleges have a right to do as they please in such matters. And it is neither right or legitimate for the Church, as such, and its institutions, to be placed in a false position for what individuals do in their citizen capacity. The Methodist Church is neither Whig or Democratic—though its ministers and members are both. It is neither native or American. It is not Know-Nothing, save in the sense of knowing nothing but Christ, and him crucified. And this it is determined to do.

I WILL THROW IN MY MITE.

And down falls into the plate a half-dime, a venturesome quarter, or perhaps this new "church money," with its star, reminding us of the wise men. This mite excuse is a very common one, because supposedly fortified by Scripture; but such is not the case, for the poor widow threw in "two mites." So, Mr. Smith, we shall expect hereafter double your usual offering. But, to carry out this mite principle, we must further remember she gave of her penury, if not the whole, at least a part of her means of livelihood, while the much larger gifts of the rich men, being merely from their abundance, were actually less, according to ability, than hers. Now, Mr. Smith, suppose you imitate the widow, not only in the two mites, but in the giving from your penury, or even from moderate self-denial; why, the silver mites would blush into gold. Oh, how little this is understood! How few dispense occasionally with desert that the church may have bread! And there is no immediate prospect of this mite system being shamed away, unless, indeed, the information reach us that one of our clergy came to his death through insufficient food or clothing. Such an event, read of at our breakfast tables, would rouse our members "to take some means whereby they that preach the Gospel should not starve of the Gospel."—W. C. Advocate.

NASHVILLE CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR—We are not yet afloat at the Publishing House—that is to say, our presses are not yet at work, for the best of all reasons, they have not reached us yet. This is not because of the low stage of water in the Ohio and Cumberland rivers, but because of some detention between New York and Savannah and Savannah and Nashville.

We are getting ready, slowly but surely, for extensive operations. The late amicable adjustment of the property question in Cincinnati gives us some reviving; it is peculiarly refreshing to the agents, who will be able to meet some heavy liabilities in Louisville, Cincinnati, and further east. The $80,000 which we are to receive from this settlement is indeed only available in part at the present time, in consequence of the "tightness" of the money market; but our agents have made arrangements for the supply of our house with all those works of the New York and Cincinnati catalogues which we may need, and which, in the nature of the case, we shall not be able to manufacture ourselves for some time to come.

Dr. Green returned on yesterday from Cincinnati, and reports to us the proceedings of the Northern and Southern commissioners and agents in the settlement of the vexed question. It is a matter of great gratification and cause of profound gratitude to be able to state that the spirit which prevailed in the New York case prevailed also in the Cincinnati settlement.

Your readers have been already advised of the meeting of the Bishops and Board of Managers of the Missionary Society to be held in this city, April 16. We anticipate a jubilee meeting, and hope that none of the Bishops, Assistant Treasurers, &c., will be absent.

We held a meeting at the Publishing House on Monday last, on the occasion of the death of our excellent Bishop, Dr. Capers. Suitable resolutions were adopted, and among them one requesting Bishop Soule to preach a sermon commemorative of his deceased colleague, on the Sunday before the meeting of the Missionary Board, viz., on April 15.

On yesterday the editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate and your correspondent waited on Bishop Soule, who resides seven miles from Nashville, to communicate to him the wishes of his brethren in regard to the appointment. We found the venerable man in pretty good health and fine spirits. He told us he preached on Sunday last in a small chapel near his residence, but felt himself unable to assume the responsibility of preaching the funeral sermon of Bishop Capers. He selected as his substitute the very man that everybody else would have selected, Bishop Pierce, who we doubt not will give us a discourse worthy of the occasion.

The cold weather in Nashville has almost made me wish the Publishing House were located in New Orleans or Texas, but the General Conference voted to have a book concern proper, and to have it in Nashville, and we pledged ourselves not to breathe a breath against it after its location. So, as I am on my good behavior, bound over to keep the peace, I must not say a word about cold weather, low water, or anything else, but do all in my power to make the publishing House at Nashville what the wants of the connection and the country demand.

By the way, Dr. Hamilton is initiating the tract cause in a way which argues well for its prosperous development. What a mighty machinery is thus set in motion. I wish you would tell our wealthy members that in this organization they may find safe investment for those funds of which a strict account will be given when every man's stewardship will pass in review before the great Proprietor—the mighty Lord of all.

MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY.

The tenth anniversary meeting of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, will be held in the city of Nashville, on the third Monday of April next.

On the Sabbath preceding the anniversary missionary sermons will be preached in all the Methodist churches of the city, morning and night.

On Monday, at 3 P. M., a public missionary prayer meeting will be held in one of the churches.

At 7 P. M. the anniversary meeting will be held in McKendree's chapel. After which the annual election of officers for the ensuing year will take place.

It is confidently looked to and expected to be a season of great interest, from the fact that it will be the organization of the Society in Nashville, and the Bishops of the Church, with all the officers of the Society, and many ministers from abroad and resident in the city are expected to be in attendance.

Each of the Assistant Treasurers, Rev. D. R. McAnally, of St. Louis; Rev. H. N. McTyeire, of New Orleans; and Rev. E. H. Myers, of Charleston; and Rev. Dr. Charles Taylor, Missionary to China, are expected, and are hereby earnestly and respectfully requested to be present.

Let the prayers of the whole Church go up to the God of missions for his blessing to rest upon us at our proposed meeting.

E. W. SEHON, Miss. Sec'y.

The Churches.

M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.—The three commissioners on the part of the M. E. Church, South, were lately in Cincinnati, on business connected with the transfer of their portion of the book concern and funds allowed them under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States last year.

The Texas Annual Conference, at its recent session, at Chappell Hill, determined to take immediate steps towards the establishment of an institution of learning of high grade, one that will rank with the best colleges in the land, and appointed a committee to select a site for said institution on the 1st of April next. The committee will meet in the city of Galveston, at the time designated, up to which period proposals will be received from the citizens of places asking for the location of such an institution in their midst.

The Texas Advocate well remarks that this is one of the most important enterprises in hand. We trust they have not too much else on hand to prevent its being carried through. There are advantages in Texas in establishing such an institution not possessed by other sections of the Church in the commencement of similar institutions. They waited until the youth of the country had passed away, and land and everything else had become expensive. Be, friends, be wise through the mistakes of others. Precedents are not the least of your advantages. Don't attempt to escape the evil in the world by getting out of it. Health, and the absence of dram-shops are well enough. But these do not determine eligibility. Get on a thoroughfare—even the most traveled. A college on a hill may be hid. Be sure of your money, and enough of it; but a bad, out-of-the-way location is dear at any price. A railroad, or navigable stream, or turnpike, is half an endowment.

The Rev. John F. Rives has resigned the Presidency of the Wesleyan Female Institute, at Jackson, Miss.

Lagrange College, Florence, Ala., opened Feb. 21st, with ninety-five students—the largest number since the foundation of the old College: nearly all the former students and every senior but one adhered. The trustees of Lagrange, on the mountain, do not concur in the removal, and have elected a Cumberland Presbyterian President, and other faculty.

M. E. CHURCH.—At a late meeting of the Bishops, in Baltimore, the question of the episcopal supervision of missions was brought to their notice and was carefully considered. It was unanimously judged best to distribute the supervision of the missions among the bishops generally, committing each mission or class of missions to one bishop, that he might give his whole attention, in this respect, to the particular missionary interest committed to him. This distribution of the episcopal supervision of missions is very advantageous, as it will concentrate the knowledge and correspondence of each particular mission, as far as its episcopal supervision is concerned, in the hands of the bishop who has charge of it.

The distribution is as follows, namely:

1. China, Bishop Waugh.
2. Africa, Bishop Scott.
3. Western Europe, Bishop Morris.
4. Pacific Coast and Islands, Bishop Baker.
5. India and Turkey, Bishop Simpson.
6. Spanish Missions, Bishop Ames.
7. Indian Missions, Bishop Janes.

A premium of $600 is offered for the best tract on systematic beneficence, with particular reference to the peculiarities of the M. E. Church, to be given, at the discretion of the adjudicators, in one sum, or, should three essays be selected, in sums of $300, $200, and $100, respectively. All manuscripts to be directed, post paid, to "the Committee on the Prize Tract Essay, No. 200 Mulberry street, New York city," each accompanied by a sealed envelop, containing the name and address of the writer, which shall be opened in no case except where the prize may be awarded.

The Western Advocate says of missionary contributions:

On comparing the contributions of the year 1820 with the year 1854, we find quite an advance. In 1820 the proportion was three-tenths of a cent; in 1854 it was twenty-nine and two-tenths average per member: or, in other words, the contributions of 1854, per member, were ninety-seven times as much as those in 1820; for in the year 1820 the whole sum contributed was $823, with a membership of 250,881; in 1854 the contributions were $229,049, with a membership of 783,358.

Bringing Up the Rear.

THE CATHOLIC INSTITUTE.

The Papal policy is to fight against the instruments of popular progress and enlightenment. If it cannot put down, then it uses them. So of education, so of the press, and so of public discussion.

It is amusing to those who think, and wonderful to those who look on without thinking, to see them bringing up the rear in every great movement, riding on horses they have before lamed.

Where Romanists have sway, the masses are kept in ignorance. In America, overrun by the noble public school system, who so zealous for education as they?

The press is muzzled; the censorship of newspapers amounts to prohibition, where they can do it. But Adams's patent press and Hoe's cylinder wait not for Romish baptism. They fling off sheets of intelligence by thousands in the hour! Every denomination has its organ, every village its medium. Now the "faithful" begin to be indulged, here and there, with a thumb-paper, in which "nothing is published that is not first submitted to the Bishop."

The Southern Journal, the organ of Romanism in these parts, has a thousand subscribers. It is published every Sunday! The last number says:

"The question whether a Catholic paper could be started in New Orleans after the failure of the Messenger having been affirmed by the year's existence of the Journal, another query remains to be [illegible] to the Catholics of New Orleans and the South-Western States: Will it be possible to continue the paper, which has been started? In other words, are the Catholics of this section prepared and resolved to support a journal among them having in view the advancement of Catholic principles?"

Now for the moral hustings. They have come before the people at last. Lectures have come to be considered "a power." After long and sullen silence, ignoring the platform and anathematizing its heretical mouthpieces, they are on the boards. The "Catholic Instituto" holds its meetings in Armory Hall on Sunday nights; price of admission, 50 cents. We take this advertisement from the Southern Journal of last Sunday morning. We give it one insertion gratis:

"The Third lecture of the season will be delivered before the Institute at Armory Hall this evening, at half-past 7 o'clock, by T. J. Semmes, Esq. Subject—'The Harmony between the Spiritual and the Civil Obligations of Catholics.'

"Tickets 50 cents, to admit a gentleman and two ladies. Members free. Members are requested to call for their tickets on

G. W. BYRNE, Treasurer, corner Poydras and Commerce streets."

The first lecture was by Father Perche, on the moral and social benefits of the last article of the Creed, the immaculate conception of Mary. A friend, whose curiosity overcame his Sabbath scruples, attended, and gave us, on the Monday following, a queer account. The main idea of the lecturer was, that the Catholic world needed a new stimulus—something to wake up the faithful; and this would do it.

Mr. Semmes is a young lawyer of promise and position in this city. His talents, legal tact and educational familiarity with his subject were all needed for the "Harmony." We have not heard whether he succeeded in establishing it.

Explanation of the Former Book Agent.

We feel it due to the former Book Agent to make the following letter we have received from him as public as the semi-official document it refers to. Audi alteram partem.

LYNCHBURG, VA., Feb. 15, 1855.

My Dear Brother—Don't be alarmed for the Book Agent of 1846-'54, though the Agents and Book Committee have thrown our friends, Dr. Hamilton and Rev. J. E. Evans, of Georgia, between them and the discontents at New Orleans, Galveston, &c.

The Book Committee had my report and balance sheet before them for twenty-six days of the General Conference; never asked for an explanation, and reported my accounts correct.

Now the Board, as they call the Agents and Book Committee, meet and make an expose that implicates me, giving me no notice, from exparte representations, and, I think, even in the absence of my books, which would have explained everything.

They tell the world that I reported $70,000 and $17,051 once, and then merged both sums again. Whereas I reported $70,000 in the general report, which, instead of making my assets as they would have been without on the 20th March, 1855, $48,000 and odd, $118,000 and odd.

The $17,051 was reported in a separate item, named in April as on hand, separated from all other funds, and as such were paid over to the Agents. I also paid the $30,197 in bills, notes, &c., as well as the $17,051 in money or drafts due in a few days; leaving all the funds due at Richmond, Louisville and Charleston in their hands. This shall all be explained, and that as wide as these uncalled for imputations.

Heaven bless you and yours.

Yours, truly, JOHN EARLY.

To Rev. H. N. McTyeire, New Orleans.

Conference Vindication.

"The Louisiana Conference of the Methodist Church, to whom we looked with some interest to take a decided and efficient course of action relative to the curse of intemperance in our State, have again slurred over this important measure, and have done nothing that will aid and give success to the temperance work."

[Southern Organ, Feb. 19.

So charges our cotemporary of this city. In his zeal for a good cause he says hard things of a body of good men. "Again slurred"—"done nothing!"

The Conference may not take hold of the subject by the same handle with the Organ. It has its own way; but ought not for that to be published after this sort to the world. Methodist Conferences have always been for temperance, and sometimes teetotalism. We send our excellent friend a copy of the minutes of the Louisiana Conference. He will correct his statement on reading this:

"Resolved, That we endorse the rules and sentiments of our Discipline on the subject of temperance, and our preachers be requested to preach once during the year upon the subject, presenting it as set forth in the Methodist Discipline and in the Holy Scriptures."

Reinforcements.

Rev. Oscar F. Fitzgerald and wife, of Georgia, and Rev. J. C. Stuart of Alabama Conference, sailed in steamship Prometheus, Wednesday morning, 1st inst., for California. They will be an accession of strength to the Pacific Conference.

W. S. Monat, Esq., returned by the Webster, Wednesday night. He brings good tidings of the Southern Church. It is needed in California, and will live and go on to increase. We rely on his judgment, and its altogether favorable.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

A NEW PLAN OF GETTING RECRUITS.

What is that? Well, it is not by preaching Christ, nor is it by warning sinners to flee the wrath to come; neither is it by the promise of a life of heavenly felicity, as the reward of the faithful. No, these are old fashioned methods, used by the Apostles; but their successors(!) have found a new plan, and they are so well pleased with it that they have well nigh abandoned the old.

What is this new plan? I will tell you, and leave you to judge of its excellencies.

It is simply this: The preacher is to visit in those families where he has most reason to hope for success on this plan, and in doing so he must not refuse to drink a little wine, and to add his testimony in favor of its use; and, moreover, he must take care to let it be known that he thinks there is no harm in dancing—no, it is a very genteel and innocent amusement!

After this his members can make similar visits, and talk and act in the same manner, only with a little more freedom, and keep a sharp look out, and whenever they find a poor backslidden, prayerless church member, who has been dancing, or is inclined to dance, but hesitates to do so because it is against the rules of his church, they must tell him "there is no harm in dancing; it is far better than the talk indulged at conversational parties; and besides, if you wish to dance, come and join our church, and you can dance as much as you please."

To this there must be added something about "Puritanism" and "Methodist fanaticism," and a word about the intolerable annoyance of "class meetings, and the superior freedom that is to be enjoyed in our Church."

And, lastly, it is well to dwell at large upon the pleasures and enjoyments of a fashionable life, and to declare plainly that there is nothing in rational piety which is in the least degree opposed to those pleasures. This is the plan; and, if properly followed out, success is certain, if those who try it are careful only to select the prayerless, backslidden, graceless, vain and worldly-minded as their subjects.

But it may be objected to this new plan that it is not scriptural and apostolic. True; but the plan works well. Again, it may be objected that those whom you catch on this plan are not worth gaining—at least they will only be such as the Apostle alludes to in Timothy, 2:6, and that all such will take far more pleasure in dancing, and dram-drinking, and theatre-going than they will in the worship of God. And, moreover, such are not the right people to build up a spiritual church, and bless it by their pure and godly lives, and make it efficient in saving sinners from the wrath to come. They are not the people who will go often to the throne of grace, and by their earnest and whole-hearted pleadings bring down the blessing of God upon his Church. And besides all this, the objector may say, "I don't like to make our Church the lowest platform on which a man can fall; or, in other words, I don't like to make it a place of refuge, the 'Botany Bay' to which the unfaithful and graceless shall flee as to a fitting home."

This may all be true. But the necessities of the Church are great; she needs members, she needs them badly, and we are not at liberty to be over-scrupulous in the means which we use to build up the Church. Remember the old proverb, "beggars cannot be choosers."

Your readers now have the new plan of recruiting church members, and I leave them to decide whether the excuses urged for its adoption are satisfactory. I will only add, I honestly believe the plan has been in some degree successful in some localities. J.

SUCCESSOR OF LONGFELLOW.—James Russell Lowell, the poet, has been elected to succeed Prof. Longfellow in Harvard University, as Professor of Modern Languages and Belles Lettres. There were five applicants for the place, but Lowell was not one of them, and his nomination was made without his knowledge. He will accept the appointment, but, before entering upon its duties, he will spend a year abroad, in Germany and Spain.

NAMES.—Emma is from the German, and signifies a nurse; Caroline, noble-minded; George, from the Greek, a farmer; Martha, from Hebrew, bitterness; the beautiful and common Mary is Hebrew, and means a drop of salt water, a tear; Sophia, from Greek, wisdom; Susan, from Hebrew, a lily; Thomas, from Hebrew, a twin; Robert, from the German, famous in council.

WHAT IT COSTS TO DRESS AN AMERICAN LADY.—A female writer in the Home Journal, in reply to the question, "What does it cost to dress a lady?" says that $1,000 a year spent very carefully by a person who goes out much would prove insufficient; that $2,000 is nearer the average, without including the furs and jewelry, and that $3,000 or $4,000 could be spent very easily when Russian sables and diamonds were brought into question. Another correspondent of the same paper says she knows a lady, moving in the best society, who dresses for $75 a year.

GERMANY ON SMOKING.—The question of tobacco smoking having come before the conference of Baptist churches at Hamburg, Germany, it was unanimously resolved "that this assembly declare the use of tobacco to be one of the things specified by the Apostle (Rom. xiv.) as belonging to Christian liberty." What do they say about puffing the smoke of villainous cigars in people's faces who do not smoke? That is something else than Christian liberty.

SKYLARKING. NO. 2.

We have always had a wholesome horror of high places; and although one may every now and then behold the spectacle of a dizzy height, occupied upon a most insecure footing, yet (we fain hope) become so accustomed to it as not to regard it among the most fearful of predicaments, physically or otherwise.

Stimulated, however, by more than one illustrious example, and relying implicitly upon the skill and experience of M. Eugene Godard, whose skill which has already acquired a world-wide celebrity, we, on the afternoon of Tuesday last, embarked with that famous gentleman on his 230th voyage towards the celestial regions.

Most persons will readily understand that looking at a balloon from the earth is a matter somewhat different from looking at the earth from a balloon. In the latter case, one experiences the reality of a translation to another sphere, and finds himself suddenly out of the world, enjoying another and much higher state of existence. This occurs too, so suddenly that one has hardly time to understand his own sensations, much less to analyze or define them. We did not, as we rose into the air, experience the sensation of ascending, but felt precisely as while leaving the earth, as if that useful globe were sinking away from us—down, down, down, "some infernal centre." It appeared to be very much as if the earth had hitherto derived its support from our balloon, and now that connection, or co-partnership, was dissolved, was sliding helplessly away into fathomless space. We were consoled, however, by the assurance, derived from reasons of natural philosophy, that, should anything serious happen to our balloon, in they way of a collapse or explosion, the friendly planet with which we had been so long acquainted, would return immediately to our assistance with all proper speed.

Although the wind had risen at the time of our departure, (5 o'clock,) we found the calm a few hundred feet above, and for some time we ascended almost vertically. Square below us, with its throngs of men, women, became reduced in appearance to the dimensions of some of our blanket-sheet changes, say the St. Louis Republican or New York Courier and Enquirer; the lofty steeple of the Cathedral dwindled to an indistinguishable point, and Jackson Square, in front of it, looked like a Liliputian play-ground attached to a Liliputian mansion. The whole city, as if by a sudden stroke of magic, seemed to spread out beneath us. Its public buildings, public squares, its broadest streets and its scurest alleys, its basins, canals, swamp improvements, etc., all could be comprehended with a single glance of the eye, and all appeared to have been reduced to exceedingly narrow limits. When we had arrived at a point directly above the head of the New Basin, we arose above the current of air which bore us hither and remained stationary for a short time. Looking down here upon the space between Julia and St. Joseph streets, it appeared no broader than a man's hand, and the canal seemed only calculated to float the boats of very small children.

Towards the northwest the eye could trace the Mississippi river through all its windings, a distance almost incredible for human vision on the north appeared the waters of Lake Pontchartrain, and far away in the southwest [illegible] ed up the Gulf of Mexico, covered with clouds and mist. In that direction lies Cuba, but we couldn't see it, although we looked anxiously, as requested by a filibustering friend, who had lately been troubled with apprehensions for its safety. Sitting at our ease in the cushioned car, we gazed upwards at the frail globe of silk which held us suspended thousands of feet in the air, and then down upon the paved streets and the inhospitable roofs of slate—and, we must confess that uncomfortable speculations upon the consequences of a fall so tremendous, should occur, would intrude upon our meditations. The parting of a seam, the breaking of a thread of the fairy like net-work, might afford a practical illustration of our most horrible dreams of tumbling from high places.

Discharging a bag of ballast, we bore rapidly to the height of about six thousand feet, and sailed away towards Carrollton; clouds began to gather around us, and the air became [illegible] with snow, but we remarked that the temperature of the atmosphere was not uncomfortably low. Our flight in this direction would soon have taken us across the Mississippi and into the interminable swamps beyond. Not caring to repeat his former experience of this sort, Godard pulled the valve string, and in a few moments we landed easily and safely in an open common, just above Bouligny. A crowd of all sorts of people assisted in holding us down when we reached the earth, and after discharging our gas and packing up our balloon, we accompanied Mr. Charles Chapotin and M. Julsa Buiseon to the dwelling of the former where we were entertained in the most kind and hospitable manner.

For compassions upon this most interesting excursion we had, besides M. Godard, Mr. Hopkins, of the Delta, and Mr. John McFarland, Deputy Street Commissioner, who were pressed up mainly for the purpose of improving his acquaintance with the geography of New Orleans. [Crescent.

DEATHS.

DIED.—At her residence in the city of Mobile, after a short and painful illness, MRS ANN QUARLES, consort of Dr. Quarles, in the fifty-third year of her age.

The deceased was a native of England, but for many years a resident of this city, where she was well and favorably known. She was married to Dr. Quarles in 1848, having been widow for several years, and up to that time a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Immediately after her marriage she united herself with the Franklin Street Methodist Church, of which her husband became a member; and in each of these relations exhibited a department perfectly consistent with her professions of piety. She was remarkable for her regular and constant attendance at the sanctuary; the prayer and class meetings shared alike with the public worship on the Sabbath in her devotions, and her demeanor while there was singularly devout. Although educated and accustomed to the usages of a denominntion differing widely from our simple and unostentatious services, and often opposed to the social and spiritual exercises of some of our assemblies, yet Sister Quarles embraced these means of grace with a degree of ardor and devotion that showed most clearly that her religion was one of experience, and her piety deep and genuine.

She sickened and died during the late session of the Alabama Conference, when her pastor was necessarily absent. He would have esteemed it a privilege, as well as a duty, to have been frequently by her bedside, but this was denied him. He well recollects the warm and unaffected welcome, the cheerful gratitude and piety that always met him whenever he crossed the threshold, and the faithfulness she always evinced for his return. And notwithstanding her high estimate of such attentions, she was never heard to complain of neglect, but often to apologize if the time between his calls was longer than usual. In a word, she was a woman with whom deep piety and a sound practical knowledge of life and its duties were singularly combined. Such an one, of course, would live right, and such an one would also he expected to die right. And thus died our much lamented sister. She died in the Lord! She has left behind her a small family, her husband and daughter: the latter has since followed, and now no doubt rests with the mother in the bosom of God, while the husband, lingering, waite upon the margin, and we must cross the stream that separates us from them.

T. W. D.

Mobile, February, 1855.

DIED.—In the city of New Orleans, January 26, MRS. NANCY M. BARTLETT, consort of H. C. Bartlett, of Ouachita parish, Louisiana. She was born in this parish, May, 1805, professed religion and joined the M. E. Church in her thirteenth year, was united in marriage to H. C. Bartlett in 1826, with whom she lived in affectionate bonds till death severed them.

Her religion was intelligent, consistent, of the heart and of the life. She fully understood the way of life, the method of a sinner's acceptance with God. She built upon the rock of Christ, and felt the force of that Scripture which says, "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Her loss is deeply and keenly felt by every member of society with which she was connected. Sister B. was ever ready to perform office of kindness among neighbors. She was a faithful wife, an affectionate mother, and a devoted Christian. Indeed, it is not saying much when we say that she was eminent in all of these.

She weary itinerant was ever welcome to her fireside, and cheered by her hospitalities. Even in her house were they called to preach the Word, and mingle their voices in prayer and praise. Her fond tenderness and cheerful humor rendered her the delight of the household. Kind, gentle and attentive to the duties of her family, her house was the house of peace.

She seemed to feel herself most identified with those bearing the cross for Christ's sake, and laboring for the conversion of precious souls, and she delighted to hear from them of their triple and success. She loved the Methodist Church and its doctrines, and she died as she had lived, in unshaken confidence in her Saviour, and in full hope of a blissful immortality.

A few hours prior to her departure she asked "if her confidence in God was unshaken?" "Yes," she replied, with great emphasis, "unshaken;" and after a little exclaimed, in the language of the immortal Wesley, "The best of all is, God is with me." "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless and praise his holy name!" To her death had no terrors, and was accompanied with no agonies, no violent struggles. Her mind was clear and unimpaired to the last. Conscious of everything passing around and within her, and sensible she was sinking into the embrace of death, she awaited her change with calm composure and unfaltering faith in the Saviour. She gently fell asleep in Jesus, as the weary traveler sinks to rest when his journey's done. The sun of life went down undimmed even by a passing cloud, reflecting as it descended the golden light of religious hope. And now—

"Her toils are past, her work is done,
And she is fully blest;
She fought the fight, the victory won,
And entered into rest."

Her remains were interred in the family grave yard, in presence of a large assembly of weeping relations and friends.

REYNOLDS TRIPPETT.

Ouachita parish, La., February 6, 1855.

The Ouachita Register will please copy.

REBECCA J. NONWOOD, the subject of this brief notice, was born March 3, 1838, and died February 2, 1855, living in her seventeenth year.

The circumstances of her death were most melancholy. She was a student of the Centennry Institute, a member of the junior class, and being a pupil in French went up with her class to recite, and the Professor having stepped out a moment, she went to the fire and was standing with her back to it, when suddenly her clothes were all in a light blaze. She became alarmed, tore away from her companions, who were trying to extinguish it, and rushed down stairs, falling at the foot of the staircase. Several of the young ladies and one or two of the professors gathered around her, and by means of their shawls, a bucket of water, &c., the fire was soon extinguished: but the fright, the fall and the burn were too much for her; the system never could be got to react. After lingering about three days, she was released from her sufferings, and went to her long, long home.

Rebecca was a lovely girl. She was remarkable for her cheerfulness and animation, a general favorite among her companions, and beloved by all who knew her. She was a good student, and endeared herself greatly to her teachers. She had been religiously brought up, but had never attached herself to the Church; frequently spoke of it, however, and no doubt fully intended to die a member of the same. After her injury, but little was said to her, for she was not in a situation to receive it. Every effort was made that skill and kindness could suggest to prolong her stay; but death had marked her for his victim, and young, gay and hopeful as she was, she is gone to the grave and the retributions of eternity. "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out." With what tremendous force does this call fall upon our ears: "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

A. H. MITCHELL.

DIED.—Of erysipelas, on the 13th of December last, in the parish of Claiborne, La., MARY ANN KIDD, wife of Ihrey Willis Kidd, in the fifty-fourth year of her age. She was born and reared in Edgfield District, S. C. After marriage she resided in Shelby county, Ala., near thirty years since, and had but recently removed to Louisiana at the time of her death. Her parents, Thomas and Elizabeth Key, were Methodists, and early in life she imbibed the doctrines of that Church, by which, in her spiritual exercises, she was guided through life.

In all the relations of life her walk was of the most exemplary character, and conferred honor upon our common humanity, while her death is mourned, on account of the loss to them, by a wide circle of relntives and friends.

DIED.—In Clarke county, Ala., Novemher 22d, 1854, ROBERT B. DAVIS. He was born October 8, 1809, in Marion District, S. C. He emigrated with his parents to Alabama at fourteen, and settled in Baldwin county. He embraced religion when quite young, and joined the M. E. Church, but hy moving, &c., he got out of the Church, and lost the enjoyment of God's love. He was reclaimed and rejoined the Church in 1848, and in her communion lived until God removed him to the church above. He was one of the best men I ever knew. He was an efficient steward, and did much for the temporal interests of the Church. He had a warm and benevolent soul; his house was the home of the wayworn pilgrim; he was an affectionate and tender husband, a kind and loving father, a merciful master, a quiet and good citizen, a gentleman and a Christian.

T. Y. ARMSTRONG.

DIED.—January 26th, in Fort Gaines, Ga., MAJOR JAS. P. HOLMES, aged fifty-nine years. For more than thirty years he was a member of the Church. In all the relations of life it was the first great principle of his heart to live a Christian; and his inspiring hope was to die a witness for the truth of the gospel of Jesus. In the latter he was not disappointed.

DIED.—In New Iberia, on the 13th of February, MAJOR S. W. WADE, aged about fifty-one years.

DIED,—On the 21st February, on the passage from Galveston to this city, HENRY C. TRUMBULL, Esq, aged thirty-five years. Mr. Trumbull was a native of Hartford, Ct., and son of ex-Governor Trumbull, of that State, and grandson of the great patriot and painter of that name, of Revolutionary memory.

DIED.—At the residence of R. H. Powell, Chinnenuggee, Ala., on the morning of the 3d February, in the 33d year of his age, COL. JAMES BLACKMAN. Col. Blackman was born at Monroe, Walton county, Ga., on the 21st of November, 1822. He met death with great composure, confidently relying upon the merits of his blessed Redeemer, and left to his friends the pleasing reflection that "their loss was his eternal gain."

DIED—In Montgomery county, Ala., ANNIS MCGEHEE, on the 18th of February, an old and influential citizen. Few men have been so long and well known in that community.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ORIZABA.

The steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived on Monday morning from Vera Cruz, bringing dates from that place to the 22d and from the City of Mexico to the 17th inst. Her lists of passengers and consignees will be found in another column.

El Heraldo of the 11th inst. contains the message of His Serene Highness, Santa Anna, upon the occasion of his re-election to the Presidency of the Republic. It is, we doubt not, eloquent as need be. We have only taken a glance at the first column, the substance of which is that he has been again, and for the third time, elected Chief of the Mexican people, and that he accepts the office merely from gratitude, deliccy and patriotism, that these are not vain words, etc., etc. In the meantime they celebrate the event by firing cannons and rockets, ringing and chiming the bells, and all those who are allowed to speak, sing Illeluiahs to His Serene Highness. Notwithstanding there appears to be no lack of those who think that His Sersne Highness is not the best possible head for the Mexican nation, and while they call themselves liberators and patriots, the Government and the army hunt them like bandits. They are particularly plenty in the South, and it would seem rather difficult to reduce them effectually; for, though the papers are full of victories gained over them by the troops, who are said to have routed and almost annihilated them, yet the next are sure to reproduce these same incarnate fellows, alive and sound in a new quarter, to be again beaten, routed, dispersed, etc., etc.

Gen. Woll has been called by his Highness to the City of Mexico to be entrusted with an important and secret mission. He left his command on the northern frontier to Gen. Diaz de la Vega. It consists of 8000 men, besides the Army of Observation to be stationed in Queretaro and San Luis Potosi.

Baron Humboldt has lately received the cross of Guadalupe from his Serene Highness, as a token of Mexican gratitude and indebtedness to him. (?) The Baron is too fond of stare to refuse any, though they should be but catellites. So he took it with thanks.

The insurgente muet be rather strong in Zacatecas, and troops missing, as appears from a late Vera Cruz paper. The Governor of that State has told those who have anything worth keeping—Mexicans and foreigners—to defend them as they best could.

WAS TO THE KNIFE!—An order has just been issued from the Prefecture of Puebla requesting everybody to arm for the utter destruction of the locusts or lobsters (all the same in Mexican parlance) that ravage the country.

This le all in the way of news we have been able to obtain from our files, which teem with orders, reports, laws, etc. etc., from the various departments of the government, utterly void of interest to American readers.

Later from Texas.

BY THE STEAMSHIP LOUISIANA.

The steamship Louisiana, Capt. Talbot, arrived from Galveston, bringing dates to the 22d inst.

We learn from the Galveston News that the schooner Major Barbone had struck on Aransas Bar, and only escaped destruction by throwing overboard a portion of her cargo. The schooner Martha Jane from this city, went ashore three miles above the same place and was totally lost.

A letter from Fredericksburg, dated February 7, in the San Antonio Texan, states that the Indians in that section have recently committed the most diarlag outreges, stealing horses, wantonly killing cattle, and finally shedding human blood. On Saturday, the 3d inst., a German named Ferch, working in the woods, was murdered by Indians. They concealed his body in a thicket, where it was found, stripped and literally filled with arrows. On the 5th, an old man named Thos. Noel, the father of a large family, while on his way home from Fredericksburg, was attacked and killed by a band of Indians, who took his horse and clothes and left him lying near the road. A company of men had started in pursuit of the marauders.

The Matagorda Chronicle of the Times gives an account of the brutal and obscene mutilation of a negro belonging to Capt. W. S. Baker, of Matagorda county. The perpetrator of the inhuman deed was unknown.

NINE DAYS LATER FROM HAVANA.

The United States mail steamship Crescent City, Capt John McGowan commanding, arrived at her wharf Tuesday afternoon bringing seven days latar intelligence from San Francisco, nine days later from Havana, and a fortnight later from China.

The Crescent City left New York at 2 P. M., of the 17th, for New Orleans via Havana, at which port she arrived at anoring of the 23d inst., and sailed for this port at noon of the 24th.

United States mail steamship El Dorado arrived at Havana at sunrise of the 24th, bringing the mails and passengers which left San Francisco per John L. Stephens on the 1st inst., and would sail from Havana for Aspinwall on the 26th.

The United States mail steamer Empire City sailed for New York at 10 a. m., of the 24th.

The Crescent City brings 135 passengers and a full cargo for New Orleans.

In Havana the weather was delightfully mild and agreeable.

Since leaving Havana the Crescent City has experienced strong head winds and head seas.

We are unable to find any matters of special interest or importance in our Havana exchanges. The Government continues to organize new troops throughout the island for its defense against the lawless efforts of the filibusters. The Diario remarks that the enthusiasm for enlistment was particularly great, especially at Cardenas.

All the places on the shore where any possible landing could be effected are carefully watched by volunteer troops.

Gen. Concha has appointed Count Fernandino to the Ordenslay of a regiment of volunteers raised in Havana.

A great many persons of rank, wealth and influence have offered their services to the Government, asking to be enlisted, and to be allowed to enlist and equip others at their expense. The pressing want is cavalry, but none of the Dons seem desirous to occupy that department. About 80 had been, with difficulty, gathered together, with horses of the most sorry description.

M. Doudrlas, the great horizontal aeronaut of this city and Mobile, had arrived in Havana, where he intends to make a number of ascensions.

The Havana papers are full of accounts of filibuster proceedings in this country—giving the number of men enlisted, names of officers, style of societies and projects on foot. The topic of the day is the threatened invasion and the raising of forces to repel it.

COMMODORE PERRY.—The Rhode Island House of Representatives has adopted a resolution, authorizing the Governor to present to Commodore Perry a service of plate, suitably inscribed, as a testimonial of the high appreciation by his native State of the great and important services he has rendered to the cause of civilization and commerce, in the opening of the ports of Japan.

General Intelligence.

EXPLOSION OF THE STEAMER PEARL.

Fearful Loss of Life—List of Killed, Wounded and Missing.

We take the following account of the explosion of the Pearl from a variety of California papers.

About five o'clock on Saturday afternoon, the 27th, as the steamer Pearl, of the Combination line, which had been racing with the Enterprise, of the Citizen's line, from Marysville to Sacramento, was nearing the latter city, her boiler exploded, very nearly destroying the boat and inflicting a large number of human beings into eternity. There were thirty-three passengers on board, of whom thirty-five were Chinamen. Of these the boilers of twenty to which were killed have been recovered. Three or four more died at the hospital on Saturday, who were terribly scalded, so that the sufferers had their arms and legs broken entirely off. The boat is a total wreck. A rope was procured and the wreck hauled to the river side, about 4 of the gas works. The cargo rabbs and the cabin floor of the boat. Before the could be got on shore, however, a dead man fell on top of him. He is supposed to be the engineer, who was seen to jump overboard at the moment of the explosion and swim ashore.

The engineer was seen to jump overboard at the moment of the explosion and swim ashore.

Four men were at the table playing cards when the whole front of the boat flew away, and they were left unhurt. Col. Anderson, who had been watching the game, had scarcely quitted them and walked forward, when the explosion took place and he was killed.

Boyden, the deceased, leaves, we understand, a wife and two children, resident at Greenfield, Mass. He died possessed of considerable property.

To illustrate the sudden and unexpected nature of the explosion, it may be mentioned that when the body of Kenton was found, both hands were clinched in the pockets of the overcoat, as though he had been standing perfectly unconcerned.

The death of Capt. Davis was probably instantaneous—both ankles and the elbow of his right arm were found to be dislocated, and a severe scalp lacerature above the eye, penetrating to the brain. It will be remembered that the deceased stood on the hurricane deck, almost immediately over the boiler, at the time of the explosion, and was probably grasping the railing stationary with his right hand. His watch, a valuable article, was recovered with the body, and was still moving at 10 o'clock last evening.

On the body of one of the deceased—apparently an Italian—was found a memorandum book containing the names of Burand Lagrange, Jean Baptiste, Michael Rivard, and account current with Wm Patton.

On another was found a letter from A. Eastman, dated Micanopy, East Florida, in which the person to whom it was written is familiarly addressed as "Tobey."

It cannot be doubted that the discovery of many additional bodies will result.

In a letter addressed up on the river, written by Anna S Annable of Augusta, Me., to her husband, was found a bill of exchange for $60, drawn in her favor.

The report that no woman was lost by the explosion is erroneous. The body of a female was raised in the river yesterday, but unfortunately was lost again by the rending of her garments.

Valuable papers were found on the person of G. H. Wellington, and letters denoting that he leaves a widow resident at New Orleans.

Active efforts are in progress to raise the wreck of the Pearl, and will soon prove successful.

M. Marie Mercier, at the time of the explosion, and badly scalded, had sustained a contusion of the eye and a sprained ankle. He is doing well, under the care of Dr. Logan.

The aggregate of treasure found on the bodies will amount to about $8,000. While various amounts ranging as high as several thousand dollars, were found upon some, nothing was found upon many. The effects so found were sealed by the Coroner in the presence of the Mayor and a number of our most prominent citizens, and deposited in the office of Wells, Fargo & Co.

Andrew Wellagh, the engineer of the Pearl, was arrested on a warrant issued by Judge Fry, but released at 12½ o'clock on $10,000 bail.

Immediately after the explosion, the vessel filled with water, and sank to the cabin floors. In this condition a rope was made fast to her and towed ashore, by means of which she was dragged a short distance from the mouth of the American River, where she now lies.

Some of the bodies were thrown as far as seventy and eighty feet from the wreck. From the nearly and terrible nature of the wounds inflicted, the bodies must have been scattered to fragments. As yet no clue has been discovered as to their whereabouts. Of the whole number of passengers aboard, about thirty were Chinamen, the largest portion of whom were killed. William A. Sherman, the clerk, was writing in his room at the time of the explosion. He was thrown into the air, and fell on the cabin floor of the boat. Before he could recover an upright position, a dead man fell on top of him. He says that he saw a great number of arms, legs and shreds of bodies flying in every direction around him. Capt. Davis was standing near the wheel-house at the time of the catastrophe. His body was recovered this morning. A ghastly wound at the outer of the right eye, shows that he must have been killed instantly. Mr. Kendall, the mate, was saved, with both legs and one arm broken.

LIST OF THE DEAD.

Col Alex Anderson attorney at law, of Nevada; Boggar Rissino, fruiterer, of San Francisco; Wm Mallride and T H Monal, messengers of Wells, Fargo & Co; Capt E T Davis, Capt Randall, mate; E A Shultz, of Marysville; Maria Mereux; John Hayden, of Marysville; Francis Flucker, Long Island, N Y; Mr Williams, formerly in employ of Brown & Co., Sacramento; John Stader, miner, of Pennsylvania; Geo A Clouse, miner, of Indiana; Charles Orell, Germau; James Smith, sabin boy; six unknown white men recovered; five Chinamen recovered.

The Placer Times and Transcript, of the 1st, gives the following description of the funeral of the victims of the disaster on the Pearl. It took place at Sacramento:

Business was suspended, the stores closed, and many of the buildings were draped in mourning. The flags of the city and shipping were at half mast. An immense multitude assembled to join in the sad procession. No less than twenty-nine dead bodies were placed in the hearses and wagons that had been provided to convey them to their last resting place, and many thousands of people among which were women and children, had collected to witness their departure; very many who did not join in the procession. Among the booming of minute guns and the tolling of bells, the procession formed on Front street. It consisted of all the associations of the city, the entire fire department in uniform, the Governor and Legislature, citizens, etc., and numbered over three thousand persons. It was preceded by a band playing solemn music. In the rear were the Chinese, with their head and with muslc, etc. Arrived at the ground, the coffins containing the bodies were deposited by the respective graves, and the services commenced by reading selections from Scripture, by the Rev. Mr Shinck. The choir of the Baptist Church then chanted a dirge, after which Rev Mr Cronch addressed the Throng. Dirges in a foreign manner Rev. Mr. Wheeler then made a few brief remarks appropriate to the occasion, which was followed by a hymn from the choir, and the American portion of the assemblage were dismissed with a benediction.

The Chinese ceremonies were more interesting to those who had never witnessed their funeral rites. Their coffins, as were the others, were deposited alongside the graves, and large quantities of food, provided for the occasion beside them. Among other articles was a good sized shoat, cooked whole, and another which was headless—every portion restituted to fragments. As yet no clue has been discovered as to their whereabouts. Of the whole number of passengers aboard, about thirty were Chinamen, the largest portion of whom were killed. William A. Sherman, the clerk, was writing in his room at the time of the explosion. He was thrown into the air, and fell on the cabin floor of the boat. Before he could recover an upright position, a dead man fell on top of him. He says that he saw a great number of arms, legs and shreds of bodies flying in every direction around him. Capt. Davis was standing near the wheel-house at the time of the catastrophe. His body was recovered this morning. A ghastly wound at the outer of the right eye, shows that he must have been killed instantly. Mr. Kendall, the mate, was saved, with both legs and one arm broken.

The Placer Times and Transcript, of the 1st, gives the following description of the funeral of the victims of the disaster on the Pearl. It took place at Sacramento:

Sufferings of the British—Extracts from Various Correspondences.

FROM COL. T——, OF THE COLDSTREAM GUARDS.

Jan. 12.—I can scarcely write, so cold is it. The ground is covered with snow, and the most bitter of winds is raging through the tent. It is snowing with a vengeance. No chance of huts for being got up, and no warm clothing as yet. We have one man in hospital who must lose both feet from being frost-bitten, and crowds will lose toes, too. I understand that it had been calculated, with the means at present at disposal, that it would take five months to bring up huts for all our army from Balaklava, as they are not of much use.

FROM AN ENGLISH OFFICER.

Jan. 8.—Twenty men, I am told, died last night in the trenches. The line are on duty every alternate twenty-four hours, and are without clothes. We are all on short allowance of food. It is impossible to keep anything dry in such weather as this; that is the worst of it. By taking violent exercise you get warm, but you also get moist, and, instead of drying your clothes, simply freeze them, and get wet whenever you take them in from the air. I am told by the chaplains and doctors (the best authority on the subject,) that the state of the hospital is dreadful. A sick man has nothing to lie upon but his regimental blanket; of course, a mere rag in most instances now. They have no lights for the hospitals unless the surgeon himself provides them. They have few medicines, and fewer still of the commonest requisites of sick diet.

Jan. 6.—The weather is still very cold; snow and frost during the day are not at all agreeable, but it is comparate work at night under canvas. We have no means of transporting provisions hereon, and the chance of getting them up before the summer, is as far off as the summer itself. I was informed yesterday, by two officers who had seen them, that there are loads of sheepskin coats, to the number of 7000 or 8000, on board the Golden Fleece, at Belleave, sent from Trieste as a present to the officers of the army. The commander of the ship tells us that he is exceedingly anxious to get rid of them. But the Quartermaster-General's Department have received no official letter about them, and will not receive them.

FROM A CORPORAL.

Jan. 7.—I hardly know how to begin to give you an idea of our present sufferings, for suffer we do daily from the effect of the cold. Even now, while I am writing, I am perishing with cold, owing to the cold tent. God knows what will be the fate of the Almighty deserters now in the trying time. We are up to our knees in snow, and you may depend we feel it going into the trenches for twelve or fourteen hours; and, if it is your turn for the advanced trenches, you have not a chance of jumping about to keep yourself warm, for fear of a 32-pounder, or a rifle ball, from the skirmishers in their holes making for the batteries, running after you with a view to make you to halt. I don't like grumbling; but this work is enough to try my patience. It would cut you to the heart to see the remains of our once fine regiment. We have not been about one thousand strong, and we can hardly muster one hundred men for duty. The men try to knock along, but their strength fails them. The other night it snowed terribly, and we found every man we could muster at 8 in the evening, our usual time of turning in in the trenches, and they hardly could get before news came that half of the party had fallen down quite helpless with pain. We had the sick at home were compelled to turn out and carry our poor comrades to camp.

FROM THE CORRESPONDENT OF THE LONDON HERALD.

Jan. 20.—Since the last post, and until the 20th, there had been an intense frost, which, while it lasted, surpassed for its severity anything we have yet felt. During the day the thermometer seldom rose above 18 degrees, but with the night a keen wind swept over the enemy's works, which from the very blood of those exposed to it. No arms I can use, were I to write forever, would give your readers even a faint idea of what the sufferings of our troops have been and still are. Hundreds are frost bitten in the hands, feet and face; the cholera is still among them, and scurvy and dysentery spread more and more each day. The men have not fires, the miserable stock of roots and shrubs, which used to enable them to get a warm meal, are now quite exhausted, and no material of any kind are to be found in camp. I am informed that for two whole days throughout the great mass of our lines, not a fire was lit, though the mercury then stood at nearly 30 deg. below freezing point. On each of those days, as if in mockery of their sufferings, the raw coffee beans were served out to the men as usual.

Major Macdonald, of the 39th, I am informed, was frozen to death in the trenches on the night of the 16th, and another gallant officer, who fell into a deep snow drift, most narrowly escaped the same fate. Both in the nights of the 16th, 17th, and 18th, many of the men on sentry and on fatigue parties were numbed by the cold in such a manner as to expire in a few hours afterward. On the 17th, fourteen men of the 46th were buried, the majority of the deaths being caused by the severity of the weather, and on the 18th ten more were interred from the same cause. On the latter occasion the thaw had commenced, and the bodies of four of the ten were discovered among the coats by the fact of their boots sticking out of the snow. I believe they were men who had been employed in fatigue parties, and who, becoming numbed and exhausted, sat down to rest on reaching their camping ground, and so perished miserably. During the early part of this severe frost, all the men employed in carrying coal to convert into the means of heating together managed to keep their feet from actual frost bites. Of late, however, the warmth of their bodies thawed the snow on which they sat into a mere puddle. The unfortunate men got benumbed, and when at their duties during the night their boots were stripped off the feet in large numbers. It is not enough to say that we are unfortunate in the mortality which prevails. Such terms are far too weak to stigmatize the cruel waste of life which takes place here every day. Our men are literally murdered—murdered by neglect, by incapacity, by the etiquette of military discipline, and by every way in which our soldiers form of mismanagement can reach both officers and privates, old and young.

The sanitary condition of Balaklava is beginning to excite serious apprehensions. The filth of the town is now something beyond all description. Offal, dirt, waste stores, stagnant water, the refuse from English and Turkish hospitals, and above a hundreds of half-decomposed horses, dogs, sheep and oxen lie more or less in every little alley. Each house is over-crowded, and under each house are cellars, in which horses and Tartar families are stowed away. But the most serious evil of all arises from the immense number of interments which have lately taken place. We are now giving rations to 4000 Turks; two months ago we were rationing 14,000; 8000 of the missing 10,000 are dead and "buried" on the slope of the hill, over the harbor, though I think even a metropolitan sexton would hardly have the hardihood to call the last resting place of a Turk here a "grave." It is merely a little trench, about 18 inches deep, in which the bodies are laid on the bare rock, and the few handfulls of earth which have been removed in the formation of the trench cover the corpses.

The bodies have thus been interred. The rains have in many instances, have washed the earth from these graves, leaving the bodies, in every stage of corruption, exposed to the eye, and tainting the air for miles around. I believe it was entirely owing to the hospital for the Turks, which was established close to the front of some of these plague-spots, that none of the Russian Muscovites recovered of their wounds, almost without a single exception, were to mortify and gangrene soon after the men entered the place.

Inquirer.

FROM THE CORRESPONDENT OF THE LONDON TIMES.

Jan. 12.—I regret to say that there are more cases of frost-bite among our troops and the French than one expects or likes to find. Last night a party of the 21 battalion, Rifle Brigade, were on duty in the trenches between Balaklava, and the French camp. The night is fine in a routine to the Russian lines, but the cold is intense. A little after midnight, when the men were relieved, it was found that one man had his foot frozen, and another had his hand frozen. Both were sent to the hospital. Before the relief had left the trenches, a Russian deserter came in, and reported that two of his comrades had been frozen to death in the night. Two men said they belonged to the Legion Etrangere, but that they had lost their way in returning from a little exenrsion, and had lighted a fire to keep themselves warm; they seemed to be Italians, and their story was so plausible, supported, as it was, by the inquiry, "Do you think we would have lighted a fire if we had intended to desert?" that there would have been a chance of their escaping under other circumstances; but they were sent to Sir Colin Campbell, who handed them over to the French authorities. They denied there were more than two of them, though the Riflemen declared they saw four round the fire when they first came up. The French officers immediately claimed them as two of a party of four deserters who had left camp yesterday, and they will be shot early tomorrow morning. A man of the 93d also deserted, and his body has been found in front of the Russian picket. He was killed by a musket shot, and there is no doubt but that as he approached the post, not being able to reply to the challenger, he was fired upon, and met his fate—one too good for him. There have been several desertions in front also—at least, men are missing—and it is supposed they have gone over to the enemy.

Jan. 15.—A well merited, though severe punishment was inflicted on the 10th inst. upon an English soldier who was attempting to desert to the enemy; and it is the more worthy of remark as the punishment was administered voluntarily on the spur of the moment, by one of the deserters' own comrades. The man who exhibited such patriotic feeling and readiness of purpose deserves a reward, and one of a more permanent character and more likely to extend its influences than a mere pecuniary gratuity. The fact occurred soon after noon, in broad daylight. A working party of the 19th Regiment and others had been employed in front of Gordon's Battery, to the right of the advanced work and near the position of the Lancaster gun. They were about to return to the advanced work, and had unpiled arms, when some one observed the absence of a man of the party by name of Smith Beerch was made for him, but he was not found. It was then remembered that he had when they began to work not placed his musket with the other arms, but had supported it against a portion of the parapet which was concealed from view by a projecting angle. Two men at once made their way to this spot and on reaching it found the firelock still there, but the man Smith considerably in advance, stooping, but hurrying toward the Russian centeries. One of the two men immediately gave the alarm, and calling out, "down with him, the rascal is going over to the enemy," capped his piece, and fired. He, however, missed him. The deserter no sooner perceived that he was detected and marked, than, springing up, he ran at full speed, and shaking in his left hand a white rag, and holding up his right to show that he was unarmed. But he was doomed not to effect his object. He had reached about half the distance between the English line and the Russian outposts, when one of his own comrades took a more deliberate aim, and lodged a ball in his back. The deserter fell at once, and though he was observed afterwards to make several efforts, he was quite unable to move from his position. From the manner in which he fell, there is little doubt that the wound was mortal. Subsequently, toward dusk, a sergeant and eight or ten men were sent to bring him in, but the object was observed, and some Cossacks advanced. An interchange of shots took place, and, though none of the sergent's party were hurt, it was considered prudent to retire back to the work.

Sharp Shooting.

Jan. 12.—The usual small-arm practice went on in front of the lines between the sharpshooters. Both parties have now become so expert that their greatest pleasure is to try and "do" each other by getting up "dummies," and exhibiting devices to draw fire, so that they may have a chance of returning it while the marksman is exposed. The old dodge of putting up a shako or forager on the end of a stick is universally despised, and not a shot will be thrown away on one. Moving them along with an irregular motion just above the top of the ramparts or trenches, as if a man were walking along, is sometimes successful, and the lucky fellow who gets a ball or two through his headdress in this way is considered very clever. The men now know each other—that is, they observe certain gunners in the Russian batters whom they have seen for some time past, and who have nicknames. "There goes Redcap!" or, "Blackbeard is going to take a shot at us now;" and so on; and there is a story going that pickets occasionally fraternize, as they were wont to do in the peninsula, and that they were all agreed as to the Shibboleth—"Bono Franzig!" "Bono Inglis!" "Bono Muscov!" "Turco, so bono!"

From the French Camp.

FROM THE MONITEUR DE L'ARMEE.

A few nights since, when completely dark, and during a beating rain, the sentinels on duty saw advancing toward the town: score of these intrepid volunteers, who are designated in the French army by the name of enfans perdus, because they devote their lives to the most dangerous enterprises. Two marched at the head, one behind the other, at five paces distant from each other, and a little in their rear came the remainder of the band, preceded by an officer named Benner, of the 7th regiment of the line. But the moment they got beyond the French sentinels, their mode of advancing became most curious, as the whole of them threw themselves flat on the ground, and crawled along without a word being spoken. Their chief, an old Zouave, had taught them to advance in this manner. As soon as they have lain down, they stretch forward in front of them their musket as far as they can reach; they then drag themselves along the ground to a line with it, and go on repeating this movement till they reach their place of destination, keeping themselves always ready to start up and rush on any enemy that may come within their reach.

The route they had to follow was a crooked one, for they had to leave on their right a mound of earth, behind which some Russians were in ambush. It was not their object to have anything to do with this post of the enemy; it was necessary to turn it and glide between it and the ditch, in order to examine the enemy's works and return without being observed. Before entering the narrow space which separates the ditch from the Russian post, the officer lost there more than half of his men, and if they were discovered, they were to fall on the post. He, with five or six determined followers, crossed this dangerous passage, and went along the edge of the ditch. He found on the edge of it chevaux-de-frise, made of palisades of wood; he tried with his hands the strength of these defenses, and found them firm in the ground, and solidly bound together. The ditch was six feet deep, and the rain-water lay deep at the bottom of it. To fill up the ditch appeared impossible; to tear up the palisades would occupy too long a time; to burn them would be better. The chevaux-de-frise were fastened together with chains, and if the former were burnt the latter would remain. It would be better to carry them off.

The night was as dark as can be conceived. A man was seen at a few paces from the leader. Astonished at his appearance, the leader crawled gently toward him, and found him to be one of his own men. The officer continued to advance, when suddenly he was stopped by a trench, and he heard the sound of shovels and pickaxes, workmen talking, and guards walking with their feet in the water. What were they doing? They were preparing a mine. He marked the spot from which it started, and the direction it took. The rain continued falling, and the exploring party could not do anything further; the flash of a cannon might betray them, and the officer gave the signal for retreat; they followed the same route, which they could readily discover by the marks of their bodies on the muddy ground. They again passed near the post of the Russian soldiers. The latter, from the darkness, did not see that death was at a few paces in their rear. All of them might have been killed or taken prisoners, but the French party had other parts of the works to reconnoitre, and the success of the enterprise was worth more than the destruction of ten Russian soldiers. After having finished their exploring, the officer and his party rejoined the men they had left behind them, and who remained lying in the sand.

"Nothing new, mes enfans?" whispers the officer. "Nothing," was the reply. "Then let us return," and the trusty brave men repassed our trenches in the same silence. On the following night, these same men advanced and threw down the gabions, which incommoded our troops, made one Russian prisoner, and brought away several bags of powder. One of them was hit by a ball in the foot.

FROM A SOLDIER'S LETTER.

The brigade to which I belong occupies the left of this line, toward the sea, and I have only a few steps to advance to behold the town and forts of Sebastopol. We are encamped on the slope of a ravine, which hides us from the view of the enemy. The distance is such that the shells and bullets have several times plonghed up our camp. Our service consists of guarding the trenches, and of working at them. The guard returns every three days. The battalion leaves at 7 o'clock in the morning, passes round the ravine, and enters the trenches after two hours' march, and without any marked route. They defile one by one in the passages of communication, and we are generally given 400 metres to guard. We pass the twenty-four hours under every sort of weather, and without shelter, having nothing whatever to amuse us except the parabolas described by the shells, the infernal din of mortars, varied by the whistling of cannon balls and bullets. The first day our men lay down on their faces as each shell passed. Now three-fourths of them look on tranquilly, observing to their comrades, "See how it smokes its pipe."

On the other hand, the batteries fire but little up to the present, and do not reply to the guns of the enemy, which are so violent that many of the ravines are full of their balls. We often see a white flag hoisted to the top of a polo, and hear the trumpet sound in the Russian ambuscades. This, of course, means "flag of truce." At once the fire ceases, and a vast nnmber of heads are seen to pop up from under the earth to the open air. The Russians hold up to the French bottles and glasses, as if they invited them to drink each other's healths. The French reply by flourishing their tin cans; and then they pledge each other's healths. The bearer of the flag of truce advances on horseback, stops at about 100 paces from our trenches, while the nearest French officer goes forward to receive the dispatches. I yesterday witnessed a meeting of the kind. The parlementaire courteously took he glove from his right hend, and shook that of a captain of Chasseurs who had gone ont to meet him. So you see all the Russians are not the Cossecks they have been taken for. The parlementaire retires, the white flag is pnlled down, and the murderous din recommences.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—The eminent British statesman still scorns all claims to the companionship of old fogies. Now in his sixty-third year, he is the same wide awake progressive that he has always been. One month before he was twenty-one years of age, he entered Parliament. He become a young standard-bearer of "civil and religious liberty guarantied by Parliamentary reform." At the age of twenty-three, he wrote a passable biography of a noble relative. While not yet thirty, he took the part of Queen Caroline against George IV. He was always in favor of removing the legislative disabilities against the Jews, and he was the mover of the great Reform Bill. Three times be has left Governmental posts (Paymaster in 1834, Secretary of State for the Home Department in 1841, and First Lord of the Treasury in 1851) after brave displays of political pluck; and now, for the fourth time, he pulls off his Cabinet cloak, and throwe it in the faces of his old fogy associates. On the 23d of January, without any premonitions, any conservative coquetting, any old fogy backing and filling, the honorable and noble gentleman, President of the Council, and member from London, resigned his Cabinet place in a court letter to Lord Aberdeen, phrased as if he might say: "Ask me no delicate questions, and I will give you no indelicate answers." On the 26th, he occupied the attention of the House more than two hours in his reasons "defining his position, a la Webster. That the step of resignation is eminently one of a progressive anti-fogy character, appears from the criticism of Lord Palmerston in answer: "But the course taken by my noble friend, I humbly submit, was not in accordance with the usual practice of public men." A resolution of inquiry had been proposed into the conduct of the Departments having the control of the Crimean operations. My Lord John, not choosing to be made responsible for blunders committed, and being committed, and to be committed, in regard to the war, resigns. This is the long and short of his step, and of his two hours' speech in justification. New York Sunday Times.

EARLY TIMES IN TEXAS.—We heard an anecdote recently which illustratee the hardships to which the pioneers of this country were exposed:

A friend of ours had landed in the country, and was traveling up the Brazos. Night coming on, he halted his team in front of a rude, one-etory, one-room, log shanty, and inquired if he could stop there for the night, and obtain refreshment for man and beast.

A gruff, tanned and elderly matron answered: "I don't know; we have nothing to eat; Sel's gone out now a huntin'; if she gets anything, you can stay. You mought hitch up awhile, and wait and see."

Accordingly, our friend, with his wife and family, took their seat in the rude hut, and devoutly prayed that success might crown the efforts of our Diana, heretofore called "Sal." In an honr the old woman, who had been straining her eyes to penetrate the forest, said: "Yes, you can stay; there she comes, and she's got plenty of it."

Sure enough, in a few minutes "Sal" rode up, astride a mustang, with her rifle on her shoulder, and a fat buck strapped to her pony. In the shortest time imaginable she hung him up, took off his hide, and dressed a portion for the table. Our friend and family regaled themselves of the venison for supper and breakfast, and went on their way rejoicing, and invoking blessings on the head of Sal. She has since been married to an old Texan—is wealthy, and has given up hunting.

PHOSPHORUS.—It is now just two hundred years since phosphorue was first obtained by Brand, of Hamburg. So wonderful was the discovery then considered, that Kraft, an eminent philosopher of the day, gave Brand $300 for the secret of its preparation. Kraft then traveled, and visited nearly all the Courts of Europe, exhibiting phosphorus to kings and nobles. In appearance, phosphorus resembles bees-wax; but it is more transparent, approaching to the color of amber. Its name, which is derived from the Greek, signifies "light-bearer," and is indicative of its most distinguishing quality, being self-luminous. Phosphorus, when exposed to the air, shines like a star, giving out a beautiful lambent, greenish light. Phosphorus dissolves in warm sweet oil. If this phosphorised oil be rubbed over the face in the dark, the features assume a ghastly appearance, and the experimentalist looks like a veritable living Will-o'-the-Wisp.

The origin of phosphorus is the most remarkable thing concerning it. Every other substance with which we are acquainted can be traced either to the earth or air; but phosphorus seems to be of animal origin. Of all the animals, man contains the most; and of the various parts of the body, the brain yields, by analysis, more phosphorus than any other. This fact is of no little moment. Every thought has, perhaps, a phosphoric source. It is certain that the most intellectual beings contain the most phosphorus. It generally happens that when a singular discovery is made, many years elapse before any application of it is made to the welfare and happiness of man. This remark applies to phosphorus. It is only the other day that it was sold at five shillings an ounce; now it is so cheap that the penniless portion of our population hawk it about in the form of matches. But what a noble, life, light and fire-giving office does it fill! For commercial purposes—match-making—phosphorus is extracted from burnt bones. The demand for it is now so great that many tons are annually prepared. When Kraft traveled, he had not more than half an ounce "to set before the king!"

A TOUGH CIGAR.—Joseph was a bad boy. He had succeeded in blinding his mother for some time as to his imbibing propensities. One night Joseph came in before the old lady had retired. He sat down, and, with a look of semi-intoxicated wisdom, began conversing about the goodness of the crops and other matters. He got along very well until he espied what he supposed to be a cigar on the mantel-piece; he caught it, and placed one end in his mouth, began very gravely to light it at the candle. He drew and puffed until he was getting red in the face. The old lady's eyes were opened, and she addressed him—"If thee takes that tenpenny nail for a cigar, it is time thee went to bed."

PEANUTS TRIUMPHANT.—One day a peanut and candy-selling urchin at the railroad station was rudely pushed off the platform by the conductor of the freight train. His wrath was great, and he determined that it should be the spring of equal great annoyance to his foe. His heaving bosom—contracted brow—compressed lips—clenched hand—flashing eye—and half uttered "By gum! If I don't make you pay for that, then I'm mistaken!" all proved that a dreadful retribution awaited the devoted conductor of the freight train.

Young America sold his stock that day with uuusual rapidity, for he sold it at half-price, and was diligent at his business. He "raised" twenty-five cents; with it he purchased a piece of fat pork.

The "grade" at Atlanta is very steep; and heavy freight trains, when going at full speed, seldom exceed the rate of three miles an hour until they reach a certain distance from the city. Young America attached a piece of string to the pork, and, accompanied by another juvenile, went down to the place where the grade is steepest. "Now, looky'e here," said the peanut seller to his companion, as he placed the fat pork on the rail, "you take hold of that string and pull me along." He squatted on the pork and was trailed up and down both rails for about half a mile. Of course the rail was well greased! The freight train came up.

It was literally, No go! For two days the engine vigorously puffed in a vain attempt at progress. The conductor was finally obliged to call in the aid of another engine. Thus concluded the history of the Peanut Seller's Triumph; or Young America's Revenge.

NIAGARA FALLS.—Those who wish to see Niagara Falls in their majestic winter robe and in terrific sublimity should now improve the opportunity. Probably there is no sight in the whole world so impressively grand as the Falls present at this time. The unprecedented duration of extreme cold weather has allowed the spray, which, winter and summer, falls in an unceasing shower, gradually to accumulate in huge cones upon the rocks at the foot and in front of the Falls to an immense size and height. The trees on Goat Island and on the Canada side present an aspect of being chiseled from alabaster or Parian marble; every thing within the influence of the spray from the cataract presents this singularly beautiful appearance; indeed, so immense has been the accumulation of the frozen spray upon the trees as in some instances to break down trees with trunks over a foot in diameter. The streams which ever percolate through the overhanging rocks on each side of the Falls are gradually congealed into the semblance of immense stalactites, and in some instance present the appearance of regular colonnades. Then, when the sun lights upon the scene, it gives the beholder more the idea of fairyland than of reality. Those who wish to view a scene of unequaled grandeur should now improve the opportunity. SOLEMNITIES OF AN OATH.—The February number of the Knickerbockr gets off the following for the benefit of courts, lawyers, witnesses, et cetera:

A correspondent in Ottawa county, Michigan, from whom we are always glad to to hear, gives us the following:

Scene in the Mayor's Court at Grand Rapids—Mayor Church presiding. Witness called up to be sworn by the clerk.

Clerk—"You do solemnly swear"——

Mayor, with dignity—"Stop! The witness will hold up his right hand."

Clerk—"The man has no right hand, your Honor."

Mayor, with some asperity—"Let him hold up his left hand, then."

Clerk—"He has had the misfortune to lose his left hand also, as your Honor will perceive."

Mayor, savagely—"Tell him to hold up his right leg, then; a man can not be sworn in this court without holding up something! Silence, gentlemen! Our dignity must be preserved!"

Witness sworn on one leg.

THE GREAT MEN OF A GREAT COUNTRY.—A young American exchange sums up our human greatness as follows: "The greatest man, take him all in all," of the last hundred years, was Gen. George Washington—an American. The greatest Doctor of Divinity was Jonathan Edwards—an American. The greatest philosopher was Benjamin Franklin—an American. The greatest of living historians is William H. Prescott, an American. The greatest ornithologist was John James Audubon—an American. There has been no English writer of the present age, whose works have been marked with more refinement, or more grace, than those of Washington Irving—an American. The greatest lexicographer since the time of Johnson, was Noah Webster—an American. The inventors, whose works have been productive of the greatest amount of benefit to mankind in the last century, were Godfrey, Fitch, Fulton and Whitney—all Americans. And the greatest humbug of this or any other country, of the last or any other hundred years, is Barnum—also an American.

AN EXPLANATION.—In addressing a jury upon one occasion, the celebrated Mr. Jeffrey found it necessary to make free with the character of a military officer, who was present during the whole harangue. Upon hearing himself several times spoken of as "the soldier," the son of Mars, boiling with indignation, interrupted the pleader:

"Don't call me a soldier, sir; I am an officer."

Mr. Jeffary immediately went on—

"Well, gentlemen, this officer, who is no soldier, was the sole cause of the mischief that has occurred."

A BONNE BOUCHE.—A Mr. Tumerelli, a gentleman who is said to have traveled in Russia, has been lecturing in London on the "social and moral characteristics of the Russian people." He related the following anecdote:

"When Madame Tagliori quitted St. Petersburgh, she left a pair of slippers at the hotel. The landlord coon made his good fortune known, and 50, 100, and even 200 roubles (£20) were freely offered for the forgotten slippers. The landlord, however, finding the public enthusiasm increase as he raised his demands, peremptorily refused to part with the slippers under 1000 roubles, (£100.) This sum being rather more than any individual appeared willing to give, thirty-five persons subbed together and purchased the slippers. They then wanted to know what to do with them. After many suggestions, none of which gave general satisfaction, it was proposed by one of the speculators, more enthusiastic and original than his fellows, that they should eat them! The landlord of the hotel pronounced the idea to be excellent, and proposed to make a frissees of them, which was accordingly done, and the thirty-six enthusiasts, with the lecturer as their guest, did actually eat Taglioni's slippers, and washed them down in bumpers of champagne, in which they drank to the health of the charming Cansense."

RIOT IN KANSAS—A Clergyman Mobbed and Nearly Killed.—The Lexington (Mo.) Express publishes an account of a riot between a number of squatters in Kansas. It occurred in the town of Fremont, and the following are said to be the facts:

The mob, without provocation, entirely destroyed the premises of the Rev. Mr. Hummer, and, after having beat and stoned his person to such a degree that all reasonable hope of his life was lost, they carried him off by force, together with his suffering wife, who was still clinging to his mangled body, and conveyed them away some five miles, and sat them down on the open prairie, there to perish. The mob then returned, with shouts of triumph, to the residence of A. A. Ward, where they organized, and from whence they started, which is in the immediate vicinity of the demolished premises. They held a mock auction, and sold off what remained of building materials, which were bid in by the instigators of the mob. They stole the potatoes, onions, chickens, etc., of the still bleeding, and supposed dead, sufferer.

The new liquor law of Michigan is a stringent one. It is to take effect in May next, and prohibits the manufacture as well as the sale of spirituous liquors as a beverage. Fines and imprisonments are the penalties for violations of the law. Intoxicated persons to be used as witnesses, and if they refuse to disclose where they obtained liquor, to be punished for contempt of Court. Liquor to be seized and destroyed. Cider and wine may be manufactured, but not sold in small quantities, to be drank on the premises. All fines, to be applied to the support of the poor.

The progress of Minnesota Territory is truly wonderful. It was organized only six years ago; thirty counties have since been laid off, and nearly all organized; the population has increased from 5000 to 30,000, or more; the taxable property is estimated, for 1855, at $7,000,000; a wire suspension bridge has been thrown over the Mississippi river above the Falls of St. Anthony; agricultural societies have been organized, and one county has rejoiced in a very excitable fair; a Territorial University is in operation, well endowed by Congress; and a system of Common Schools, with efficient superintendence, has been established, which guarantees the future intelligence of the people.

"CALLING NAMES."—A new born daughter of the Countess of Treponi, was christened on the 8th of January, at Naples, with the brief name of Maria Theresa Ferdinanda Immaculate Conceptino Sabatia Luciana Philomina. The Queen of the Two Sicilies was her sponsor.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE AND PRINCE NAPOLEON.—A Paris letter of the 1st has the following in relation to the return of two prominent officers from the Crimea:

The Duke of Cambridge passed through Paris last week in a very different plight from that in which he entered it last summer. No reviews in the Champs de Mars, no familiar drives with Louis Napoleon awaited him. His ideas of war, if he has any left, poor man, must be another sort of thing from what he learnt at the camp of Chobham, or in front of the Ecole Militaire of Paris. The Prince alighted at the British Embassy, but did not make disappearance even at the soiree held there the evening of his arrival, nor was he present at the select evening party at the Tuileries on Sunday last. In short, the changed position of his two visits was strikingly indicative of the fact that the campaign of the Crimea had intervened between them.

Prince Napoleon, accompanied by his father, entered—I may say stole into Paris on Saturday night at eight o'clock, without beat of drum. His health was considered had enough to compel him to sleep at Lyons and also Chalons on his way to Paris.

Prince Napoleon has been either unlucky, or something worse, in this his first campaign, and I tell you only the fact, when I say what he has returned to his future capital a wronged, perhaps, but a fallen man. There is even talk that an opportunity will be taken to show the French people that he is no longer regarded in the light of an heir apparent.

MORE BLOODSHED IN JACKSON.—The Jackson (Miss.) Mercury of the 24th says:

Our community was shocked by the occurrence of another terrible tragedy on Saturday evening. Mr. J. F. Irish stabbed Mr. Henry Hippie with a bowie-knife, causing his almost instant death. The parties were brothers-in-law, and long residents here. We forbear from any publication of the circumstances. Irish was arrested and is now in confinement. An examination will be had before the magistrate this morning.

Mr. Hippie was a member of the first Mississippi regiment in the Mexican war. This is the fourth citizen of Jackson killed within three months back.

RISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he has never aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

A. G. Baston, John W. Fairson,
D. L. Dinsmore, Rev. Duncan Brown,
Col. Isaac Lane, Jerome B. Fillow,
S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and mote well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability in short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

THE undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements for the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of a high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own, and the adjoining States, the adoption of a plan, which we trust will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. C. Thweatt, (well-known throughout the State as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South) has been engaged as President of the Institution. The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweatt is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield have subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured, that no school can be found in the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning, as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages as far as health, society, etc, are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher

THE WATCHMAN.

CONCLUDING PARAGRAPHS OF A SERMON OF DR. GRIFFIN.

I dare not suppress or soften those sublime and terrible truths which the Divine law pronounces, lest my God should take me away; and, with my present convictions, I never shall, unless upon one condition, and on that I will make the agreement with you. If you will all, my dear hearers, become the friends of God, I will sound his threatenings against you no more. I would it were thus! I confess I am weary of this gloomy part of my duty. I would much rather from the fountain of the promises pour into your yielding hearts the consolations of religion. Come, be the friends of God, and I will give you sin no more. But while many of you decide, neither tenderness to you nor the dread responsibility of a watchman will allow me to suppress these awful truths. Do any yet plead, that they might be influenced by more tender topics? Prove it, then, by being influenced by them. By the tenderest accents of mercy you have often been addressed. Arguments have been brought, as was fit, from the yearnings of immortal love and from the bloody dust of Calvary. Every wound of a dying Christ has pleaded with you; and a thousand melting invitations, warm from heaven, have mingled their sounds about your ears. Prove, then, your doctrines true by turning to God. Mercy has exhausted her sounds upon you; and if she would continue to plead, she must repeat the same sounds again. If, then, such sounds can move you, why, my beloved friends, do you not come! What obstruction is there in the way? Oh, come! Else, if you still contain that harsher means are used, what a strange appearance will you make in the eyes of Heaven! Relusing to be melted by the voice of mercy, yet unwilling to hear the voice of justice! A king finds some of his subjects in an unreasonable rebellion, and condemns them to the rack, but in mercy bids his servants with offers of pardon, on condition that they lay down their arms. They reject the offer, and then complain that insinuations are added. "Let the king," say they, "change his words, or let his servants change them. Perhaps we might consent if softer terms were used." Presumptuous men! did you think to confer a favor on the king by accepting pardon. Know ye that he has no need of you, and that it was in mere mercy that he made the offer. And, since you will not accept of mercy, receive your sentence: "Ye shall surely die."

Now, then, my friends, my reasons are all before you; and I hope to be justified by your conscience while I proceed to execute the commission given me in my text. God said to the wicked, Oh, wicked man, thou shalt surely die; and the watchmen are commanded, upon their peril, to sound the alarm. I therefore solemnly declare, in the name of God, that there is a dreadful war waged by all the Divine perfections against sin; that all the power which supports the hosts of Heaven has taken the field; that the very glory of the Godhead points a livid lightning at your breast; that the inviolable banner of Heaven's King is unlisted, and is coming down to crush a rebellious world.

In equally solemn tones, I declare, as my God bids me, and call every angel to witness, that in this war God is right and the world is wrong. This great truth, while I live, I will declare, and hope to pronounce it with my dying breath. God is right, and the world is wrong. I wish it were set forth in red letters on every forehead, and, with the blood dipped in heaven, were written upon every heart. I wish it were posted in sunshine at the corner of every street, and were written with the point of a diamond on the sky forever. Let this great truth pass from land to land, to prostrate nations unknown before, and rolling through every clime, that humbled world to their Redeemer's throne.

Standing on my watch-tower, I am commanded, if I see aught of evil coming, to sound the warning. I again solemnly declare that I see evil approaching; I see a storm collecting in the heavens; I discover the commotion of the troubled elements; I hear the roar of distant winds. Heaven and earth are mingled in the conflict; and I cry to Him for whom I watch, a storm! a storm! Save the ark, or you are swept away! But what is it I see? I see a world condemned and falling into ruins; the sea burning with oil; nations rising from underground; the heavens falling; the damned in chains before the throne; and some of my poor hearers with me. I see them cast from the battlements of judgment seat. My God! the eternal world closed upon them forever!—Vermont Chronicle.

TRACT APPEAL.

SILSBON, Miss., Feb., 1855.

To the Ministry and Membership of the M. E. Church South, in the bounds of the Mississippi Conference.

Dear Brethren—At the last session of our Conference a Tract Society, auxiliary to the Tract Society of the M. E. Church, South, was formed. The undersigned were elected President and Vice President, Rev. James A. Light Secretary, Rev. W. P. Barton Treasurer, with twelve directors, composed of ministers and laymen.

The purpose of this organization, according to the second article of the constitution, is to promote the objects of the parent society, which are, "the diffusion of religious knowledge and the circulation of the publications of the M. E. Church, South." We are expected to "aid the funds of the parent society, by colportags or otherwise, to circulate the publications which receive its sanction." Each quarterly Conference in the bounds of our work is recommended by the General Conference to adopt the constitution prepared for them, and organize a tract society in each circuit and station auxiliary to the Conference Tract Society. By this means it is hoped to obtain a systematic co operation throughout the Church in this great enterprise.

We deem it important at the earliest date to bring this subject before our brethren, and enlist the feelings of all. Hence this appeal.

We regret that there was not a more vigorous action in this matter by our Conference. Unfortunately, attention to this important interest was deferred to almost the last hour of the session. Some of the other Conferences have gone at least one step further, which we might, and doubtless ought to have done. They have appointed an agency, and selected suitable advocates to travel at large and present this cause to the churches. Our lack in this respect, however, may, in a measure at least, be supplied, if every preacher and every member of the society will do his duty in the premises.

The whole country is being flooded with cheap literature of a character to corrupt the tastes and ruin the morals of the young and the old. Our reading people are, in many cases, found feeding upon this trash, and vainly strive to fill their empty minds," for want of better food. Religious publications, in a cheap, convenient form are not always to be had. Now, in this, as in many things, "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light."

True it is that many have already ample means for acquiring religious knowledge. The Bible has found its way to most of the habitations of our happy country. Commentaries, volumes of sermons, essays, treatises, &c., are distributed broadcast over the land, and the professed disciple of Christ is heard to say "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." And some are ready to conclude that any additional effort to adapt the provisions of grace to the wants of mankind, or place more immediately within their reach the bread of life, would be a work of supererogation. But we are to "sow beside all waters"—to "cast our bread upon the waters." "In the morning sow thy seed, in the evening withhold not thy hand," &c.

All men will not read the Bible as they should. Nor will they undertake a volume as readily as a simple tract or book of smaller dimension. But shall they be lost? Shall they be abandoned to darkness and death? They cannot be saved but by believing in Jesus. How shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? How shall they hear without a preacher? The living ministry cannot have access to all. Then let us send an humble little messenger in the form of a tract. Some one will read it and in eternity may rise up and call you blessed, who might never have known you while here in the flesh.

Here is a field that any Christian may enter and labor for God. No one need any longer to stand and inquire, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" An open door is before us all. Come, dear brethren, with your wives and your children unite in this work. In many portions of our work colporteurs might be employed to advantage. Surely there are men for this work, ready to toil and sacrifice in it. It is a work of Christian philanthropy, and no man would expect to grow rich in the service. But then in this delightful field he has promise of his daily bread.

We request the editor to publish along with this imperfect appeal a copy of the constitution adopted by the Annual Conference Tract Society, and also the one proposed for the Quarterly Conference, and respectfully invite the attention of both preachers and people to the provisions of each. Furthermore, we humbly suggest that each presiding elder should, at the earliest convenience, bring the subject before the several quarterly Conferences of his district, and organize an auxiliary society for each circuit and station.

The address of the Secretary is Yazoo City, Miss., and the Treasurer Woodville, Miss. It is earnestly desired that the members of the Conferences and all who feel interested in this good cause should furnish our Secretary promptly with all necessary information, viz: as to their success in organizing auxilinry societies and raising funds. Also, that they will acquaint him with the wants of the people, and how they may be met in different parts by the operations of our society.

It is expected we will have a semi-annual meeting of the officers and managers of the Conference Tract Society at Jackson, Miss., on the 5th day of June next, and we should be happy to have all the items of interest at our command touching this great moral movement. Yours, in Christ,

H. H. MONTGOMERY,
President Mississippi Conf. Tract Society.
R. J. HARRIS, Vice President.

HUGH MILLER ON THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

Mr. Hugh Miller, writing in the Edinburgh Witness, remarks of this decree: "You might steal God from them without their knowing it," said one in speaking of Romanism—Blot out the name of God from some latin prayers, where it still remains, and would any void or alteration ensue in the worship of the Roman Church! We do not say that this decree formally enacts that there is no God, but we maintain that its effect is to obliterate God from the minds and beliefs of the people of the Roman Church. The decree bids them not to pray to God, nor look for any Blessing from God, nor cherish any love to God, nor even think of God. It is, we strongly suspect, the filling up of the cup, for it is the last truth of the Bible left standing now blotted out. It is not the manner of that Church to deny truth in the way of leaving its place a blank, but to deny it in the way of displacing it by the antipodal error. In this way has she gone the whole round of revelation, extinguishing one light after another; and now all is dark—darkness that may be felt. She denied the atonement by substituting the sacrifice of the mass; she denied the existence and agency of the Spirit by substituting the sacraments: she denied Holy Scripture by substituting tradition. There remained only a belief in a God; and now the Church of Rome has blotted out the last truth by a decree which is tantamount to proclaiming the divinity of Mary, and which fixes her, in the feelings and beliefs of the members of that Church, as the supreme and only God. However divergent their courses and diverse their forms, all errors have a common point of meeting: and thus the infidelity of Voltaire and the superstition of the popes have found at length their common culminating point in Atheism. "There is no God," said the French Convention, when they celebrated the apotheosis of a female at Notre Dame; and Pius IX. and his bishops re-echo the cry from beyond the Alps, in the apotheosis of Mary in St. Peter's, "There is no God."

THE HOUSEHOLD DESPOT.

LITTLE WILLIE.

Little Willie, with his laughing eyes and rosy mouth; father's idol, mother's darling. Baby Willie! In him is the germ of a great and good man, or a wicked one. Who can tell what his destiny shall be?

Willie is rich. Those broad lands will be his. Plenty smiles on him, fortune favors. He is considered a most extraordinary child! Nobody dares cross the little darling. Servants yield, visitors are secondary, parents subunit to his whims. Pa says "his little man must not be governed, lest his spirit be cowed." Mamma "can't bear to hear dear cry." Thus at this tender age a spirit of obstinacy is inculcated. "Cry, Willie, and you can get everything that you wish for or want." Father and mother bow in humble obeisance to the mandates of the household despot. Willie cries for a cigar to smoke, like Pa, and then a simultaneous echo of applause rings from parlor to kitchen at the wonderful acquirement of little Willie.

Soon his childish voice is taught to lisp an oath or two, and at the next dining she is persuaded to repeat them for the amusement of the company. His father learns him to quaff the ruby wine, as quite a manly attribute. Taught in infancy that smoking, swearing and drinking are the most essential qualities of manhood, will he deviate from them in riper years? Will those rare virtues which are taught only at the pious mother's knee, temperance, industry, contentment, charity, self denial, accompany him in his voyage over life's stormy main, if he does not learn them now? There is for little Willie a dark and trying ordeal beyond the clear blue vale of childhood; a tumultuous sea, over which to steer safely to the opposite shore requires a firm arm. Is he prepared to brave the raging billows? Are his hands taught to stem the overcoming floods?

Oh! how important to impress the youthful mind with a desire of excellence, a spirit of usefulness; to teach them self-control and obedience. Are parents discharging their duty to their children their country, their Creator, when they permit their dear ones to grow up the slaves of their own passions? What a threatening future frowns on one like little Willie! How many instances have we of the ruin of noble hearts and dispositions by false education at home! Whose sons fill our prisons? Whose boys spread infidelity and scourge the land with idleness and dissipation? Who among my readers has a little Willie?

PROGRESSION.

SHADY HILL, Feb. 22, 1855.

Yes, Mr. Editor, that is the word. Why, it is everywhere, and in every thing. Why not, then, in religion and in Methodism? Shall we be forever fettered by and tied down to old fashioned usages and obsolete customs? The spirit of the age, the spirit of progression is against it. Let us assert our independence of these restraints, and, as religion, lets, keep pace with the march of improvement and refinement.

It is not enough that we build larger and finer churches than formerly; the demand of the age is for something more than this. We are not only increased in numbers, until we have become the largest Christian denomination in the union, but we are drawing to our communion the most wealthy, refined and fashionable of our citizens. The wants of these, however, generated, are as real as those of the humbler and poorer classes. Our ministry now will rank, in point of erudition, philosophy and eloquence with those who rank highest. The gay, the fashionable, the critical and fastidious compose our congregations.

Truly, it is gratifying to see that many of the churches, especially in our cities, are waking up to a sense of their true position, and are furnishing the right kind of food to these new friends of Methodism. It is time to throw off those ridiculous customs and usages which have so long kept our Church in the background, and driven the elite and refined into other congregations and communions. The rising generation are much in advance of their fathers in wisdom and intelligence; and why should we not gather those into our fold, who, by their position and influence, would reflect credit upon and give caste to our denomination! Let old fogyism whine and snarl; its days are numbered among Methodists.

These reflections were suggested by seeing a notice in your paper recently of an accession to the M. E. Church in Carondelet street of a fine toned organ. In the city of St. Louis, too, I perceive they have recently erected a noble edifice for Methodist worship at a cost of $55,000 dollars, the pews of which, all handsomely and softly cushioned, have been rented out to the occupants. Good signs, these. Now there is a prospect of good music, none of the antiquated, dolorous sort, made by the discord of so many inharmonious voices, but really scientific music, performed by those who understand it artistically, and whose sole business it will be to make melody for the people, accompanied by the deep and mellow tones of a truly devotional machine. I like the division of labor in worship. Besides, what an attraction a noble organ and an organized choir of singers are to the young and the refined tastes of present day. Scores who would otherwise never visit our congregations, or perhaps spend the Sabbath in dancing, or some less innocent amusement are thus drawn among us, and give tone and character to our worship. Then, the pew system: who can deny the advantage it possesses every way over the antiquated free bench plan! It changes the very character of this worshippers. These become much more select, and the coarse and vulgar are exchanged for the more polite and genteel. The old rude choruses and hallelujah songs, suited only to colored congregations and camp-meeting assemblies, will utterly die out under such a system, and the ejaculatory amens and groanings of the vulgar no more offend the taste or shock the weak nerves of the congregations.

Our preachers, too, will have to improve their style. Many of the old fashioned, off-hand speakers will necessarily have to retire. The present age calls for something more literary and philosophic than these can furnish. Enlightened and fastidious congregations demand that perfection of style which can only be met by written discourses. It is encouraging to see that so many of our most talented and popular preachers have already adopted the plan of reading their sermons. Many junior members of our Conferences are in this way fast acquiring reputation beyond their years and capacities. It gives great precision to the thought of the inexperienced speaker, and does not disturb the quiet and pleasant repose of the audience. Indeed, it has many advantages to both preacher and people. The labor of preparation is not so great, and the reader is in no danger of stopping for want of something to say, except, perhaps from losing the place. To avoid this I would recommend the moving of the finger along gently with the lines, first one hand and then the other. This adds to the effect. Our young people of both church and congregation, when they form matrimonial alliances, are never ashamed of having the ceremony performed by these improved ministers, instead of employing, as they would otherwise be constrained to do, the more polite and refined clergy of other denominations.

Why should we be sensitive to the charge of apeing others? The age requires that we should advance, and no longer cling to obsolete customs. A service confirmatory of our probationers, when received into full connection, has long been felt as a want among us, and I understand that the confirmation service of another communion, even to "the laying on of hands," has been adopted by some of our preachers. True, some find fault with this, but it is certainly innocent in itself, especially if the candidate is informed that the preacher does not actually, but only in form, confer the Holy Ghost.

Why need we be behind the age? Methodism is not now as it once was, principally the religion of the poor and illiterate, but its increasing influence has invited into its folds many of the first families, leading members of society, and the aspiring for the honors of the land. Public men and office holders are no longer ashamed to enrol their names among us, and everything shows change and improvement is called for. Class meetings have become unpopular, and are fast becoming obsolete. Some of our preachers think them unsuited to the present state of society. I have but little doubt that we may soon dispense with them altogether. And who will doubt but that we shall gain many more friends than we shall lose by such a course. Surely there is cause for congratulation in the rapid advance of the M. E. Church of late years. How enlarged her influence! Many have been brought into her communion who but a few years ago would have spurned such connection, and who would still do so if the same old fashioned ways and ridiculous singularity of dress and manners existed among us.

A few more slight changes, which I may at some future time suggest, and we shall meet the views of the most fastidious, and be able to cope in any point of view with any and all sister denominations.

PHILOSKOMOS.

WAR POETRY.

Of all the subjects with which verse has to do, there is no one that affords so great an opportunity for the display and exercise of real poetic talent as war, nor any one which is so dangerous for mediocrity. From its simplest to its sublimest form, from the uprising of a single man to the conflict of great hosts, there is a picturesqueness and suggestiveness attending it eminently favorable to the uses of a poet. There is not only the objective in its highest form, but also the subjective in its grandest and most inspiriting shape; not only the clamming of banners, the sheen of sharp swords, the neighing of war horses, the heavy tramp of infantry, and the sound of the trumpet—but the courage, the bravery, the resolution, the will, indomitable even unto death, that attend and vivify them. Every thing needful to the creation of great, fiery thought, worthy of bold and burning utterance—every thing necessary for word-painting as gorgeous as the colors of Titian, and as masculine as the frescoes of Angelo, can be found in war. It is of all subjects the most poetic.

It is, too, of all subjects the oldest, and in all literature the most prominent. We fall in the Bible nothing sublimer or more notable than the battle-pictures it contains; in the Greek, nothing more grand than the epic that records the siege of Troy; in the Latin, nothing more masterly than the Eneid; in the English, nothing more durable than Milton's War of the Angels. It is not in its epic form only or chiefly, however, that war has its most popular and brilliant incarnation. The runes of the Norsemen, embodied in their eddas and sagas, the battle-songs of the Vikings, the war chaunts of the Normans, the ballads that have preserved to our time a memory of Vladimir and his Paladins, Arthur and his Round Table Knights, Charlemagne and Barberossa were lyrical altogether—were short, sharp, strong expressions of individual feeling, as hard as the anvil of a smithy, as clear as a ray of the sunlight. They were rough but never redundant; rude but not effeminate; bold and manly, not lavished and voluptuous. They rang like the ringing of swords in a great fight, and woke up by their magic all the warrior spirit that lay in the hearer's heart. No man, with the soul of a mouse in his breast, can listen, even in these days of trade and peace-conventions, to Chevy Chase or Campbell's odes, without being a hero for the time.

It has been remarked before, that the earlier ages of a nation's existence were the most favorable for heroic poetry as well as individual daring—for Homers as well as Hectors. There may possibly be some doubt as to whether personal bravery is greater at one time than another, but history seemingly proves but it is more tersely and sententiously recorded in the infancy of letters, than when letters come to be a trade pursued by those who have no other pursuit. In the earlier times the story is told for the story's sake, and not for the sake of the telling. Subsequently the telling usurps the place of the story. In the commencement there is strength of language—at the conclusion there is beauty of expression. In one epoch we have the Gladiator, with swelling throes and sinews—in the other Venus, with every limb rounded to perfection, and every dimple exact to the ideal. Which of these is best suited to the subject there can be little hesitancy in deciding. For love and love's pleasures, let us have the sentimentalities of to-day; for the fierce frays of the battle and the combat, when men put glory into the scale with life and find the latter to kick the beam, give us, by all means the roughness, but the earnestness and fire of those who really knew hero-worship as a fact, and sang,

"La guerre est ma patrie
Mon harnois ma maison,
Et en toute saison
Combattre c'est ma vie."

The progress of the present war, engaging the strength of four great countries and the attention of the world, abounding in incident and opportunities for poetic exertion, has seen nothing accomplished, from the Laurcate to the littlest bardling, at all worthy of taking rank above the usual run of Miss Nancyisms. We have some pretty, finical rhymes and verses, composed of well-weighed words, but not bling to make the blood tingle and pulse with the force of a high-pressure engine; nothing to make the hand close as around a sword-hilt and the eye fire with unwonted light. In fact, war poetry is not as a thing of the present.

This state of things is owing to no degeneracy of public spirit, no weakness of popular appreciation, no want of heroic daring. The courage displayed during the war has been fully recognized, and all now wanted is the embodiment of the sentiment in never-dying verse—an utterance worthy of the time and all future times. Who is the man gifted to comprehend and express—to grave in durable letters the poetry of the age? If there be such, let him come forth.

IMPROVEMENT IN IRELAND.—The Irish are buying up Ireland, and a capital operation it is. Under the "Encumbered Estates bill," which provides for the sale in small lots of large landed estates burdened with debts, land to the value of one hundred millions of dollars has passed into the hands of the poor people. The effects of the measure in stimulating enterprise and thrift, is said to be wonderful, and its results are seen in the rapid decrease of pauperism in the public almshouses. There is a future for Ireland, sure.

A SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

We acknowledged, the other day, the receipt of an act lately introduced into the Legislature of this State, entitled "An act to create and incorporate the Southern Pacific Railroad Company." The 1st section is in the following words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the States of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and California; the cities of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and such other parishes and counties in said states and such politic, corporate or municipal associations and individuals as shall be willing to unite with them for that purpose, by subscribing for, taking or becoming holders of any of the stock hereinafter provided for, are hereby made, constituted and created a body corporate and politic, for the purpose of locating, constructing, operating and maintaining a railroad, with one or more tracks, from some point on the Mississippi river, between New Orleans and St. Louis, by such line, as is or may be deemed to the act of the Legislature of the State of Texas, approved June ninth 21 1854, entitled "An act to provide for the construction of the Mississippi and Pacific railroad;" and uniting with the road built upon such line by such route as may be found most advantageous and convenient; or from the Western terminus or terminal point of such road or roads, running thence to any point on the Pacific ocean or Gulf of California, as the transport, carry, and convey passengers and the mails, troops and munitions of war of the United States or any of the States thereof, upon said road and branches, by steam power, or any other power or combination of powers proper to be used thereon; and to build and own said road and branches, and the lands and tenements attached thereto, with the appurtenants, in fee simple forever."

The bill, which is altogether too long to be transferred to our columns, can be pretty well understood by the following statement of its provisions, that we compile from the bill itself. It ordains that the company shall commence the road from some one point at least on the Mississippi river, or at the terminus of some road running west from some point on that river, not above St. Louis, within three years from the date of the act; shall complete said road to El Paso within ten years from the date of the act; and to some point on the Pacific ocean or Gulf of California within fifteen years from the date of the act; and on failure and default in either such case, the rights, privileges and franchises granted by this charter shall ipso facto cease and determine; that the capital stock of said company shall be one hundred millions of dollars, which may be increased from time to time to any sum not exceeding the entire cost of survey, construction, equipment and putting into operation of said road and branches; divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, to be issued and transferred at such place and in such manner as may be ordered and provided by the Board of Direction; and it may go into operation and be organized whenever shares of stock to the amount of twenty millions of dollars have been subscribed for and taken; that the business of said company shall be conducted at its domicil in the city of New Orleans, by a board composed of eighteen directors, who shall be stockholders, and one in addition, not necessarily a stockholder, to be appointed by each of said States that shall subscribe for and take stock of said corporation to the amount of two millions of dollars or upwards. A quorum shall consist of at least nine directors. The directors, at their first meeting, shall elect a president of the company, not necessarily a stockholder nor one of themselves, who shall hold his office for the term of six years, and until his successor is elected. At all elections by the stockholders and all their meetings, each share shall be entitled to one vote.

Each State may subscribe such amount as it may determine, either in money or stocks, bearing interest, or in its bonds, payable to said corporation, having not less than thirty years to run, bearing interest at a rate not less than five per cent. The Company is authorized to obtain the ownership of necessary soil from any foreign government; to stipulate to maintain military posts along the line of road, to aid in repelling Indian incursions and infractions of the revenue laws; and, to carry out such stipulations, the Company may maintain an armed force in such foreign country, pay the troops employed by it, build forts or other defenses, and purchase arms, ammunition and military stores.

The Company is empowered, also, to establish a telegraph line along its road, and telegraph offices at its terminii and at intermediate points, and to fix the rates and charges for messages sent. It shall not exercise banking powers nor issue paper for circulation; but, should it acquire mines in Sonora, or elsewhere, it may coin money of the value and similar to the coin of the United States.

These are the general and important provisions in the bill now before our Legislature, chartering a Southern Pacific Railroad; of which John H. Overton, Emile La Sere, Charles G. Young, M. O. H. Norton, Samuel W. Oakey, Wm. H. Goodrich, and Robert J. Ward, of Louisiana; Albert Pike, of Arkansas; John S. Preston, of South Carolina; James Lyons, of Virginia; George W. Crawford, of Georgia; Thomas Fearn, of Alabama; R. C. Beckley and John Overton, of Tennessee; Nicholas D. Coleman, of Mississippi; James H. Lucas, of Missouri; George Hancock, of Kentucky; and Middleton T. Johnson, of Texas, or any nine of them, are created a provisional Board of Direction for the purpose of organization, until the first regular Board of Directors shall be elected and organized.

Now, we are just as strongly in favor of a Pacific Railroad as any one, and believe that it not only ought to be, but will be built, and that, too, by a private company, and in the time of men now living. We believe, too, that it should be Southern; that it should start from New Orleans, run across Texas to El Paso, in Chihuahua, and from there to San Francisco. There is no argument in favor of building the road at all that is not more applicable to this route than to that which runs all through and around the State of Missouri, or branches off in any other direction. But we cannot find time or space now, nor would it be profitable, to discuss this much debated question of the best route. The thing in hand is the bill at present under the elaborate consideration of our learned Legislature. Such a bill—or a bill running to such an end—has been passed in New York and Missouri, already. There is no just reason why Louisiana should not have her bill on the same subject just as extensive and grand as broad in its scope and as far-reaching in its effects. But we object to the feasibility of this one. It is not a mere railroad company. It is an East India charter for the United States. It is a great political-commercial organization, endowing that organization with the right of making treaties; of making war and peace; of enrolling armies and building forts; of creating arsenals, purchasing foreign territory; of digging mines and coining money; of constructing telegraph lines and erecting station houses.

It is one of the most enormous, gigantic, and in many respects impracticable schemes of the age—impracticable and impossible, because, if each one of the States named, worn by the solemn act of their respective Legislatures, to acquiesce in and endorse this proposed charter, it would be illegal. By the Constitution, no single State, nor no combination of States, possesses the right to make war or peace, to erect forts, to coin money, to purchase foreign territory; and it is an old maxim of law that no vendor can convey a valid right and title to any thing in which he has no right and title. Undoubtedly, these unnecessary clauses will be stricken out in an early day of the discussion on the bill, and then it will be more practical as well as practicable.

We have seen no estimates as to the probable cost of building a road from here to San Francisco, via El Paso, and therefore cannot say whether the sum of one hundred millions is too much or too little. If it is correct, there ought to be no difficulty in procuring it.

A contract could probably be made with the United States Government for the conveyance of its mails, soldiers and munitions of war, for an indefinite period, the Government making advance payment to assist in the construction of the road. With this sum for a nucleus there would be little difficulty in negotiating for the remainder. If each of the States named would take its share of $2,000,000—making an aggregate of $30,000,000—or if they would take one-half, individuals would take the remainder, or it could be raised on the bonds of the company.

The importance of a Pacific Railroad to the whole country, and particularly to the city and section which is to be its eastern terminus, has been written almost threadbare. The different schemes for its construction, and the different routes on which it ought to be built, are hardly more novel. We have dropped them altogether, and contented ourselves with mentioning those things in which the Baton Rouge scheme seems to us to be erroneous. We do not need East India companies in New Mexico, or private armies in Chihuahua, or Independent States in California.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

WASHINGTON, March 4.—Both branches of Congress adjourned at noon to-day sine die.

The Senate adopted the reports of the committees of conference on the Army and Post-office Appropriation bills.

The bill for the admission of Oregon as a State was rejected.

In Executive session, Messrs. Gilchrist, of New Hampshire, Lumpkin, of Georgia, and Blackford, of Indiana, were confirmed as Commissioners of the new Board of Claims.

The House agreed to the Senate amendment to the General Appropriation bills, striking out the clause modifying the tariff.

The Senate amendment to the Post-office bill, requiring the pre-payment of postage in all cases, was adopted.

The bill to prevent the ingress of foreign criminals and paupers was tabled.

The report of the Committee of Conference on the naval appropriation bill was concurred in.

The Ocean mail steamship bill makes full appropriations for the ocean mail service, except in the case of the Collins line, nothing in reference to which is contained in it. The continuance of the line is therefore left optional with the President.

The usual vote of thanks to Speaker Boyd was opposed by Mr. Hunt, of Louisiana.

The National Agricultural Society.

Great importance is attached to the action of the National Agricultural Society, now in session here, in opposition to the Reciprocity Treaty, which it is thought will lead to the ultimate amalgamation of the agricultural interests of the country with the Know-Nothings.

WASHINGTON, March 3.—In the Senate to-day, every imaginable scheme to deplete the Treasury was brought forward as an amendment to the Appropriation bills.

Great confusion has prevailed.

The report of the committee of conference on the Army bill has been agreed to, and the General Appropriation bill passed.

—The Ocean Mail Steamer Appropriation bill was vetoed by the President on account of the Collins steamer amendment.

The Senate struck out the amendment, and re-passed the bill by the necessary two-thirds vote.

The amendment to the Navy bill, providing for Texas, was passed.

In the House, the bill appropriating $100,000 for the improvement of Savannah River, was passed.

The report of the Committee of Conference on the Indian Appropriation bill was rejected.

The President's veto of the Ocean Mail Steamer bill was sustained by yeas 98, nays 70.

It is probable the session of Congress will be continued until noon of to-morrow.

Death of Robert Mills.

WASHINGTON, March 3.—Robert Mills, the architect of the Capitol, died to-day.

Appointments.

It is stated that Messrs. Sherkey of Mississippi, Wadsworth of New York, and Waldo of Connecticut, have been appointed Judges of the Court of Claims.

New York Market.

NEW YORK, March 3.—The commercial letters by the steamship Canada are very gloomy, and have imparted a dull feeling to our market. Flour has slightly advanced, with sales of common to good Ohio brands at $9 00 to $9 50 per barrel.

On the afternoon of the 27th, the house of Senator Benton, in Washington, was destroyed by fire. The furniture was saved. The house in which he resided was occupied by Mr. McLaine, Secretary of the Coast Survey Society—were at one time on fire, but the flames were arrested in time to save them from destruction.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1855.

Our Bible House.

The 20th annual Report of the Managers is just issued from the Creole office, and to the courtesy of the Corresponding Secretary, Dr. Capen, we are indebted for a copy. We shall have somethiug to say hereafter. For the present we give an extract from the report read at the Society's Anniversary, December 17, 1854.

The Bible House fronts on Camp street, between Girod and Julia streets. Exclusive of portico, the building is 75 by 27 feet and three stories high. The report says:

The entire cost of the building and the lot upon which it stands, will be, with slight variations either way, $18,000, of which $3,500 remain to be provided. During the past year but $2,119 have been added to the building fund, while a considerable increase of expense in completing and fitting the various parts of the building, in the most permanent and convenient manner, has been unavoidable. Of the sum named as still due upon the building, $1,500 are needed in cash immediately, to enable the building committee to meet its authorized engagements.

The Church Property.

The Southern Methodist Church suit against the Book Concern, at Cincinnati, was amicably settled by the Commissioners, February 16th.

The terms are as follows: The Book Concern is to pay the Methodist Episcopal Church South $600,000, and the Southern debts; $200,000 in stock, and the balance in cash—$15,000 down, the remainder in installments of one, two, three, four and five years. It is understood that the Book Concern pays the taxable costs yet due, and that they endorse the debts and notes of the Southern preachers without recourse.

As to all other costs, each party pays its own.

DULL TIMES IN PICKENS.—"We have dull times up here," writes a renewing subscriber at Carrollton, Pickens county, Ala., February 28. "The snow of last Sunday is still on the northern sides of the roofs, and ice forms all day in the Shade. The river (Tombigbee) is at low water mark; no mail, no sugar, no coffee, no flour; and what is consoling no whisky."

THE ORLEANS PANORAMA.—A paper just published by Messrs. Dejean, Thompson & Livingston. Mr. Livingston presided over the first number of the Christian Advocate. We have known him since, and want no better guarantee that the Patriot will be a readable, instructive and workman-like sheet.

BUNYAN'S PANORAMA.—Our citizens are now enjoying this rare moral and artistic treat. The dreamer's vision unrolls before you—character after character coming to view as Bunyan drew it; till the dark river is crossed. One of our secular exchanges says it preaches with forty-parson power. Go and see it.

SERIOUS THOUGHTS FOR MINISTERS.

The grand scope of the Christian ministry is to bring men home to Christ.—R. Hall.

I see that spirituality is the main qualification for the work of the ministry.

Your work is to save souls.

The readiest way of finding access to a man's heart is to go to his house.—Chalmers.

In preaching, study not to draw applause, but groans from the hearers.—Jerome.

A minister who is a "man-pleaser" is a soul destroyer.

Let every minister, while he is preaching, remember that God is one of his hearers.

Let Jesus Christ be all in all. Study Christ, preach Christ, live Christ.—M. Henry.

Preach no sermon without lifting up your heart to God, both before and after its delivery, that it may be blessed to the people.

One soul converted to God is better than thousands merely moralized, and still sleeping in their sins.—Bridges.

Melancthon says of Luther, "I have often found him in tears, praying for the Church."—Funeral Sermon, 1746.

Frequently visit your Sabbath schools if it be only to walk through them.

Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers.—Acts, xx., 28.

EDITORIAL RULES.

The New York Observer lays down the following rules of editorial conduct, with which, in general, we cordially concur:

"1. The editors do not return manuscripts declined.

"2. We request our subscribers to forward to us early intelligence, religious or secular, with or without comment. To be of value to us it must be sent immediately.

"3. We do not wish communications which are sent to other papers also. Especially we decline statements published elsewhere."

A Winking Time.

Just so kind is this hint in the Presbyterian to a lady, not a professor of religion, but alive to the inconsistencies of those

She expresses it as her opinion ... time for the importation of winking ... from Rome was well chosen, when ... Protestant Christians were so often ... in the dance, and the Church ... the practice!

A Morning With Our Readers.

Reader, it may help you to understand the inside workings of the Advocate, and put you in active sympathy with the editor and correspondents, if we introduce you to the sanctum. Take some morning for it—say this very morning, which happens to be Tuesday.

Sanctum plain looking. Clerk, who always has an eye to policy, says it should be kept so, lest our patrons visiting us should think we are growing rich—which is not the fact. It is not over abundant in sitting or lounging accommodations, lest loafers should abound also.

Exchanges are filed round the room, for reference rather than appearance. A glance reveals many "Advocates," making a favorable impression of periodical co-operation and Methodist unity. Here they all are, speaking one language, and amenable, electorally and financially, to the one highest tribunal of the Church. Local adaptations they present, as they ought; but substantially they are one Concern, with so many branches.

If the Book Concern does not reach the people, the Paper Concern does. Its issues are weekly, and diffused through all these lands by the United States mails. The colportage system itself is ontdone. At all the great points in the Church's territory is an outspoken Advocate of the doctrines and economy of Methodism; a sentinel ready to give alarm of any invasion and repel any assault, by the quickest and strongest of all worldly methods, the press. An Advocate at Richmond, Charleston, St. Louis, Memphis, Nashville, Galveston and NewOrleans. What an arrangement for war or peace!

Then on every creek, and Bayou, and river; in every county, and district, and parish, and town, is an itinerant preaching the Gospel and extending the Church, who counts it part of his duty, as his pleasure, to be an agent for the Advocate. What an admirable system! Besides being an agent, he is also a correspondent: sends in news of how the battle goes on—revivals, conversions, protracted meetings, chapels built and dedicated, Sabbath Schools established, &c.

Thus, while public opinion is being formed by an evangelical press, the fellowship of the Church is kept alive.

The Advocates of Northern Methodism are equally well distributed to command and permeate these lands, over which it was and is its purpose to spread scriptural holiness. The children and the household learn to read them and look through them upon the world.

Among our exchanges are the organs of other denominations; many of them ably conducted, but lacking this unity. This is seen in their names: Herald, Witness, Banner, Observer, &c.; and in their contents, also.

Among our Methodist exchanges we must not omit the organ of Methodism in Canada, another Advocate; and the Watchman, in London, and the Archives du Methodisme, in Paris.

But meantime the mail has been brought in, and here are letters to be read, filed, answered and variously digested.

Twenty-nine in all. Every one prepaid but two, thanks to postage stamps and the thoughtful courtesy of correspondents.

Let us sample the most salient ones:

No. 1.—"Enclosed is $5 for prepayment of the New York Conference Seminary advertisement, herewith sent. Please advertise to that amount."

Abuse Yankees as much as you please, they are sensible. They know how to make five dollars turn out five hundred dollars. This teacher, away out in Scoharrie, has read somewhere that the Advocate has a larger circulation than any paper in New Orleans.

It abuses the Abotitionists—but what of that? He wants to get before the public and get pupils. And he knows how to select his medium, and how to pay.

No. 2 is from the postmaster of C. C. A. It would take a Philadelphia lawyer to unravel it. Mr. C. subscribed and paid for one year; before the year expired "sold out his claim to a man by name of A——, (we quote literally,) and moved away, and died shortly thereafter." The complaint, if we understand it, is that the paper still comes in his name. How did we know of the bargain?

No. 5.—A notice that J. D. refuses his paper at the post office. Look at the books. J. D. owes for one year and three months!

Nos. 6 and 9.—Preachers sending in subscribers and notices, and the post offices in their bounds; asking accounts to be sent, &c. Very acceptable.

No. 11.—Rather tart: the writer is in a bad humor. Says he ordered his paper stopped some months ago, and "it keeps coming regular still." We did not get the notice. Glad to hear that the paper "comes regularly," inasmuch as some have discontinued because it did not.

No. 14.—Ah! noble. From a lay brother, full of cheer. He sent twenty new subscribers, and from among his neighbors, last year, and will renew them all this. Tells that the mails are so deranged at Alexandria that his own and four other post offices in the parish have for five weeks been deprived of any newspaper mail from the city. For this he does not blame us at all. One of his neighbors, a subscriber, has moved to Texas. Gives the office, that this paper may move too. How many people are going to Texas!

No. 16.—Long obituary about a child a few months old. Tells what it died of; how long it was sick; where it was born, and winds up with poetry as long as the little one's grave. Can't put it in. Will lose a subscriber, perhaps; but can't in justice to those that remain.

No. 17.—Know that hand; often hear from him; and where he is, there is the Advocate. Has averaged six new subscribers a month since Conference; and, notwithstanding hard times, thinks he can keep it up the whole year.

No. 21.—A letter asking to use influence in getting a music teacher for some academy, somewhere. Describes him. This one of the unpaid. Of course will attend to it!

No. 22.—Model. On one leaf a list of subscribers' names and offices, fairly written out. On the other, two obituaries. Divide them: one to the clerk, one to the printer.

No. 24.—Wrath in this letter. Begins, "Gentlemen." Stop his paper. Dont come regularly. Query—If he takes another will the matter be helped any? The mail serves us all. Look at his account. All square. Well, that's right. He has a right to stop.

No. 25.—Sunshine again. Opens thus:

"I have been a subscriber, and a reader, too, of the Advocate from its first number, and could not be driven from it by any advance in price. And as my year is nearly if not quite out, I enclose two gold dollars for 1855."

No. 29.—Looks fat, but no money in it Song, three pages. Read it all. Tells of hard times on T. District. But he intends to put the Advocate in every family. Gets merry over the hard times. Likes a certain article; wants to know who wrote it. Suggests a subject for an editorial. Thinks all editors had better look out, these hard times; that they will soon sing, with one accord:

> "How blessed are they
> Who their subscriptions do pay,
> And cast up their accounts in good time."

Well, we like sunshine in men's souls as well as in the heavens. It was lucky that this letter came last. Leaves a pleasant farewell.

Summing up: Two good communications and two doubtful, with a strong tendency to the "stove." No poetry, for a wonder. Some complaints and many commendations. The first from people (in our private opinion) very cross anyhow, and the latter very clever. Five subscribers dead, moved away or stopped; twenty-two new ones; nett increase, seventeen. Money enough received, multiplied by seven, to meet our weekly expenses—almost, not quite.

Now for the papers.

Funeral Sermon.

The death of Bishop Capers has been the cause of several affectionate and eloquent pulpit offerings in the Southern Church.

One of these, the only one yet published, was preached by Rev. J. Cross, in Charleston. It was addressed to a people in whose hearts the deceased was enshrined with many beautiful and dear memories.

Text—"My Father, my Father! The chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof." The career and character of Elijah are drawn out, and by parallels and similarities the funeral discourse is developed.

The preacher does not essay a critical estimate of his subject, leaving that for another, in deference; but he makes an allusion eminently characterizing: "There was no artistic arrangement of topics. All was simple; all was natural."

Mellifluous is an epithet that belonged to the late Bishop's speech more than any we ever listened to. He was in no danger of that canon of criticism, "What stumbles at the threshold (the ear) can never be favorably received into the mind."

His manner of expounding Scripture had an air of colloquial ease. Firstly, and secondly, and thirdly, and lastly, would have sounded strangely from him. So exquisite were his intuitions that the want of these artificial railings and guides never betrayed him into improprieties. His rambles in argument were not deviations, and his impulses as an orator could be safely trusted.

Jay, of Bath, presents more striking resemblances and agreement with Bishop Capers than Elijah. In the autobiography of Jay is a passage in reference to his own style, singularly applicable to our subject:

"Divinity cannot be taught at the college without system; but in preaching, it is better that many things be assumed than technically discussed. It is better for the preacher to give way to his holy and fervent feelings, than to be chilled and checked by the apprehension of some supposed inconsistency. It is better to let the text speak its own language, naturally and glowingly, than to use coercive measures, and torture out the meaning, or bombard it into submission."

KEEP THE HEART ALIVE.

The longer I live the more expedient I find it to endeavor more and more to extend my sympathies and affections. The natural tendency of advancing years is to narrow and contract these feelings. I do not mean that I wish to form a new and sworn friendship every day, to increase my circle of intimates; these are different affairs. But I find it conduces to my mental health and happiness to find out all I can which is amiable and loveable in those I come in contact with, and to make the most of it. It may fall far short of what I was once wont to dream of; it may not supply the place of what I have known, felt and tasted; but it is better than nothing. It seems to keep the feelings and affections in exercise; it keeps the heart alive in its humanity; and, till we shall be all spiritual, this is alike our duty and our interest.—Ex.

THE HEBREW MISSIONARY; ESSAYS EXEGETICAL AND PRACTICAL ON THE BOOK OF JONAH—By J. Cross, D. D. Published by Stevenson & Owen, Nashville: 1855. Edited by Dr. Summers.

A neat little volume, which it gives us pleasure to commend to our readers. The author has given some magnificent passages of description, as the TEMPEST by which Jonah was overtaken. The maps and illustrations and the information upon the topography and antiquities of Nineveh, drawn from late and authentic sources, are a valuable contribution to our circulating religious literature. There is excellent preaching in it.

A SERMON ON DENOMINATIONAL EDUCATION. By Dr. Mitchell, of Alabama Conference.

Of this excellent and well timed sermon we had somewhat to say at its delivery. It is now put forth in pamphlet form at the office of the Advertiser and Gazette, Montgomery. It is a superior job of typography and press-work. If you want your sermons well put up, send them to this office.

INEZ; A TALE OF THE ALAMO.—Harper & Bros.: 1855.

It is dedicated to the "Texan Patriots who triumphantly unfurled and waved aloft the Banner of the Lone Star; who wrenched asunder the iron hands of despotic Mexico, and wreathed the brow of the Queen State with the glorious chaplet of civil and religious liberty."

Begins gloriously enough. A thread of Jesuit intrigue runs through the plot. The authoress is said to be a lady near Columbus, Ga. We have it from the publishers through McGinnis, 36 Camp street.

No. III. OF THE STORY BOOKS.—"The Straight Gate" is the title of this number of the beautiful Harper series for boy-and-girl reading.

HARPER'S GAZETTEER OF THE WORLD.—No. X. and the last of this complete world directory is on our table. It includes seven maps. It may be had of McGinnis.

GODEY FOR FEBRUARY.—Our lady friends seldom allow us to get more than a glance. It is an elegant caterer for their tastes.

Worse than Unprofitable Servants.

Such, we opine, will many find themselves reckoned who think they are doing God service by reviling the Southern Church. She is doing alms for those they profess to pity—preaching the Gospel to those they pray for. A friend at hand, and in deed, differs not more from a friend afar off and in word only.

The tone of most of our Northern exchanges, the press and platform orators of Abolitionism, are diseased on this subject. They have a morbid like for misrepresenting Southern preachers, Southern morals, and leveling invectives against the Christianity of the South.

Some of them may plead for forgiveness, because "They know not what they do?"

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Observer, complaining of this blind, brainless and wicked warfare, well says:

"The Indian chief who carried in haste the scalp of Miss McRae to the British officer, presented to him a very unacceptable prize. So we think it will be with that chief who carries to Heaven the bleeding scalp of the Southern Church."

Minden, La.

The Minden Herald says:

"Our Female College, under the efficient management of Professor S. L. Slack, is in a very flourishing condition, having over one hundred young ladies in attendance, with very encouraging prospects for the future. There is a good philosophical apparatus connected with this institution for the use of young ladies, who have the advantage of frequent public lectures and practical experiments and illustrations by the learned and eloquent Professor. The new college building now in the course of construction will be a splendid edifice, and will accommodate about two hundred pupils comfortably. Those who have daughters to educate, and wish them to become thorough scholars, and not merely have a smattering education, would do well to visit our village and examine for themselves."

A few days since the Senate of Louisiana passed a bill appropriating $5,000 to the Minden Female College; said bill contained a provision for the education, free of charge, of two indigent girls from each Congressional District in the State. It was taken up in the House the next day, and, after a spirited discussion of some two hours, the House passed it by a vote of 52 to 8.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

The January number of this periodical has left the office for its destination to the various subscribers scattered throughout the bounds of Southern Methodism. We have sincerely striven to render it worthy of that great and growing denomination of Christians, under whose patronage, and by whose authority, it is published. We enjoy an unalloyed satisfaction in the belief that it is filling, and will yet more completely fill, a chasm in the religious literature of the Church. While it cannot interfere with the success of any of her other periodicals, it occupies a place which they do not propose to reach. The character of its articles is entirely different, and designed to accomplish a higher intellectual object. Its sphere is distinct from theirs, and though it is necessarily more limited, it is sufficiently ample to demand its publication, and to ensure its triumphant support. Thousands of our people have both the leisure and the taste for this species of literature, and every minister of our Church is especially qualified and called upon to be familiar with it. To them, above all others, it is our purpose to make it useful by the array of talent and of resources which we intend, by the help of God, to collect around it. Inasmuch as the entire Church, South, has but one such organ, no pains shall be lacking on our part to constitute it a representative and an exponent of the intellectual life and matured opinions of able men within and without the pale of Methodism, provided they are in harmony with our standards. Our exclusive devotion to it, we regard, at present, as a high and solemn duty, and as indispensable to its required prosperity. It is our deliberate purpose that the Review shall support itself. It ought to do it. It can do it. Its present fiscal condition is decidedly hopeful. The condition of our Publishing House, as recently set forth by the Book Committee, renders it necessary that this branch of the establishment should be self-sustaining. This is our conviction and our wish. We take this occasion to invoke the hearty co-operation of our ministers in every part of our work. Let them take it in hand, and it will not only pay its way, but bring a revenue to the general concern. Its publication in Virginia, we are resolved, shall not make it sectional. It is no doubt best at this time that it should be published here, whatever may be the future action of the agents. We specially and earnestly entreat our preachers on their circuits and stations to present the claims of the Review as a General Conference periodical; to collect its debts, to obtain new subscribers, and to make remittances either to Nashville or to Richmond. It is offered to them at $1.50, and those who send us, either to Nashville or Richmond, a remittance for five new subscribers, shall have the sixth copy sent to them gratis; recollecting that the subscription price to the public is $2 in advance. Each number will be embellished with an elegant portrait of some distinguished minister, worth itself at least twenty-five cents.

The Location of Alabama College.

From the Independent Observer, February 24, published at Greensboro, Ala., we gather the following. Whether regarded as an exhibition of liberality, or a test of an exalted appreciation of the benefits of religious education, it is very gratifying:

"On Saturday last a large company of the citizens of Greensboro and its immediate vicinity convened to adopt incipient measures for securing the location of the college to be established by the Alabama Conference. The right men were there, a noble, generous feeling was there, and the right purses were there. We have never seen such an enthusiasm in an educational enterprise as was exhibited on that occasion.

"In the streets and in the stores, at private houses, and even at and in the church, could be heard speeches about the college.

"The meeting was opened by calling Col. Erwin to the chair, whose introductory speech was one of the most direct and effective that it has ever been our fortune to listen to. The speaker's heart seemed to swell with emotions and aspirations for the diffusion of virtuous knowledge and sanctified education. Indeed, his effort was such as to convince his hearers that what he said came not only from a clear head, but from a deeply interested heart, a heart sympathizing with the masses in the education of their children.

"The Chairman was followed by the Rev. Q. L. DeYampert, who acknowledged that the remarks of Col. Erwin were to him 'like the ointment upon Aaron's beard.' The speech of Mr. DeYampert displayed the tactician, and he hastened to close his effort by subscribing $12,500 for the endowment of a professorship, which was immediately seconded and equaled by Capt. Nelson, who was followed by others, and these by others still, until the list was lengthened by many names, whose signers generously and praiseworthily ran the figures so high as to justify the belief that at and around the town the magnificent sum of $100,000 will be certainly raised to forward the interests of the contemplated college.

"Never were we more gratified in seeing the united purposes of all denominations of Christians—Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and Episcopalians—and men of no church, to build up in their midst an institution of learning to bless the State and the Church.

"In the afternoon there seemed to be a general buzz; persons were astonished at the unanimity and liberality shown on the occasion. Old citizens were heard to say: 'I have never seen such a day at Greensboro! The college is ours; the boys are here; and the money is here!'

"All parties and classes were singularly drawn together. They felt a sympathy for a common cause, and a new attachment to each other. And may that sympathy increase until the whole of Western Alabama and Eastern Mississippi catches the feeling, and magnanimously sustain this noble enterprise of creating, centrally to them all, a college for training young men which will bless the age, and enrich both State and Church with minds cultivated and hearts elevated by a religious education. Money thus expended will liberally remunerate its contributors. Bearing this in mind, let our citizens step forward and cheerfully aid in securing and locating at Greensboro the Male College of the Alabama Conference. Such is the wish of one that has at heart the important subject of male EDUCATION."

Is joy lost? Go immediately to the Lord, he only can restore it: "Restore unto me the joys of thy salvation."

Appeal for the Missionary Treasury.

Every preacher who reads this will please consider himself addressed personally:

MISSION ROOMS, LOUISVILLE, KY., February 20, 1855.

Dear Brother.—From the reports received, it is evident that the amount raised for missions the present year will fall far below the wants of the missionary work. It is necessary that early efforts be made to meet the demands upon us. We therefore write you for your individual effort to raise, as soon as practicable after the receipt of this, the sum of $10, and forward the same by mail to me at this place.

By application to some friend or friends of missions within your reach, this can be easily done, without in the least interfering with the annual collection for the same cause.

For the ensuing year, prompt, vigorous and united action is demanded upon the part of the whole Church, in order to realize the amount which will be needed. While the present call, if responded to as universally as we shall make it, will fully meet the present demand. Let us keep the cause of missions constantly before the minds of the people. It is truly the cause of religion, and the spirit of revival can be very nearly measured by the interest which is manifested in this enterprise.

Let me hear, if you please, immediately from you.

Yours, truly, E. W. SEHON, Miss. Sec.

Methodist Practice Apostolic.

OTHERS VINDICATING IT.

It gives us pleasure to extend the circulation of an article in the Church Herald, 2d inst., headed "Free Pews."

Some of our wisest conservatives have all along been saying to those feverish for change and for doing as others do, "Let us alone. We are right. Broad principles lie underneath us. Others will adopt our plans if we do not abandon them for theirs."

This is proving true as to pew-sittings, sermon-readings, and other items. A denomination does great service to Christianity in developing a distinctive idea and working it out, in the face of opposition.

A few years ago (and even now generally) it was one of the offences of Methodism that it practiced the only plan of church sittings upon which the Gospel could be offered to all. Many a member, many a family, whose convictions and doctrinal affinities were with us, has been turned to the Episcopal and other pewed churches, by being plied with this appeal: "Go to our church, and you may have a pew of your own, select your own company," &c. The pride of distinction and caste has been thus flattered.

We want no better vindication than is furnished by our cotemporaries, below:

"We are rejoiced to see that both in England and the United States the pew system, as it is called, does not meet with as much favor as has been accorded to it in time past. We have often expressed our views upon it, and the more we reflect upon it, the more we are convinced that it is not in accordance with the spirit of the Gospel. Upon a former occasion, we expressed ourselves thus:

"The Church of God ought to be free, for all are invited to enter its sacred precincts. 'Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden.' 'Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money, come ye buy and eat; yea, come buy wine and milk, without money and without price.'

"Deeply impressed with these truths, the Convention of this diocese, held in the year 1845, passed the following resolution:

"'Resolved, That this Convention believes it would greatly conduce to the interest and advancement of the Church were every parish church free to all persons, as it was in apostolic and primitive times. The Convention, therefore, most earnestly recommends to the vestry of every parish where a church may hereafter be erected, to provide that there shall be no pews sold or rented, but the said church shall be open for all persons to worship therein freely. The Convention believes that an equal amount of salary for the minister can be raised by voluntary contribution, and by other means; and regarding the system of selling and renting pews as injurious to the best interests of the Church, and as having a tendency to exclude the poor and humble from becoming stated worshippers therein, it is earnestly hoped by this body that the system will be abolished by the vestries of such churches as have it in their power yet to do so, and by all where the system has been adopted and practiced, where it can be done with the consent of the pew-holders.'

"The Diocese of Mississippi, we believe, was the first to act on this important subject. We say important, because we feel that the true interests of the Church, and of religion, require that the sanctuary, like the air we breathe, should be the common property of all:

"In accordance with the request contained in these resolutions, the pew-holders in Christ Church, Vicksburg, voluntarily surrendered their pews, and the vestry declared the seats free. Since the seats have been free, the history of the parish shows that the rector's salary, and all the wants of the Church, have been more fully met than before.

"The free pew system has succeeded most admirably in Mississippi wherever it has been tried, and we hope to see the day when it will universally prevail.

"We call attention to the subjoined remarks of Dr. Gregory, of New York, upon the subject. We believe them well-founded, and should be pondered by every Christian:

"'It may be humiliating to make the confession, but it is nevertheless the truth, that it is the pride of distinction, more than anything else, that upholds the pew system. The price which a man pays for his pew gives him a certain distinction. He is marked and raised by that; and if a profane swearer, a sharper or an infidel occupies, with his family, one of the costliest pews, he gains thereby a certain social distinction in the congregation, and claims from them and from the minister of the parish, a certain amount of attention, on the ground that he pays for one of the highest pews.

The pride of distinction is further flattered by the pew system in that it allows people to be select in the company with whom they shall sit. "I do not like to run the chance of sitting next to all sorts of people," is the feeling of many, and they experience a very evident self-complacency when they forbid the sexton from bringing strangers to their seat, and invite only such as they may choose.

'This is virtually making that a charity which should be a right, and if the practice were general, it would naturally exclude from the House of God a large class of our fellow-citizens. Can that system be right which thus works against the humility and good will of the Gospel, and promotes those selfish feelings which are the greatest enemies of piety and true religion? Men may argue as much as they will in favor of this pew system as a convenient mode of providing a certain amount of church revenue; it does not even accomplish that with success; and in its principle and moral results it is contrary to the spirit of Christianity.

'All men, and all classes of men, have an equal right to the privileges of the house of prayer, and no man has a right to interpose the social, or pecuniary, or official distinctions of the world, so as to repel the poorest or the meanest kind of all his fellow-creatures from those privileges. It is one of the blessings of the churches of European countries that they are comparatively strangers to the pew system, and that all sorts and conditions of men are welcome to meet together in solemn worship, as much now as when the son of the carpenter and the fishermen of Galilee worshipped side by side with the rabbis of Israel and the rich men of Judah, in the most glorious temple that the world ever saw. Oh! shame upon the foolish pride of Republican America, that here above all the rest of the world, the social distinctions of wealth and fashion should through the pew system, be made prominent in the Church of God, and hinder the Gospel of Christ. Shame upon the ingratitude of a too prosperous state, that here, where success and abundance among all classes and all occupations, more than in any other country, enable men to devise liberal things for the public worship of God and the institutions of Christianity, the sense of Christian duty and the impulses of a free heart should be repressed and paralyzed by the system of rented seats in the Christian sanctuary!

'If we cannot return to the generous abandonment of the age of poverty and persecution, when free will offerings supplied the Church's need, at least let us not increase and render insuperable the obstacles in the way of such return. At least let us exclude the mercenary and selfish methods of revenue from Christianity, and throwing ourselves on the only rule (the truth) which God has ever directly sanctioned, and appealing to men's sense of Christian duty, rather than to the pride of wealth and social distinction, let us trust the Author of Christianity will bless and prosper the better way.'"

The California Assembly Chaplaincy.

The California Legislature has made itself ridiculous upon the Chaplain question. The first invited all resident ministers of the Gospel, including an elder of the Church of Latter Day Saints, to open its sessions with prayer, provided they would do so without money and without price. After trying this system a few days, the resolution of invitation was rescinded, and the Assembly concluded to go to business in the morning without prayers. Then a resolution was offered electing Rev. O. C. Wheeler for his services as Chaplain, and inviting him to continue his attendance upon the same terms. After being talked at awhile, the resolution was laid on the table.

The Assembly should do one of two things. If it does not want a Chaplain, it should say so in a manly way; if it does want a Chaplain, it should say so, engage one or more and pay for their services.

A correspondent of the Christian Advocate there furnishes the following.

"A PRAYER FOR THE ASSEMBLY,

To be read very slowly by the Most Worthy Master Chaplain, while all the defeated candidates for Chaplaincy of the House respond, 'Amen!'

"It is said that Rev. Mr. Woodbridge made an eloquent prayer before the Senate. The informant omitted to state who wrote it. It is possible that the reverend gentleman, being pressed with severe labors, availed himself of the kind offices of a good friend. I have not yet seen it minuted that the Latter Day Saint apostle, Mr. I forget his name, invoked so much as one blessing on the found crania of the 'assembled wisdom.' It is barely possible no friend has furnished him a suitable model. The bare possibility of such neglect so distresses me that I even adventure an attempt to supply the 'lack of service.'

"O Rigdon, and Joe Smith in particular, please to look down, both of you, upon the august assembly of philosophers and demonstrators and Christinne. They have been you grateful and humble servant in the midst of all the people. Open their eyes to the wonderful things in the book of Mormon, and strengthen their hands to do wonderful deeds for the glory of Joseph, the martyred prophet, and Brigham Young, his successor. While I think of it, do bless Brigham, and teach him to swear in the pulpit pell-mell. Also, do these worthy gentlemen in their next convocation. Also, bless Mary Ann, and Tabitha, and Lizzie Jane, and Deborah, and Gretchen, and Iodine, and Violet, and all the rest of his wives and their infant saints. Let our apostles meet with unbounded success among the unmarried women and the widows and married women of England and Wales, and the countries beyond the sea, as well as in this good land, which has been promised to the saints as an inheritance. And do thou teach these worthy gentlemen the true and proper value of dreams and revelations, and of the night, and charms and amulets, and so on, and so on. Teach them, in particular, the beauty and purity of our domestic institution of polygamy. May they learn that it supercedes licentiousness, by permitting a man to marry all his mistresses. Please set up a pure and virtuous brothel on their account. These and many other things please teach them, as soon as convenient, because we are in a great hurry to come up here with our wives and concubines, and sheep and oxen, and hogs and poultry, and 'ho assee and she asses.'—But stop a bit, holy Joseph! may be we shall find some of them last critturs already here. Do so, and amen. DOLON."

HOW TO EMPTY THE CONFESSIONAL.—A story is told of one of the priests of Montreal, that, in order to free himself from the onerous labor of confession in Lent, he gave notice that on Monday he would confess thieves, on Tuesday the misers, on Wednesday slanderers, on Thursday the thieves, and on Friday the libertines, and on Saturday the frail sisterhood. His scheme succeeded, for no one attended.

DEATHS.

DIED—February 13th, James Dozier, infant son of John C. and Elizabeth J. Elbee.

DIED—In peace, in this place, on the 27th February, O. H. Switzer, formerly of Harris county, Ga., aged about 25 years. Although he fell among strangers, he had the best medical aid of the place, conetant attention of numerous friends, and was docently interred in the village grave yard.

Let the triumphant death of this young man encourage the preachers who served this work last year, as he was of the fruit of their revival hors. Dan'l Duncan.

Montgaurlle, Ala., 1855.

STEWARD Brown Hughes was horn in Pickleton District, South Carolina. His father emigrated to Pickene county, Ala., in 1820, where the family have resided up to the present time. Steward professed religion and joined the Protestant Methodist church about twelve yeare ago, and remained a receptable member thereof until he joined the Methodiet Episcopal Church, in 1851. He was married to Miss U. J. Manley, of Pickens county, in 1845, and died at Demopolis, Ala., on the 2d of February last. Brother Hughes had been suffering undor a pulmonary affection ever since last spring, and not have the opportunity of seeing him during his death illness until the day before he died. I then found him on the verge of eternity, his voice weak and husky, his weeping companione and friends surrounding him, to watch the last obbiage of life, and render the offices of kindness in their power, in order to smooth the bed of death, and impart comfort and consolation in the last hour. I found him perfectly rational, and consoious of his departure was at hand. He exercised entire resignation to the will of God; that he had felt a desire to live for the benefit of his family, and that he might be a better man and set a better examplo as a husband, a father, and a citizen. He died very much pleased at my visit, and I did not was much refreshed by his conversation on that occasion. I myself felt that it was profitable to be with him, though but a few moments.

Brother Hughes was a merchant in Vienna, where he had resided for several years. He was an upright man, und endeavored to fill up his station in life with consistency and propriety. His loss will be deeply felt by the community and a large circle of friends and relations. His amiable wife and one interesting daughter especially have met with an irreparable loss. May God temper the wind to the shorn lamb.

Columbus March 1, 1855

DIED—In Talladega county, Ala., January 28, 1855, Mary Jones. She was born in Fredericksburg, Va., and at the time of her death was about 63 years of age. She had been a member of the M. E. Church, South, about seven years, and her department was that of a Christian. Her death was sudden and unexpected to all except herself; for she told her husband at supper that she would die that night, and lay down without seeming to be much ill, and closed her eyes in sleep to open them no more in time, for before the Sabbath morning dawned her spirit was in eternity.

Her Pastor.

DIED—Nancy L. Weathealy departed this life January 15, 1855, in the full assurance of hope. Her faith was triumphant in the last conflict, and she left a good testimeny with her husband and children that she was prepared for Heaven.

Her Pastor.

DIED—In Washington City, on the 5th ult., Lovy, infant daughter of Rev. Dixon W. and Nancy Lewis.

DIED—In Mobile, on the 2d inst., at the residence of his son-in-law, Isaac Bryan, Jr., Benjamin Quarles, aged 68 years.

A CONTRAST.

Near the end of his days the licentious Byron wrote the following lines:

"My days are in the yellow leaf,
The flowers and fruit of love are gone;
The worm, the canker and the grief
Are mine alone"

Near the end of his days "Paul, the aged, wrote to a young minister whom he greatly loved as follows: "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have fiuished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of life, which the righteous Judge shall give me at that day." Is there not a difference between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not?

All experience, as well as conscience, answers yes!

QUARTERLY CONFERENCE RESOLUTIONS.

Pine Grove Church,
Hancock Co., Miss., Feb. 24, 1855.

Mr. Editor—I am requested to send you for publication the following resolutione of the Columbia Circuit (Miss.) Conference:

Resolved, That we, the members of the Columbia Quarterly Meeting Conference of the Mississippi Conference, do highly disapprove of the practice of our membere using as a hevcrage any kind of intoxicating liquors; and that it is not only unchristianlike, but detrimental to the success of the Gospel among us; and that all of our members he respectfully requested to desist from its use.

2. Resolved, That we request the New Orleans Christian Advocate to publish these resolutions, so that other members of our Church on the Columbia Circuit may be notified that we view this practice to be a violation of our rules.

[Signed] John B. Bowen, Pres.
A. Farr, Secretary.

Which Is the Gnat?

The editors of the Church Herald, 19th ult., disapprove of the distinction made between suppers for raising church funds and dancing parties. They speak of "scarching questions" put to these "who strain at the gnat and swallow the camel." They say:

"We would like to hear from some of those who can see no harm in these public suppers, which, from a totally different objection from that stated above, require to be vindicated, and yet see incxpusable impropriety in social dances at private houses, where none but young people, under their parents' eyes, and acquainted intimately with each other, moving in the samo sphere of life, are collected, upon what grounds they justify the one and condemn the other?"

The entire editorial, headed "Dancing Parties and Church Suppers," savers of an apology for dancing parties. We fear the "Now Plan for Getting Recruits," alluded to last week by our correspondent "J.," is extenteively patronized.

The Plain Spoken Captain.—The following anecdote, says the Charleston News, having never been seen in print, we give to our readers. While our goodly city was in possession of the British, during the war of the Revolution, an English officer of rank gave an outertainment, to which soveral American officers, who were prisoners, were invited. Among them was a Captain ——, distinguished as a brave officer, but uncouth in his manners, little conversant with the refluemente of society, and not much given to any "ast phraso of speech." The English officer, who was the host on the festive occasion to which we alluds, had two daughters, one of them distinguished for beauty, and a great belle; the other was remarkably plain, by reason of a defect in one of her eyes. After the removal of the cloth, many sentimeuts were drank, and among them soveral highly complimentary to the beautiful daughter of mine host. Captain ——, with that devotion for the sex which a brave man ever entertains, feeling that the other daughter had been neglected, when called on by the host gave us his sentimeal, "Your daughter sir!"

"Which one, sir?" asked the hospitable entertainer.

"The cock-eyed one sir," responded the well-meaning but plain-spoken captain.

Napier's Statement Contradicted.—In the House of Commons, on the night of 6th inst., Mr. Orawford asked whether Admiral Sir Charles Napier had been censured and dismissed from his command, and whether his instructions had fettered his operations against the enemy.

Admiral Berkeley replied that he regretted that an old and gallant friend should have acted so indiscreetly as Sir Charles Napier was reported to have done in his speech at the Mansion House. It was, however, his duty to inform the House, that Admiral Napier had not been censured—had not been dismissed from his command—had not been goaded to attack any fortress—had not been restricted in any way from attacking those fortresses if he had thought proper—but that he was informed by the Admiralty that the country expected he should perform everything he could with the Cest. He (Berkeley) again regretted Napier's indiscretion—it was a bad example to his officers, and was it worthy of a commander serving with the allied fleet of the French?

SHIP BURNT AT SEA.

New York, March 6.—The clipper ship Arman, from New Orleans, bound for Marseilles, was struck by lightning while on the voyage, and entirely consumed. [The date of the catastrophe is not given.] Her crew were saved by a passing vessel. The Arman was owned by Messrs. Hand & Co., of Baltimore.

The Black Warrior at New York.

The steamship Black Warrior, Capt. Bullock, from New Orleans 24th ult., via Havana 27th, arrived yesterday. She reports that the blockade of the island continued, but that she was not molested by the authorities.

It was rumored at Havana that all foreigners will shortly be compelled to bear arms, or leave the island.

[The Cahawba, at this port, brings dates several days later than the Black Warrior.]

The Nicaragua Steamers.

The Nicaragua steamers will hereafter leave this port on the 5th and 20th of the month, instead of the 12th and 27th, as heretofore.

New York Market.

Our Cotton market is very dull, and prices have declined ½c. per pound. Prices for flour are a trifle higher, with sales of Ohio at $9 25 to $9 62½ per bbl.

The Ostend Confersnce and Mr. Soulé.

New York, March 6.—The Herald and Times of to-day publish a synopsis of the corrospondence which led to the Ostend Conference. The substance of this statsment is that Secretary Marcy wrote to Messrs. Buchanan, Muson and Soulé, our Ministers to England, France and Spain, settiag forth the advantages to the United States, attending the acquisition of Cuba, stating the reasons which led him to believe that Spain was under obligations to France and England, and requesting the three Miaisters to meet at some convenient point to consider the subject. The Ministers accordingly met at Ostend, as is well known, and resolved upon the acquisition of Cuba by purchase, or if necessary, by conquest. Mr. Maroy was not willing to go beyond offers for its purchase, and Mr. Soule, feeling blaiscif treated with indigalty, resigned.

The letters from Secretary Marcy to Mr. Soule are very strong, and instructed him to demand $300,000 indemnity for the outrage committed on the steamship Black Warrior, and to require its payment immedistely. He also intimated that the Africanization of Cuba by Spain would never be allowed.

The correspoalence is very voluminous.

Washington, March 7.—The publication of the correspoudence leading to the Ostend Conference, has created the most profouud excitement hero.

The New Army Brigade.

Washington, March 5.—Much dissatisfaction exists among Democratic Congressmen at the failure of the President to appoint Gen. Shields to the new Brigade of the army, raised for frontier defense.

Washington, March 7.—Forty-two Senators and one hundred and eighty Representatives in Congress have signed a letter to the President, in which they state that the appointment of an additional Brigadier General was made, when it was well known to be the wish of Gen. Shields to receive said appointment.

A Death.

Charleston, March 6.—Rev. Mr. Reynolds, Roman Catholic Bishop of Charleston, died today.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

The United States mail steamship Cahawba, Capt. Shufeldt, arrived at 1 o'clock Wednesday morning, having left New York on the 26th ult., and Havana on the 4th inst.

From purser Gideon, we learn that at Havana everything was quiet, and businass, which had been somewhat interrupted by the recent excitement, was reviving. About six thousand of the inhabitants of the city had volunteered for its defense, and were "armed and equipped," and doing duty in the absence of the "regiments of the line," who were encamped about three leagues from Havana, practising "field manoeuvers." But few arrests had taken place during the past week, and it was generally believed that the Captain-General would deal very mildly with those who had been arrested.

No evidences were observed of a blockade of the port—at least, the Cahawba met with no interruption.

One of the Havana papers states that information had been received, that the expedition had been partially if not entirely broken up. One cause of this, it asserts, is the closeness with which its movements had been watched, and which had caused the membore of it, in the first place, to move from point to point, then to separate, and many of them, if not all, finally to depart homewards. Another reason is alleged to be that the leaders did not think the present an opportune moment for its departure, in which the paper refurred to, with affected naivete, expresses its concurrence.

Two slight shocks of earthquake were felt at St. Jago de Cuba on the 20th ult. They caused no damage; but the inhabitants are beginning to feel much alarm lest a severe one may be about to occur, as this was already the second time they had experienced shocks this year.

The United States steam frigates San Jacinto, Capt. Stribling, and the Princeton, Capt. Eagle, were at anchor in the harbor of Havana. The arrival of these vessels had given great satisfaction to the American residents of that place. The United States frigate Columbia, Capt. Wilson, flag-ship of Commodore Newton, was expected to arrive about the 15th. The Sun Jacinto was to sail for New York on the 5th instant.

The only English man-of-war in port was the sloop-of-war Vestal.

A Tradition of the Arabs.—King Niarod, one day, commanded his three sons to enter his presence; and he caused to be placed before them, by his slaves, three sealed urns. One of the urns was of gold, the second of amber, and the last of clay. The King desired his oldest son to choose from among them that which appeared to contain the treasure of the greatest price. The eldest chose the vase of gold, on which was written "Empire." He opened it and found it full of blood. The second chose the amber vase, on which was written "Glory." He opened it, and found it filled with the ashes of men who had been famous on the earth. The third took the remaining vase—that of clay. He opened it, and found it empty; but in the bottom of it, the potter had written one of the names of God. "Which of these vases weighs most?" demanded the King of his Court. The ambitious replied: "The vase of gold;" the conquerors, "The vase of amber;" the sages answered and said: "The empty vase; because a single letter in the name of God weighs more than the entire globe."

Napier's Statement Contradicted.—In the House of Commons, on the night of 6th inst., Mr. Orawford asked whether Admiral Sir Charles Napier had been censured and dismissed from his command, and whether his instructions had fettered his operations against the enemy.

Admiral Berkeley replied that he regretted that an old and gallant friend should have acted so indiscreetly as Sir Charles Napier was reported to have done in his speech at the Mansion House. It was, however, his duty to inform the House, that Admiral Napier had not been censured—had not been dismissed from his command—had not been goaded to attack any fortress—had not been restricted in any way from attacking those fortresses if he had thought proper—but that he was informed by the Admiralty that the country expected he should perform everything he could with the Cest. He (Berkeley) again regretted Napier's indiscretion—it was a bad example to his officers, and was it worthy of a commander serving with the allied fleet of the French?

The U. S. M. steamship Humboldt put into Southampton on the 13th, being prevented from proceeding to Bremen in consequence of the severity of the weather. The passengers, mails, &c., will be forwarded to Germany overland, and after coaling, the H. will start again for New York, on the 28th inst.

The last detachment of the British troops from India have arrived at Suez.

A telegraphic dispatch dated Bombay, January 10, states that an insurrection had broken out at Cabool. At Candahar the rebels have acknowledged the supremacy of Persia. Twelve thousand were besieging Rendli (Beloochistan). A murderous conflict had taken place, but the besieged continued their resistance.

A French company have offered to take in France a legion, consisting of from [illegible] men, for the service of the English Government. The company engages to supply the number decided upon within the shortest possible time, half to be ready in fifteen days of the contract. In order to effect the undertaking, it is pointed that it shall be permitted to recruit in France, a right according to the recent law of emigration, are in the free enjoyment of the right to quit France for America, or any other part of the world they please. It is stated that the English Government is disposed to entertain the proposition of the Company.

A London firm in the provision trade, have made proposals through the Times newspaper, which will, if accepted by the Government, prove of the greatest benefit to the half starved, ill-conditioned English army in the Crimea. It proposes to supply the whole of that army with food, consisting of three meals a day, for 3½d per head per diem, and for three pence additional to provide excellent tents.

This they are prepared to bind themselves in the heaviest penalties to do, and further offer to be responsible, not merely for the performance of the contract in general, but for the punctual delivery of every meal to the soldiers. They ask no assistance from the English Government for the performance of the task, except their forbearance and non-interference. At a rough calculation at this rate, an army of 50 000 men might be fed and sheltered for about £1,825,000 per annum.

A telegraphic dispatch, in anticipation of the overland Indian and China mails, brings dates from Hong Kong, December 19th, Shanghae 5th, Calcutta January 10th, Madras 14th, Bombay 17th. The Baltimore, Surry, had demanded the restitution of Pegu, which had been peremptorily refused. A report of the special inspectors appointed to inquire into the circumstances attending the loss of the steamship City of Philadelphia, was laid before Parliament. This document exculpates Capt. Leitch and the officers of the ship from all blame, and recommends the erection of a light-house on Cape Race as likely to promote the safety of Transatlantic voyages to the United States.

Later news has been received from the Crimea. On the 31st of January the "special correspondent's" letter reports the weather as becoming milder. There were no signs of the arrival of the "navies?"

A telegraphic message from Varna, dated February 4, says that 30,000 Ottoman troops had landed at Eupatoria. Orders were on their march for that port, and would be embarked for Eupatoria as soon as they arrived.

No new event had occurred before Sebastopol.

The French Government had received news from Varna to the 6th inst.

Omer Pacha had left for Bourges to inspect the cavalry and magazines. After that inspection he will embark definitively for Eupatoria.

A telegraphic dispatch, dated Constantinople, February 1, states that two-thirds of the Turkish army have disembarked at Eupatoria. The Russians were encamped partly in the villages of Alma and Bulbeck, and partly at Simpheropol and the environs (Gen. Ulrich, with the Guards, set off for the Crimea on January 8th. The Egyptian reinforcements arrived from Alexandria in the Tagus. During the night the artillery of Sebastopol fires incessantly. The allies reply during the day by the Tirailleurs, who kill a number of the Russian artillerymen.

The Journal de St. Petersbugh, dated Feb. 3, contains an address of the Czar to the Hetman of the Don Cossacks, expressing his confidence that they would fight for the church, the throne and the country.

The Viceroy of Egypt has abolished custom duties except at Suez.

The reports of a mutiny among the Zouaves in the Crimea, created a painful sensation in Paris. The story, there is little doubt, was greatly exaggerated, but it is not thought altogether without foundation. The action of 400 men having been sent in irons to Toulon, is accouted as absurd.

The American, Mr. Philips, who was mistaken by the police of Baale for Signor Mezzini, and kept five days under arrest, has obtained from the Federal Government two thousand francs, as compensation for the deprivation of his liberty. The chief police officer at Basle has been admonished to use more discretion.

INCIDENTS OF THE WAR.

MORTALITY AT SCUTARI.

The mortality here has decreased somewhat, and I hope that it may never again rise to the height at which it stood on the four preceding days. It is still, however, fearfully great. On the 25th there were fifty-three burials; on the 30th, forty-five; on the 31st, fifty-two; making in three days a total of 150. From the 1st till the end of last month, the interments at Scutari have amounted to 1450, including three officers, two women, and two children. The morning sick list here yesterday showed that there were then in hospital 76 officers and 4754 non-commissioned officers and privates.

NO MEDICINE FOR THE SICK.

A surgeon of a regiment stationed on the cliffs above Balaklava, who has about forty sick out of two hundred men, has been applying to the "authorities" in the town for the last three weeks for medicines, all simple and essential, and cannot get one of them. The list he sent in was returned, with the observation, "We have none of these medicines in store." To-day this poor surgeon, too, came down with his last appeal: "Do, I beg you, give me any medicine you have for diarrhœa." "We have not any." "Have you any medicine for fever you could give? Anything you can let me have I'll take." "We have not any." "I have a good many cases of rheumatism among my men, can you let me have any medicines for them?" "We have not any." Thus, for fever, rheumatism, and diarrhœa, the most prevalent complaints of the army, there were no specifics whatever, and the surgeon returned up the hill-side with the bitter reflection that he could give no aid to the unfortunate men under his care.

A GHASTLY PROCESSION.

A large number of sick, and, I fear, dying men were sent into Balaklava to-day on fresh mule litters and a few of our bat horses. They formed one of the most ghastly processions that ever past imagined. Many of these men were all but dead. With closed eyes, open mouths, and ghastly, attenuated faces, they were borne along two and two, the thin stream of breath visible in the keen air alone showing they were still alive. One figure was a horror—a corpse, stone-dead, strapped upright in its seat, its legs hanging stiffly down, the eyes staring wide open, the teeth set on the protruding tongue, the head and body nodding with frightful mockery of life at each stride of the mule over the broken road. No doubt the man had died on his way down to the harbor.

THE FRENCH ARMY REINFORCED.

The French army has received an important reinforcement. The English Division has arrived at Kamiesch; it consists of 10,000 good troops. The Ninth Division, under General Bruset, is expected to arrive very shortly. Our allies will then muster upwards of 75,000 bayonets. The Turks in the Chersonese do not seem to amount to more than 5000 or 6000, judging from the size of their encampments.

WRETCHED STATE OF THE TROOPS.

The battle at Inkermann was fought on the 5th of November, so the world will remember forever. About 40 per cent of the brigade of Guards were killed or wounded on that occasion. They have since received reinforcements, and the brigade, which mustered about 2500 men when it left England, has received some 1500 men in various draughts up to the end of the year. What is the present strength of the brigade of Household troops—of that magnificent band who crowned the struggle of the Alma with victory, and beat back the Russian hordes at Inkermann? I think they could muster, including servants and all available soldiers, about 930 men in the whole brigade. Here is another fact. Since the same battle of Inkermann at least 1000—1000 men—of the Brigade of Guards have been "expended," absorbed, used up, and are no more seen. The official returns will show how many of that thousand were killed or wounded by the enemy. Another fact. There are two regiments so shattered and disorganised—so completely destroyed, to tell the truth, that they must be sent away to be re-formed."

ASPECT OF SEBASTOPOL.

The aspect of the place itself has changed very little, considering the hundreds of tons weight of shot and shell thrown into it; but the suburbs, of low white-washed houses roofed with tiles and at most two stories high, are in ruins. The roofs, doors, and windows of the houses are all off, but the puffs of smoke from the empty frames show that the shells were used as covers for the Russian riflemen.

The Flagstaff Fort was knocked to atoms long ago, and the large buildings around are all in ruins; but, on looking down over the right bank of the river from which the streets of the town descend rapidly toward Fort Nicholas, and which shelters that part of the place from our fire, I could see but little difference between its present appearance and that which it presented on the 26th of September last year. People were walking about the streets, and relief parties were coming up from the seaside towards the front carrying baskets of provisions.

It is impossible to speak too highly of the apparent solidity, workmanship, and finish of the lines of Inkermann earthworks, armed with about 30 heavy guns, which the Russians have thrown up to enfilade our attack, and to defend this position, which is indeed the key at their works in front of us. One line of battery is neatly riveted with the bones, supposed to be mainly powder asses. This is the mere wantonness and superfluous redundant labor. Behind this work I could see about 2000 soldiers and workmen, laboring with the greatest zeal at a new line of batteries, and laboring unintermittedly.

SUFFERINGS OF THE SOLDIERS.

Some of our men are quite well in health in the morning and at night they are dead with the frost—they are as still as a bar of iron. We are starving for the want of food; we feel very happy if we have a little bread; as for drink we can't get any. We get two glasses of rum per day, but I fear we can't get any more in consequence of the bad weather. I am sorry to inform you of the miserable state I am in. I have had a shirt on my back for two months, which causes me a great deal of vermin; as for stocking, I have got none. My shoes are not of much use, and as for my clothing, it is shameful though I am not so bad as other poor fellows. After the battle of Inkerman I got among the dead and took two pair of shoes, three pair of stockings, and a pair of trousers.

THE DEAD HORSES.

It would astonish a stranger riding out from Balaklava to the front to see the multitudes of dead horses all along the road. In every gully there are piles of the remains of these wretched animals, torn to pieces by wild dogs and vultures. On a knoll hillside I beheld the remnants of the gallant gray on which Mr. Maxse rode to the mouth of the Katcha, in company with Major Nasmyth, on the eve of the dark march to Balaklava and many of the equine survivors of the desperate charge at Balaklava show the rent flung away by the side of the early camp. The skeletons of some of the skeletons are entire. Some have dropped dead, and are frozen still, as they fell; others are struggling, as it were, to rise from their misty graves. Nearly all the carcasses have been skinned by the Turks and French, who use the hides to cover their huts; and many suspicious-looking gaps, too suggestive of horseflesh, have been cut out of their flanks. For about five miles the country is dotted all over with these carcasses, in every stage of decay. Were it spring or summer time, the Britannicus would be one great pest-house, and I tremble to think of Balaklava and its hillside full of festering carcasses. Should there be an army there when the first wet weather comes.

RUSSIAN TREATMENT OF THE PRISONERS.

Until my duty as a soldier for my country, and it was my lote to be severely wounded in the fray on the ground occupied by the Russian army. The officers of their army showed us the greatest kindness, and their doctors, as soon as they possibly could, dressed our wounds, and in two days after that sent us here, (Simferopol) to hospital, and I assure you I cannot describe the kindness of the inhabitants of this town. If we were in a town in England our own people could not show us more kindness. I hope you will not be grieved at my being a prisoner, and also not to imagine that a prisoner of war is like a culprit; on the contrary, the officers of the Russian army visit us every day, and treat us kindly, and give us cigars and tobacco to smoke, and many times tell us that we were brave soldiers.

THE RUSSIAN AND AUSTRIAN ARMY.

Some of the semi-official organs of Russia in Germany have recently informed us that the Czar now has 1,100,000 men in the field, and that within six months a reserve army of 200,000 men will be organized. The strength of the Austrian armies is as follows: The 1st army, 57,000 men, with 144 guns; the 2d, with 121,000 men, and 252 guns; the 3d, 256 000 men with 252 guns; the 4th, 110,000 men with 51 guns. The total, without the reserves, is 580,000 men, with 836 guns. A reserve army, including landwehr, of 100,000 or 150,000 men could be raised within two or three months.

Dispatches from the Crimea.

DISPATCH FROM LORD RAGLAN

Dated Sebastopol, Jan 27.

My Lord Duke—I have the satisfaction to acquaint your Grace that the weather continues fine. There are several frosts at night; but the sun shines brightly through the day, and there is an absence of wind, which, while it continued, added considerably to the sufferings of the troops.

Every exertion is making by public transports and individually in getting huts up; but this is a most difficult operation, and the ground is still so rotten that it is a most arduous labor to pass over it.

The extremely confined space of Balaklava, and the vast accumulation of stores have obliged me to erect huts at some distance outside the town for their reception.

I have, etc.,
Raglan.

His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, etc.

DISPATCH FROM SIR E. LYONS

A dispatch has been received from Rear-Admiral Sir Edmund Lyons, of which the following is an extract:

Sir—I have the honor to report, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, the since my last general letter of the 23d inst., (No. 90) the weather has been particularly fine. The health of the army has been much benefited by the change. A good deal of progress has been made in putting the troops and distributing the clothing, which has been sent out from England, so that the men express themselves as being comfortable.

The health of the fleet and of the Naval Brigade is excellent. The men are well supplied with fresh meat and vegetables, and also oranges, sent from Malta by Rear-Admiral Stewart.

The fire from the batteries of the allies has increased during the last week, and that of the enemy has not slackened. New guns have been mounted in our batteries during the last four days.

On the 24th inst. I passed the day at Balaklava, to superintend the service going on there, and to make inquiries and examine into matters connected with duties of the port and the transport service. I met Lord Raglan there by appointment, and we made some arrangements, which will, I trust, have a beneficial effect.

I have, etc.,
E. C. Lyons,
Rear Admiral and Commander-in-Chief.

"To the Secretary of the Admiralty."

CHINA.

[Correspondence of the London Times.]

Hong Kong, Dec. 19, 1854.

Since the 12th inst. we have little of change to notice. The presence at Canton of a strong naval force, British and American, has apparently checked any active demonstration that might have been contemplated by the insurgents against the city, and the two parties remain relatively in the same position as when we last wrote. However, some desultory fighting had been going on in the river and in the neighborhood of the city.

We understand a meeting of the British and American authorities had taken place in Canton to consider the peculiar state of matters, but nothing whatever has transpired. His Excellency Sir James Stirling has inspected the neighborhood of the foreign residences, with a view of being prepared, in case of emergency, to render the most efficient resistance.

We have various reports of communications made to Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary by the imperial authorities and the rebel chief, but, being unable to trace them to any reliable source, we forbear to give details. We may, however, mention that it is generally believed His Excellency Sir John Bowring will avail himself of the present opportunity to endeavor to gain admission into the city.

BY THE STEAMSHIP CANADA.

The Canada left Liverpool on the 17th ult., and arrived at Halifax on the morning of the 1st inst. The New York papers of the 2d contain very full telegraphic dispatches of her news, from which we select the following items:

From the seat of war there is little or no additional news of importance, the state of affairs remaining precisely the same as last reported.

The Peace Conference was to open at Vienna, on the 20th of February, and Lord John Russel has already left London for the Austrian capital to attend the office of Plenipotentiary from the British Government in the Conference.

High easterly winds still prevailed off the English coast, and the Government steamers Esk and Exmouth had been sent to the Ships of the channel to relieve homeward bound vessels. Very severe winter weather prevailed throughout Europe.

Much distress existed at Liverpool from lack of employment, about fifteen thousand persons being thrown out of work from the dullness of trade and the severity of the weather. Some five thousand of these are unemployed from the non arrival of American shipping.

Messrs. Keen, Ripplin & Co., warehousemen, London, and Messrs. Kirk & Furness, of Liverpool, have failed.

Mr. Frederick Peel has been appointed Under Secretary of War, and Sir Francis Baring Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

THE WAR.

There is no change in regard to the siege of Sebastopol. The latest authentic advices are February 1st. The Russian Grand Duke Nicholas made a reconnoissance of the Allied front. Two French divisions made a demonstration, and marched towards Inkermann. The Allies are daily expecting an attack. The pickets are ordered to be on the alert. The weather is warm. In a sortie last night three hundred of the French were put hors de combat; in this obscurity one French regiment firing upon another.

February 2.—Many of the regiments were held in readiness last night for immediate service. The cavalry have been under arms all night. The weather has changed for the better. The supplies of the Commissariat are sufficient in most respects.

Admiral Hruat has telegraphed that since the 31st the Russians had recommenced their night sorties, but had been vigorously repulsed.

The Russians had received considerable reinforcements, and 1200 men, with provisions and stores, had reached the French army.

The roads near Eupatoria were frozen and good. The Czar's two sons have entered Sebastopol.

Varna, February 2.—The weather is fine. Supplies are more abundant. The allies continue to throw bombs into the city. One hundred and seventy-six siege-pieces are in the battery.

February 4.—It is stated from Kamiesch that the Russians made a sortie on the 1st and 2d, but were repulsed by the French volunteers.

February 8.—Nothing of importance—firing kept up briskly on both sides.

February 3.—Menschikoff briefly telegraphed that the General situation is unchanged.

The Vienna Presse says that the English are retiring from the siege lines and are with the French Guard to form a reserve at Balaklava.

Glen Nell, who arrived at the camp on the 27th of January, has reported to the Emperor that the situation of the French army is out the whole good, and that of the British not quite so bad as reported.

The long talked of important change in the French army in the Crimea is now announced. The army will be divided into two corps d'armees, one given to Gen. Pelissier, and the other to Gen. Bosquet, virtually rendering Gen. Canrobert a mere cipher.

Rumor is that Lord Raglan and the Earl of Aucan will shortly return from the Crimea. The circumstances why are not stated.

The Moniteur says that Omar Pacha would embark from Varna on the 6th, accompanied by Cols. Dieu and Simmons, for the Crimea.

The Emperor Nicholas has issued an ukase calling the whole population of Russia to arms. This is remarked as a menace in reply to the appointment of Lord Palmerston as head of the English Government.

NAPLES JOINS THE ALLIES.

An important statement is made that Naples has joined the Western Alliance, and will send, besides a fleet, a land force equal to that of Sardinia, to co-operate with the guarantees of France to prevent a revolution in Italy like that brought Naples to join the Alliance. Count Ursoli, the Russian Minister, and staff have left Naples and retired to Cassetta.

The Anglican Journals announce that Tuscany, Parma, and Modena have joined the Western Alliance, with 1000 men each. This is probably meant as ironical.

It is rumored that Spain will likewise join the alliance, with the view to have the occupation of the French again any insurrection that may take place. It is also reported that Portugal will join it with 2,000 men. This is rather doubtful, however. All that can be said is that the Western Powers are seeking to unite all the secondary States in a general European league against Russia, and that they are making steady progress towards that end.

Sweden continues her military preparations. Most of the smaller German States have their armies nearly complete.

The Swiss Federal Government preserves its neutrality and continues to forbid enlistment for foreign service.

Prussia sends a cheqiar to her diplomatic agent, indicating that the entire Prussian army will be immediately made ready for the field.

In Austria warlike preparations continue with unabated energy, and briefly all Europe is in arms.

All five Powers have formally signified their intention to confer. The Congress has been postponed from the 15th to meet again at Vienna on the 20th. Lord John Russell represents Great Britain; M. de Bourquency, or perhaps a special Minister, France; Count Buol, Austria; Riza Bey, Turkey.

Gortschakoff assisted by Mr. Titoff to be ex-Minister to Constantinople.

It is reported that Prussia will be allowed a seat at the Board, and that the business will be limited to affixing Gortschakoff a categorical Yes or No.

Count Wedell, the Prussian Envoy to France, remains in Paris on his mission being unaccomplished. His secretary has returned to Berlin for further instructions.

Count Esterhazy, the Austrian Minister, has returned to his place in Berlin. His return has caused a rise in the funds.

AUSTRIA.

Negotiations are on foot for an Austrian loan of fifteen millions in the English market.

It was also hinted by the last steamer that the Russian troops on the Austrian frontier were suddenly ordered to retire into the interior. This movement is explained either as a political move in support of Russia

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Sir Charles Napier's Statement of his Case.

At a public banquet given by the Lord Mayor of London, Sir Charles Napier delivered the following remarks, in relation to his exploits in the Baltic:

My lords, ladies and gentlemen, if an officer having returned from a foreign service, like my noble friend near me—if he will allow me to call him so (the Earl of Cardigan)—after having performed prodigies of valor, has been received in the manner he has been received this day, how much more proud I must feel, who have returned from my command having hardly performed any service at all, and been censured by the government, and dismissed from my command. [Cries of "no, no."] I repeat it, "dismissed from my command." I have no doubt that it will be expected by the present company that some account shall be given of the very small services performed in the Baltic by the magnificent fleet which was sent out by this country.

The fleet was certainly magnificent to a degree, but it was very badly manned and worse found; but, however, we managed to take it to the Baltic without pilots, without charts, all the officers being perfectly unacquainted with that sea and the difficulties of its navigation, and we succeeded in getting there in perfect safety. Now, the first object I had in view, was to endeavor, if possible, to satisfy the wishes of the people of this country. I was quite aware when I went there, that not one-tenth part of what was expected could be performed: nevertheless, I was determined to do the best I possibly could. When we first went up, my view was to give Russia every chance of putting to sea with her fleets. I divided my fleet into two squadrons. I left one in the Gulf of Finland, and the other not very far off—at the Island of Gothland. However, the Russians did not think proper to come out of their harbors. Our next object was to go to Cronstadt and see what was to be done there. We went there with the assistance of a French squadron, to do all we possibly could to attack the place, should the emergency arise. We found the thing totally impracticable. In the first place, there was not water for the ships; and in the next, the batteries were of such strength that to attempt to attack the place would be to risk the fleet, with the almost certainty of its destruction. I therefore think I acted a prudent part in the course I pursued. The French Admiral entirely concurred in this opinion; and we returned thence to our former anchorage, and proceeded to Bomarsund.

I had written before to the English Government, proposing to attack Bomarsund. I wanted no other troops to go there. I had troops enough, but the French Admiral thought it more proper to have some. The French Government sent but ten thousand troops. I did not want them. They had much better have been employed at Sebastopol. I only asked for one or two thousand men, to make the thing more sure; but I could have done the thing without them, and I wrote home to that effect. However, the Government sent out ten thousand. It is needless for me to say how quickly the thing was done. Bomarsund was taken in no time—with little loss a great fortification was destroyed—a series of fortifications, which extended a considerable distance over the Baltic. I now come to a subject of greater consequence, and I think it my duty to make it known as I can do here, because I have not a seat in Parliament. I have been very much censured by the Government. Great clamor has been raised against me, and, instead of the Government disconntenancing that clamor, they have actually supported it. The moment it was known in England and France that the French army intended to return home, seeing that it was perfectly impossible, at that season of the year, to perform any other service without risking the whole fleet, the Government became alarmed, and ordered a council of war to be held. I dare say nobody ever heard yet of a council of war fighting. However, we did not want that to drive us out. But the whole subject was carefully and thoughtfully considered by a Marshal of France, a French Admiral, a General of French Engineers, and by no less than three British Admirals, and they unanimously decided that it was perfectly impossible to proceed further; and had we done so we should have encountered the risk of almost certain defeat and loss.

The British Admiralty was not satisfied with that, but they listened to the advice of an officer of engineers, and I was ordered to hold another council of war, in order to ascertain whether French generals and English admirals would abandon their own opinion and adopt that of the Admiralty. The French generals felt insulted at the proposal. Had I been desirous to consult the opinion of a brigadier general of the English engineers, and to give up my own opinion, still, when the other members of the council had once given their own opinion, they thought it was unnecessary to hold another council, and the French admiral also very properly refused to join in such a step. He said, "I have already given my opinion on the subject of an attack purely naval in its character." The Government at home was not satisfied with that. The French general of engineers sent another report home, still more bare than the first, and it is unnecessary for me to say that we all concurred in condemning that opinion also, and the French army returned home, and, I believe, have no hesitation in saying that had they gone up the Gulf of Finland again, instead of returning home, our fleet would have been totally lost.

Not satisfied with this, however, I went up determined to have another survey of that fortification, which is one of the strongest in Europe. This was in the month of September, and that month in the Baltic is equal in severity to the month of November here, and among the Channel Islands. When I came home a report on the survey I had made, after great care and deliberation, and with the intention of doing all that man could do, if possible, to satisfy the expectations of the people of England. At the moment it was reported that Sebastopol was taken, it was also asked, "Why does not Admiral Napier take St. Petersburg and Cronstadt?" and in fact it was asked, "Why do you not go and take Moscow?"

Now, I did not expect that the admiralty could join in that clamor. I say, I certainly never expected that they could be so mean and despicable as to join in that clamor, in order to bring odium upon a naval officer who had done the best in his power to bring honor and credit to his country. What did I do? I sent home a clear and detailed account to the admiralty, stating to them my opinions, and what applicances were necessary in order to take Sweaborg. You will not expect me to state what those opinions were. Suffice it to say that there were two opinions given, one of which I thought was certain to obtain success, the other certain of insuring destruction. What did the admiralty do? Now I mention this particularly and plainly, in order that there may be no mistake whatever—because, if the government have the least spirit about them, they will immediately discharge me and turn me out of the service. The admiralty perverted my language. They not only did that, but they wrote me the most goading letters they could possibly write; they asked me why I did not take Sweaborg, and do this, that and the other. They received my letter giving an account of how Sweaborg might be taken, upon the 4th of October, the very day the report reached this country of the taking of Bomarsund.

On the 9th of October, the news came that Sebastopol was not taken; but the Admiralty had not the pith, straightforward dealing, or the honesty to write and apologize to me, but they perverted what I had written, and which gave them a plan for the taking of Sweaborg. I was not going to stand that. I am not the man to put up with an insult. I remonstrated most strongly; but, after all my remonstrances, the Admiralty persisted still in saying that I had led them astray. What could I do? I was not going to be driven into all this, particularly as Sir James Graham, during the whole time that I was in the Baltic, had, written to me, calling upon me to besiege the stone walls—not to risk Her Majesty's fleet—that these stone walls were not to be trusted, and saying, "when you were going to the Baltic, you were generally accused of want of discretion, but now you have proved yourself a consummate commander-in-chief."

After that came the same insulting and degrading letters ever addressed to an officer; and I mention this particularly, and I hope it will be known to the world, and, that Sir James will be prevented from ever sitting in the administration as the first Lord of the Admiralty.

I state it to the public, and I am known, that, had I followed the advice of Sir James Graham, I should most inevitably have left the fleet behind me in the Baltic. I will prove it before all the world, and if Sir James Graham has one single bit of honor in him, he will never take his seat at the Admiralty until this matter is cleared up; and I have no right ever to be employed again, and I ought to be scratched off the navy list if I am not telling the truth. I am taking the first opportunity, and perhaps the only one I may have, of making this statement public as I now do, and I am perfectly ready to answer for my conduct before the House of Commons, whenever they choose to call upon me to do so.

A Singular Dream.—Most Remarkable Realization.—A young married lady, the wife of a Main street merchant, residing on Race street, in the vicinity of Third, had a most singular dream on the night of Wednesday, December 6, which has since been realized in a remarkable manner. The name of the lady we withhold at her own request. On the night spoken of, she retired to her bed in a pleasant frame, not however particularly elated. The first of the night she was visited by a deep sleep, which, as the hours appeared, gave way to slumber of a more broken character. Suddenly she dreamed; and dreaming saw her brother—the same that two years ago left his orphan home to brave the hardships of California life, that he might secure to himself and sister a competence. She saw him rise from a bed in a small hut-like tenement, and running his hand under the pillow, drew from thence a revolver and a huge bowie-knife, both of which he placed in a belt that he wore around his body. It seemed that it was not far from midnight, for the embers were yet smoking on the rude hearth, and as they cast their lurid glare over his countenance, she thought that perhaps it was all a dream; but then she concluded that no dream could be real, and became convinced that all was actual.

While she gazed upon his countenance, the expression suddenly changed; it betrayed an intense watchfulness; every pulse seemed suspended, and every heart-throb mufflled, while the eye stood fixed on a particular spot near the head of the bed; where, through a small aperture not noticed before, was a human hand, grasping a short keen instrument, looking terribly like a dagger. It apparently sought the head of the bed; for, as it touched the pillow, it passed itself slowly down to about the supposed region of the heart, and poised itself for a second, as if to make sure its aime. That second was sufficient for the brother to rise noiselessly from his seat, and draw his bowie-knife from his belt, and advance a single step toward the bed. Just as the dagger descended into the blankets, the knife of the brother came down like a meat-axe close to the aperture, completely severing the hand of the would-be assassin above the wrist, and causing the dagger and limb to fall on the bed, trophies of his victory. A deep, prolonged yell sounded from without, and, on rushing to the aperture, and convincing himself that there was but one, the brother unbolted the door and stepped out. The moon was shining, and by its light was discovered a man writhing as if in the last agonies. The miner drew the body near the door, and turning his face to the fire, beheld the visage of a Mexican, who, for some fancied injury, had sworn to never rest content until he had taken his (the brother's) life. On examining the man closely, he was discovered to have a wound in the vicinity of the heart, which a long, sharp, two-edged blade in his hand abundantly accounted for. Failing in the attempt to assassinate his victim, he had with his only remaining hand driven another knife to his own heart.

The lady awoke, and vividly impressed with the dream, related its substance as here recorded to her husband. Judge then of her and his surprise, when they yesterday received a letter from California, per the North Star, from the brother, relating an adventure on the night of Dec. 6 precisely identical with that seen by the lady in her dream. A Curious Fact in Natural History.—The mere assertion that flints were sponges would no doubt startle the reader who was unacquainted with the history of these fossil relics of a former ocean; but we apprehend that a little reflection will satisfy the most sceptical of the truth of this announcement. Imbedded in the substance of the chalk, which, during long periods, by its accumulation had continued to overwhelm successive generations of marine animals, the sponge have remained for centuries exposed to the water that continually percolates such strata, water which contains silicious matter in solution. From a well known law of chemistry, it is easy to explain why particles of similar matter should become aggregated, and thus to understand how, in the lapse of ages, the silicious spicula that originally constituted the framework of the sponge, have formed nucleoi around which kindred atoms have constantly accumulated, until the entire mass has at last been converted into flint. We are, moreover, by no means left to mere conjecture or hypothesis, upon this interesting point—nothing is more common in chalky districts than to find flints, which, on being broken, still contain portions of the original sponge in an almost unaltered condition, and thus afford irrefragable proof of the condition of the entire mass.

Umbrella Anecdote.—Both parasol and umbrella, prosaic as they appear in their daily attributes, have each their romantic and legendary annals. During the last insurrection in favor of Don Carlos, an attack was made upon the summer palace of the Marquis de la S——, who was absent at the time combating in the Queen's cause in another part of the country. His daughter, the widowed Countess F——, was alone with the servants in the chateau. At the first onset she assembled all the men capable of defending her father's property, and having barricaded the doors and windows, prepared to meet the danger. But, taken by surprise, and ill-prepared for attack, the defenders were soon compelled, for want of ammunition, to surrender. Driven from room to room in search of a fitting place of concealment from the invaders, the poor young Countess at last took refuge in a small closet which had been for years used as a lumber room, and where she hoped to remain undiscovered while the pillage of the house was going on. But the search, conducted with the sole view of capturing the beautiful young heiress, could scarcely fail to prove successful, and she was tracked to her hiding-place, amid the brutal threats and still more frightful jests of the assailants.

For a moment the poor lady stood defended by the pile of trunks and lumber behind which she had crept. But this fragile barrier could not be available for more than a few minutes longer. In her despair she looked around for some weapon of defense, which should enable her to keep off the attack until she could reach the window, resolving at once to perish rather than fall into the hands of that lawless band of ruffians. Her eye fell upon an old cast-off umbrella belonging to her father, which, all dusty and moth-eaten, had perhaps been standing for years against the wall, in the place where she now beheld it. She seized it in triumph, and rushed to the window, just as the fiercest of all her pursuers had succeeded in forcing the frail barrier which stood before her. He laughed in derision as she raised the old umbrella at his approach, but, nevertheless, the surprise occasioned by the movement caused him to draw back. In an instant the Countess had sprung upon the sill of the open window, and before he had recovered self-possession enough to grasp her garments, she had disappeared through the casement.

A cry of horror burst from the group of brigands as they rushed forward to the window, fully expecting to behold the form of the fair Countess dashed to pieces on the pavement of the court-yard. But the old umbrella, which she still held in a firm grasp, had saved her from death and dishonor. It had opened in her descent, and, catching the breeze as she fell, was bearing her gently to the ground, where she alighted unharmed, and, reaching the gate before her pursuers had even thought of descending the stairs, found a refuge at the cottage of one of the peasants of the estate.

The Countess, now remarried, is living at the Court of Isabel II, where she holds one of the highest appointments.

When Lord Palmerston was lately in Paris the Emperor Napoleon asked him what unpleasant impression France had made upon his acute mind. He answered, respectfully, but frankly, that what had most forcibly impressed him was the fact that the Eastern war was made by the government in France, while in England it was made by the country. He also added that France appeared to him to "resemble a beautiful woman, graceful, active and animated, but who was too highly laced." The Emperor laughingly replied to this gallant simile that it was true, but time to loosen the bodice."

A Night in London.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

The streets of London, to be beheld in the very height of their glory, must be seen on a dark, dull, murky winter's night; when there is just enough moisture stealing down to make the pavement greasy, without cleaning it of any of its impurities, and when the heavy, lazy mist which hangs over every object makes the gas lamps look brighter and the brilliantly lighted shops more splendid from the contrast they present.

Every body who is in-doors on such a night as this, seems disposed to make himself as snug and comfortable as possible. In the large and better streets, dining room and parlor curtains are closely drawn, kitchen fires blaze brightly up, and savory steams of hot dinners salute the nostrils of the hungry wayfarer. In the suburbs, the muffin boy edges his way down the little street much more slowly than he is wont to do. Mrs. Sprightly, No 4, has no sooner opened her street door and screamed out "muffins," with all her might, than Mrs. Walker of No. 6, puts her head out of the parlor window and screams "muffins" too; and Mrs. Walker has scarcely got the word out of her lips, than Mrs. Hasty over the way lets loose Master Hasty, who darts down the street with a velocity which nothing but buttered muffins in perspective could possibly inspire, and drags the boy back by main force. At this moment Mrs Walker sees her dear husband coming down the street, and he must wait his tea, poor man, after his dirty walk from the docks, she runs across the street muffins in hand. Mrs. Hasty does the same, and after a few complimentary words to Mrs Walker, they all pop into their respective houses.

The streets in the vicinity of the Marsh Gate and Victoria Theater present an appearance of dirt and discomfort on such a night—which the groups who lounge about them tend to diminish. Even the little block-tin temple, sacred to "baked 'taturs," surmounted by a splendid device in variegated lamps, looks less gay than usual, and as to the kidney-pie stand, its glory has quite departed, for the candle on the transparent lamp, made of oiled paper, embellished with characters, has been blowed out fifty times—so the kidney-pie merchant, tired of running backwards and forwards to the next wine vault to get a light, has given up in despair the idea of illumination, and the only sign of his whereabouts are the glittering sparks, which in regular trains whirl down the streets as he opens his portable oven, to hand hot kidney pies to his customers. Meat, fish, oyster and fruit venders, linger hopelessly in the kennel, in vain endeavor to attract customers, and the ragged boys, who usually disport themselves about the streets, stand crowded in little knots in some projecting doorway. Here they amuse themselves with theatrical converse, arising out of the half price visit to the Victoria, admire the terrific combat, which is nightly encored, and expatiate on the inimitable manner in which Bill Willow can come the double money.

It is nearly 11 o'clock, and the cold, thin rain which has been drizzling so long, is beginning to pour down in good earnest; the baked 'tatur man has departed, the kidney pie merchant has just taken his warehouse on his arm, with the same object, and the ragged boys have dispersed. The constant clatter of clogs on the pavement and rustling of umbrellas as the wind blows them against the windows, bear testimony to the inclemency of the night, and the policeman, with his oil skin cape buttoned closely round him, seems, as he holds his hat on his head and turns round to avoid the gust of wind and rain which drives against him at the street corner, to be very far from congratulating himself on the prospect before him.

The little chandler's shop, with the cracked bell behind the door, whose melancholy tinkling has been regulated by the demand for quartern of sugar and half ounces of tea, is shutting up. The crowds which have been passing incessantly to and fro during the day are rapidly dwindling away, and the noise of shouting and quarreling, which issues from the low public houses is almost the only sound that breaks the melancholy stillness.

That wretched woman, with the infant in her arms, around whose meagre form the remnant of her own scanty shawl is carefully wrapped, has been attempting to sing some popular ballad, in the hope of wringing a few pence from the compassionate passer-by, but in vain. The tears fell thick and fast down her pale face, the child is cold and hungry, and its low half-stifled wailing adds to the misery of its wretched mother. How very few of those who pass such a miserable creature as this, think of the anguish of heart, the sinking of soul and spirit, which the effort to sing produces! What mockery! Disease, neglect and starvation faintly articulating the words of some joyous ditty that perhaps has enlivened your hours of feasting and merriment.

One o'clock.—Parties returning home from different theaters, foot it through the muddy streets; cabs, hackney coaches, carriages and omnibuses, roll swiftly by. Watermen, with dim, dirty lanterns in their hands and large brass plates upon their breasts, who have been shouting and rushing for the last two hours, retire to their watering-houses, to solace themselves with theatrical converse, arising out of the half price visit to the Victoria, admire the terrific combat, which is nightly encored, and expatiate on the inimitable manner in which Bill Willow can come the double money.

A Sagacious Teacher.—The Johnstown (Pa.) Tribune has a "letter found by a chamber-maid," supposed to have been penned by a young Miss at boarding-school in a neighboring State. One part of it is too good to lose:

"I must tell you about an affair of Emma Hall's, that happened last Saturday. A young man who had been paying some attention to her, had agreed to come and pass off as her cousin, and take her out carriage riding, under the pretense that he was taking her to his father's, a few miles in the country. But his father does not live within a hundred miles of this.

Well, he came according to appointment, introduced himself as Emma's cousin, and asked to take her home with him to spend the afternoon. Miss Waldron said she had not the slightest objection, asked how far it was, and in what direction, and told Emma to get ready to go. But when Emma was dressed and ready to start, Miss Waldron also came down ready dressed, and said that, as their carriage was large enough for three, she would go along with them part of the way, and stop at a friend's, who lived a short distance from the uncle that Emma was going to see, and they might stop for her as they came back in the evening. Of course, they could do no better than to tell her they would be glad to have her go with them, although they would have a dull time with her along. But they thought they could make up for it by having a nice, social ride after Miss Weldroe stopped at her friend's.

So, off they started in fine spirits, and when they had gone three or four miles they began to expect that every house they came to would be the one that Miss Waldron would stop at. But she didn't stop at any. Finally, when they had gone some five or six miles, Miss Waldroe said she must have passed the house by some mistake, for they had certainly traveled twice as far as it was from town. But, since they had passed it, she would not trouble them to turn back with her, but would go on with Emma to her uncle's and stop just a minute at her friend's as they came back. There was what you might call "a fix," and Emma and her beau could do nothing but drive on. So, on they drove, and on they drove; but driving on didn't drive their troubles away. At last, when they had gone eight or ten miles, he said that the road must have been changed in some way, for he had undoubtedly gone astray, and as they had gone so far, and it was drawing late, they would not have time to find the right way.

So, they came back to town, and when Miss Waldron got out of the carriage, she told Em's beau that, when he ascertained how the road had been changed, she would be very happy to go along with Emma any Saturday to spend an afternoon at her uncle's. Since that, we have seen nothing of Em's cousin; but it will be a long time before she hears the last of her visit to her uncle's.

An Essay on Comets by our own Astronomer.—The word "comet" has been derived by some from the Latin coma, a tail; but the better derivation is comma, because it can never come to a full stop.

Every comet has a tail, or train, which may be compared to some of those monster trains which are occasionally the subjects of newspaper paragraphs.

What a comet is, we do not exactly know. It is certainly an eccentric body, but there are so many eccentric bodies in these days, that this hypothesis affords us no assistance.

A comet has a curious propensity to ont and come again, at very long intervals.

Astronomers talk of the mean distance of a comet from the earth; but as no comet ever came nearer than several hundred thousands of miles, which is anything but a mean distance, we should be glad to know the meaning the astronomers attach to the word alluded to.

The comet of 1770 has very shamefully broken its appointments with the astronomers, and shown a degree of unpunctuality, which is no less perplexing than it is unbusiness-like. The comet ought to have entered an appearance, according to the law of comets, every five years and a half; but the eccentric body has been non inventus ever since, and we should be glad to see it regularly outlawed from the solar system.

Comets are generally called periodical bodies, because their tails are so exceedingly lengthy, like those which are continued from month to month in some of the periodicals. They differ, however, in one respect, the former being very luminous, and the latter utterly destitute of brilliancy.

The Czar and the Four Points.—The Charivari contains the following lively jeu d'esprit:

"Nesselrode!" "Sire?" "Any news today?" "Nothing of importance, your Majesty." "Is the news of my having accepted the four guarantees yet known?" "Every where, Sire." "What effect has it produced at Vienna?" "The funds have risen." "And at London?" "The funds have also gone up." "And what at Paris?" "Just the same; the funds have risen." "What say the English papers?" "Nothing very particular, Sire." "The Times?" "That it is necessary to wait." "And the Morning Post?" "That no hurry must be shown in the matter." "And the Daily News?" "That he who lives long enough will see the end of the present affair." "I will not connect from you, Nesselrode, that I was under the impression that my acceptation of the four guarantees would have produced a greater effect, and that the bait and hook would have been more eagerly jumped at; but these English are excessively tough. In France, however, I have no doubt, the matter has been better received. Let us speak of the French journals." "The Moniteur is silent, your Majesty." "Well, that is rather disquieting." "The Constitutionnel doubts. The Siecle distrusts." "You don't say so!" "The Journal des Debats, alone, appears tolerably satisfied." "Well, that is all right. And the Charivari?" "The Charivari, Sire, I am forced to confess, does not seem likely to place credence in the acceptation of the four guarantees." "That certainly is a very serious matter." "It implies that what you are doing may be nothing whatever but playing a trick, a stratagem, the means of lulling people to sleep, and producing delay, in order to enable you to carry out your plans." "So, then, Nesselrode, the effect on the press appears to you to be a failure?" "I really fear so, your Majesty." "And on the Governments?" "Prussia appears quite delighted." "Ah! very good!" "And some of the petty German States, also." "Capital! And Austria?" "She continues assembling her troops on the frontier." "And France?" "She is sending reinforcements to to the Crimea." "And England?" "She is hard at work enlisting soldiers to reinforce her army." "Then, is that the whole of the effect produced by the acceptation of the four guarantees?" "Absolutely the whole, Sire." "Then I would, perhaps, have done better to have saved myself the trouble of accepting; however, every thing considered, the course which I have adopted is not so bad. The point now is to persevere, as what does not succeed the first day, sometimes succeeds the second, and what is not believed to-day appears to-morrow a sure thing. You must immediately send a dispatch to Prince Gortschakoff." "Yes, Sire." "In which you will request him to assure the Western and Eastern Powers that I still accept the four guarantees—that I accept them more than ever." "Yes, your Majesty." "Negotiations will be opened, and no matter what any one may say, negotiations have always a certain influence on military operations. No matter what I gain by them, I shall still gain that much. N'est ce pas, Nesselrode?" "Oui, Sire."

State of Morals Among the Factory Girls of Lowell.—The testimony of Miss Dexter, in the case of two young factory women who were before the Lowell Police Court for stealing yarn, gives rather a remarkable illustration of morals in that place:

"Miss Dexter called. Work in the Middlesex mill; have been employed there seven years and ten months; have stolen yarn from the mill, and have been arrested for larceny; pleaded guilty; am now under bonds; know the defendants; both work in the room over me. On one occasion both came into my room together and took six bobbins of yarn each; came at two other times, separately, and took the same quantity; told me I was a darned fool if I did not take some; said I needn't be so d——n pious; am pious, and am a church member; belong to Rev. A. K. Moulton's church; gave information to the agent, which led to the arrest of the defendants; have been told that all the girls steal yarn; have no doubt of it."

Sneed.—It will be remembered that a few days ago we mentioned the fact that the ship Republic had landed a large cargo of paupers at the Balize, whence she proceeded to Mobile. In the Mobile Register of Sunday we find the following gratifying announcement:

The revenue cutter McLelland, Capt. Ottinger, while cruising on the coast, fell in with the ship Republic, from Havre, bound to this port, and ascertaining that she had landed passengers at Pass a L'Outre, without the proper authorization from the custom-house officials, the vessel was taken charge of by an officer from the cutter. She came into the bay on Friday night, and remains still in custody of the revenue officers.

DR. JOHN S. DARE'S STEEL SHOULDER BRACE AND ABDOMINAL SUPPORTER.—These instruments, invented by Dr. Dare, of Virginia, are superior to any other for supporting the back, expanding the chest, and securing an erect form, so essential to health, vigor and good appearance. The case with which they are worn, possessing great elasticity, which is never impaired by use, and being adapted to every movement of the body without constraint, will secure for them a large and extensive sale.

Having examined the above instruments, I certify that they are admirably adapted to further the purpose intended. WARREN STONE, M. D.

SILESIAN WARE.—This article, which gained so much admiration, and of which so many purchased last season, is now offered for sale at No. 7 Camp street, at which place old customers and new ones are invited to call and supply themselves. No ware ever offered in this city has gained such universal approval from the purchaser. In view of the price paid. Why then expend such large sums, when the interest of your money will procure such articles as will give to your tables both elegance and durability, scarcely less than that costing ten times as much, and will retain its luster far better than silver. Almost every variety of articles for table use are now manufactured, and of styles greatly admired.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by Samuel Griswold, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 Gins—a number more than double that of any other manufacturing firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

Hon. S. C. Foster, H. W. Kimball,
Geo. O. Ragland, William Watkins,
A. C. Barton, John W. Frierson,
D. L. Dinsmore, Rev. Duncan Brown,
Col. Isaac Lane, Jerome B. Pillow,

S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and make well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.
The undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements for the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of a high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own, and the adjoining States, the adoption of a plan, which we trust will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. C. Thweatt, (well-known throughout the State as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South) has been engaged as President of the Institution. The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweatt is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield having subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured, that no school can be found in the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning, as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that, no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages as far as health, society, etc, are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher Schools of the country—the particulars of which will be published hereafter. The first session of the School to commence on the 8th day of January, 1855.

Parents will please send on their daughters, as there are always advantages to be derived from an early commencement.

Board can be obtained for the present in respectable private families at moderate rates.

THE CHILD-CHRIST.

Suggested by a beautiful picture by C. C. Thompson, of Boston.

The following poem from the pen of Grace Greenwood may well be classed among "brilliants." It is one of her best efforts—a specimen of finished and true poetry:

From off thy forehead, child divine,
The rich locks fall in sun-bright flow,
And on thy lips the light of life
Is rosy with its morning glow.

But God-like power already rests
Upon that brow serene and fair—
And gazing in thine eyes we see
A mighty purpose deepening there.

The grandeur of a perfect soul
Informs that slight frame's wondrous grace,
And glorious lights are breaking through
The childish beauty of thy face.

By that small hand in Heaven upraised,
We know Thee to thy birth-place true—
It says to all the claims of Earth,
"I have my Father's work to do!"

And yet thy solemn eyes do seem
To look through all thy coming life—
Thy ministry of power and pain,
The joy, the triumph, and the strife.

Then hearest man's imploring cry,
Then seest thyself in thy young years
Resigned to toil for his great needs,
To prayer, to watching, and to tears!

Love wounded by the hard world's hate,
And heavy laden with its woes,
The heartless treachery of friends,
The cruel mockery of foes—

The Garden of Gethsemane,
Its night of agony and prayer,
The cross-crowned mount of Calvary
The awful closed Pavilion there.

Though, like some dread apocalypse,
Such visions to my gaze unroll,
They blight not from its holy calm
Thy faithful and adoring soul.

It stands high still and undismayed,
For time to beareth even now
Earth's countless voices pleading, rise—
We're doomed to die! Redeem us, Thou!

For on thy heart despairing hangs
A world of sorrow and of crime;
And the great ages evil to Thee
Adown the long, sad track of time.

Master Divine, unseal our ears,
Master Divine, ennoint our eyes,
That we may hear those voices plead,
And see the work that round us lies;

And know, when strife and turmoil come,
And deadly shafts are fiercely hurled,
We may not stand in God's great peace
And look out on a troubled world—

But bearing peace, within our souls,
Take open ways, and brave the strife,
Dare even mockery and the scourge,
And wear the thorny crown of life!

Nor may we read in God's great light,
On summits of eternal bloom,
But with a lamp of His sure Word
Walk through the shadow and the gloom.

Though life's extremest agony
Be figured to our shrinking eyes,
Though darkly in the distance frowns
The awful mount of sacrifice—

Help us, Oh Lord! to hold our way
To thee and to our brother true,
To say to Love, to Hate and Death,
"We have our Father's work to do!"

"PHILOSKOMONOS."

A man must serve his time to every trade
Save censure—critics all are ready made."
Byron.

Mr. Editor—Wine, friendship, and some other things improve and sweeten with age; but there are some other things that ferment and sour by increasing years. It would seem that the old Methodism of your correspondent, Philoskomonos, had undergone this unhappy change, judging from the acidity and sharpness of his article on "Progression." I do not recollect, at this writing, to have met with a more bitter and satirical article from any source, or on any theme, than this literary pickle from Philoskomonos. Surely his digestion must be bad, or else he feeds on crab-apple tarts seasoned with tartaric acid; or, in charity, I must suppose the extreme acerbacss of his article the result of his physical, rather than his pschycological condition.

It is clear from the spirit of the article of Philoskomonos, like his "illustrious predecessor," Procrustes, keeps an iron bedstead, an ecclesiastical iron bedstead, whose proportions are so fixed and definite, that nothing can be added thereto or diminished therefrom, but stereotyped for all time; and to which he wishes, by stretching or chopping off, to fit all the world.

It must be a vastly pleasant thing to feel that in all our opinions we are just about right, that amidst the thousand and one conflicting opinions that agitate the world we happy mortals have hit upon the truth, and that therefore "divergence from us is the measure of absurdity." The only drawback to this delightful complacency is the stolidity and perseverance of mankind, who cannot be brought to see truth for our standpoint, and will not suffer us, ex-cathedra, to settle all over all mooted points.

We hope the next time your correspondent Philoskomonos "airs his vocabulary" in a communication on "Progression," he will take his quill from the wing of the dove, other than the hawk, and remember that an inspired Apostle has said, "Be courteous;" and further, that Christian charity "thinketh no evil, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things, never faileth.

In conclusion, we commend to him the following, from Tupper on "Tolerance:"

"There is no similitude in nature that owneth not also to difference. Yea, no two berries are alike, though twine on one stem. No drop in the ocean, no pebble on the shore, no leaf in the forest hath its counterpart. No man in his dwelling of mortality, no spirit in the world of spirits. And therefore, since capacity and essence differ with accident, none but a bigot partisan will hope impossible unity."

From the Colonization Journal.

Thirty-Eighth Anniversary OF THE AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

This meeting was held in Trinity Episcopal Church, at Washington, January 16, 1855. The church was well filled with a most respectable and interested audience.

The Hon. John H. Latrobe took the chair, when prayers were offered by Rev. Mr. Cummings, rector of the church. Then followed the reading of the annual report, by Rev. Wm. McLain, Corresponding Secretary.

Gov. Dutton, of Connecticut, made the first address, in which he clearly exhibited the nature of the society, with the tendency of its efforts, and the, obligations of the white race towards Africa and her descendants.

Rev. Dr. Haight, Trinity Church, New York, followed, presenting valuable information in relation to the Colonization Society; a beautiful review of its past history, its present condition, and probable future prospects.

Com'r Foote, U. S. Navy, then delivered an impromptu but deeply interesting narrative on the history of our colonization efforts in Africa. As he had often visited that shore, he spoke impressively of colonization efforts, and their favorable influences—scenes most familiar to him.

Mr. Baldwin, Syracuse, N. Y., made some volunteer remarks on the general subject, and Rev. Dr. Lee, of Richmond, Va., concluded the addresses with some very eloquent remarks, especially urging the friends of the cause to maintain their original principles and purposes amidst the conflicting notions of the day.

The usual business meeting of the American Colonization Board commenced its session at 12 o'clock the same day. One hundred and thirty delegates were in attendance from fifteen different States of our Union. Dr. Reese was appointed Secretary, and Dr. Lugenbeel Assistant. The delegates present from the New York State Colonization Society were: Rev. Dr. Haight, Rev. Dr. McLeod; Messrs Phelps, Gregory, Discoway, Bloomfield, McClay and Mmurice. Governor Fish, U. S. Senator, was also a delegate, but, from indisposition, was not able to be present.

An unusually large amount of business came before the convention, which arises from the natural enlarged operations of the society. Each subject was referred to some particular committee, of which the principal were: On Foreign Relations, Finance, Auxiliaries, Agents, Accounts and Emigration. From these committees very valuable reports were received, and instructions given for selections from them to be published in the African Repository.

The receipts of the last year were $65,433 92, some falling off from the previous year, when they amounted to $82,000. Five hundred and fifty-three emigrants sailed to the Liberian Republic. Of these 161 were born free, 29 purchased their freedom, and 363 were emancipated; 6 went from Massachusetts, 27 from New York, 3 from Pennsylvania, 15 from North Carolina, 62 from Georgia, 47 from Kentucky, 66 from Tennessee, 7 from Ohio, 15 from Indiana, 29 from Mississippi, 3 from Lousiana, and 273 from Virginia. Last year nearly 800 emigrated, and this year many more were waiting to go, but the society had not the means for their transportion. It is worthy of record that their former masters gave liberally to despatch these emigrants to Liberia.

The contributions to the treasury were: From Connecticut, $6,508 08; Massachusetts, $12,790 19; Virginia, $12,604 52; Mississippi, $2,195 25; Tennessee, $1,558 50; New York, $2,617 55; and the expedition by the Estelle, sent out by the society, at an expense of about $8,000. Donations to the parent Board during the year, $15,088 61; legacies, $5,298 76; special appeals, $7,164 18, of which $2,279 12 were expended to purchase some emigrants their freedom. Charter and outfit of the various expeditions, $40,671 81, leaving the treasury of the society much in debt.

The legacies amount to $9,861 16; 7,022 40 came from Massachusetts. Collections of agents, $13,027 27. Nothing has yet been realized from the McDonogh will, where so much was expected. It was reported that likely in nine years something would be coming from that source.

Com'r Foote, himself a delegate from Congress, expressed decided opposition to any removal of the United States naval force from the African coast, and the convention unanimously adopted his views. The committee to influence our Goverment to recognize the Independence of Liberia stated the peculiar difficulties in their way, and was continued. A resolution was adopted urging the friends of colonization to petition their State Legislatures for appropriations towards this great object. The appointment of an additional secretary at Washington was recommended, but not to be elected this year.

Among other important resolutions adopted was the following:

"Resolved, That hereafter, appeals from the Corresponding Secretary, the General Agent, or the Executive Committee for funds for any purpose connected with the objects of the American Colonization Society, in States wherein auxillary societies exist, shall be made only through said societies, and under their direction."

Much discussion was had on the subject of a line of packets to Liberia, when it was resolved to recommend to the favorable consideration and patronage of the American public the "United States and Liberia American Steamship Company." As stated in a previous number of the Journal, this company has been chartered by the State of New York, and is organized. Shares are $100 each, and some $20,000 have been subscribed to the capital, which is to be $100,000. Such a steamer to run regularly, it is generally thought, will be of incalculable good to African colonization.

By vote of the convention, some of the members waited on the President of the United States. Mr. Pierce received them very kindly, and expressed an abiding interest in the plans and success of African colonization. From the Hon. Secretary of the Navy they learned that the United States Government had no intention to withdraw the American squadron from the coast of Africa.

The Board at Washington, during the past year, has continued to receive authentic information of the advancement of the Liberian Republic in commerce, agriculture, and all the blessings of Christian Civilization. These mercies are extending themselves among the native population. After a very important and laborious session of four days, the Thirty-Eighth Annual Convention of the American Colonization Society adjourned.

POWER OF PRAYER.

The Bible account of the power of prayer is the best we have, or can have.

Abraham's servant prays: Rebakah appears.

Jacob prays: The angel is conquered, and Esau's revenge is changed to fraternal love.

Joseph prays: He is delivered from the prison of Egypt.

Moses prays: Amalek is discomfited; Israel triumphs.

Hannah prays: The prophet Samuel is born.

Joshua prays: The sun stands still; victory is gained.

David prays: Ahithopel goes out and hangs himself.

Asa prays: Israel gains a glorious victory.

Jehoshaphat prays: God turns away his anger and smiles.

Elijah prays: The little cloud appears; the rain descends upon the earth.

Elisha prays: The waters of the Jordan are divided; a child is restored to life.

Isaiah prays: One hundred and eighty and four thousand Assyrians are dead.

Hezekiah prays; The sun-dial turned back, his life prolonged.

Mordecai prays: Haman is hanged; Israel is free.

Nehemiah prays: The king's heart is softened in a minute.

Ezra prays; The walls of Jerusalem begin to rise.

The Church prays: The Holy Ghost is poured out.

The Church prays again: Peter is delivered by an angel.

Paul and Silas pray—The prison shakes; the door opens; every man's hands are loosed.

Disproportion of Male and Female in the Church.

Bishop Meade, in his pastoral to the laity of his church, in Virginia, published in that moderate and excellent organ of his diocese, the Southern Churchman, remarks on what we should like to see a philosophical reason, or any other that is satisfactory, assigned for:

"I come now to the second thing proposed, viz., the division of the church into male and female, and the consideration of the duties belonging to each. Here again the pronouness of human nature to shrink from duty is most apparent in both of these divisions, but especially in the former. A most startling and deplorable fact presents itself on our first entrance upon the subject. It is the immense disproportion between the number of male and female professors of religion. The ministers of God see it and mourn over it whenever they administer the Lord's Supper. The bishops do the same when the rite of confirmation is performed. The number of females on these occasions is often double, yea quadruple that of the males. I have administered the rite of confirmation to thirty persons, only one of whom was a male. I have often done it to a smaller number, when there was not one male. It is to be feared that the disproportion between the professors in the two sexes is but a just representation of the difference in religious character. When we think of the sceptics, infidels, scoffers, swearers, Sabbath-breakers and other transgressors which abound among the men by comparison with the same among the women we cannot doubt but that there is an immense preponderance of vice and impiety among the former."

NAVAL.—The U. S. sloop-of-war Jamestown, Com. Ellison, from Philadelphia for the west coast of Africa, went to sea, from Delaware Bay, on the morning of the 25th ult.

A CHANGE NOT FOR THE WORSE.

From the mud to the hills. From monotonous wealth to a mixed population of poor and rich. These are some of the changes that belong to itinerant life. It takes something more than philosophy to stand it, now and then.

An esteemed brother, who at his last Conference was the subject of one of these vicissitudes, writes us a pleasant letter on new scenes. Even his old sermons are new. He has the eye of a pastoral poet and painter, as well as the heart of an evangelist. And so we judge is making what at first seemed a hardship a pleasure. We wish him a fruitful year of ministorial seals. Who does not envy him that drink at the spring of evening contentainment?

Having labored during the past several years in the central part of the State, where for the most part the members of the Church are wealthy, and consequently the week-day appointments few; the field to which I am sent the present year, being considerably up the country, is in more than one sense new. Viz, more poor people as well as week-day appointments. Like many others at the last Conference, I was taken complotely by surprise at the announcement of the work assigned me. The remembrance of my feelings on hearing it read out, is quite vivid while I write. My good angel was with me. For instead of wondering whether I would be taken care of, I involuntarily prayed—"Lord make me a blessing to my charge." Very naturally, I commenced transforing my thoughts from the monotonous mud and wealth to which I had become attached to the happy mixture of the rich and poor, of plains and hills, and limpid streams. Here, thought I, as in my boy-hood, I shall hear again the "clack of the mill," and listen to the sweet music of the brook, and read over again, as oft I have done, "the short and simple annals of the poor."

I arrived at my first appointment, which was in the week, at 11 o'clock—found a congregation of about fifty, not out in groups, talking, but in the Church, singing with the Spirit—

"How happy are they,"

The music fell upon my heart with a stirring influence; and by the time I hitched my horse, felt just mellow enough to preach.

Meeting over, went home with a good brother; family consisting of the two old folks, a son and daughter, grown. After dinner, read and rested. In the evening, strolled out. The noice of water lalling! A long narrow trough rested one end on a forked stick, the other in the bed of a bluff spring. I drank the sparkling water, as it gushed fresh from its pebbly bed. The curlew tolls the knell of parting day. From one direction came the son with the cows. The old man, basket on arm, calling "chuke!" "chuke!" responding to which, were the little grunters, squeaking and running, impatient for their accustomed evening meal. Emerging from an enclosure, with a train of bloating, frisking calves following her, was the buxom daughter. With her well poised milk pale, she took the direction of the cow pen. Witnessed the ruddy lassie, as, with rope, she fastened the calf to a stump, while she milked. Thought I to myself, you'll never have to ask which cow gives the buttermilk.

"Twilight gray had, in her sober livery, all things clad."

In the cheerful blaze of a pine knot fire mother and daughter plied their knittings while the father and son joined them in asking about every preacher they ever knew, or heard of; spicing their interrogatories with occasional allusions to their love of the preachers that had served them.

Until 11 o'clock, listened to many a legend, camp and protracted meeting reminiscences, and the expression of kind remembrances of the labors of many who are now gone to their reward.

Later from Mexico

The steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived Monday morning from Vera Cruz, which place she left on the 8th inst., bringing papers to that date, and from the City of Mexico to the 3d.

The news is unimportant. Felicitation letters are still pouring from all quarters, and officials expressing their joy at the result of the late Presidential election.

The Minister of Finance has sent his report to the Government about the money received for the cession of the Mesilla Valley to the United States. He fully and satisfactorily details how it was appropriated, and regrets that agents of the Government did not discharge their trust as honorably as it was expected they would. They have, however, been arrested and will surely receive the punishment they deserve.

By a special decree from His Serene Highness all persons found carrying concealed weapons will be forced into military service for a term of from two to five years, if they are fit; if not they will be confined in jail.

General Woolis gone to the South to crush the insurrection, he has been given the command of a new corps. H. S. H. had also left the city of Mexico for the purpose of following his most reliable General, (Wool) and by his presence, aid in the destruction of the insurgents. Not a word is said of Alvarez.

A French line of steamers is to be established between Havre, Vera Cruz and Tampico, to carry the mails, passengers and freight. The contractors are Lelong, Camacho & Co.

As many as five slight earthquakes shocks were felt on the night of the 2d inst., in the city of Mexico.

Captain W. R. Henry has written to the Governor of Chihuahua offering him the services of his mounted Texas riflemen, at the expiration of their engagement with this government, to wit: on the 20th of March, for the purpose of fighting. The Governor replied that he had no authority to accept, and that no body of armed men would be allowed to enter the Mexican territory.

UNIFORMITY IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

The article on the above subject, in the Advocate of the 3d inst., I hope will be read, and lead to the correction of the errors committed by many of our ministers. The form of worship laid down in the Discipline is simple, and I doubt the ability of any to improve it. Let us be consistent, and carry out the rules by which we profess to be governed.—So far as the above is concerned, "Observer's" remarks are well-timed, and judicious. But his strictures on the use made of the term "Confirmation," I dissent from altogether. Your editorial remarks, sometime last year, Brother M., in reference to "the tyranny of words," now occur to me; and the thought also occurs, that words are not only tyrants of the worst sort, but are often bugbears.—What more appropriate than to call the reception of members into full connection, after six months probation, confirming them in their membership? Does it not just exactly express the thing done? Is it not precisely the word, or phrase we want? Precision we want; and because others have abused this term, it is no reason why Methodists should be afraid to employ it in so appropriate and just a sense. No Methodist would be considered as leaning to Prelacy, because of its use in this sense, unless it would be by those who do not appreciate the force of language, and who are ready to carp at any thing a little different in expression from what has always been used, be it ever so appropriate.—As to its being on a par with the "awoaring in" spoken of, I deem it altogether different. The one was indeed ridiculous—the other, just and becoming.—The whole difficulty, however, may have been that the innovator who has dared to make this use of the term, was not exactly the proper one, and it is to be regretted that what is so good in itself, should be injured by owing its paternity to any one under the guardianship of more conservative brethren. It is useless to disguise the fact that there are a number of self-constituted conservators of Church Discipline, &c., who take special charge of refractory brethren, and in their zeal to keep them straight, forget sometimes to exercise a certain Christian grace, which the Apostle Paul esteemed somewhat. I do not alledge this to be the case in the instance of "Observer," for there is apparent in his article, an implied denial of such a disposition, and a protest against these self-constituted censors. The old anecdote of the Indian who stood so straight as to lean backwards, is applicable to some we wot of. In their eagerness to preserve young brethren from certain dangerous examples, they rather overstep the mark, and fail to show that Christian gentleness, that generous, sweetness of spirit, which would enhance their claims to being models. With due deference to all of different opinion, I would suggest that within certain bounds, young ministers should be left free to develop their own peculiar talents, and to manifest their own proper individuality, and the habit of, putting them in "straight jackets," as it were, be stopped. If they are heterodox in doctrine—unholy in conduct—let them be reproved at the proper time; but within the proper land marks let them be freemen. There are many reflections pertinent to this subject, which we would like to make, but will forbear. Suffice it to say, however, that an undue attempt at conforming all to an imaginary pattern, is more likely to result in destroying that simple earnestness—that natural genial humility, which is worth any quality of sanctimony.

As refractory as they may appear, there are some who will persist in forming their own opinions of men, as well as measures, and a good way to make them reckless is to attempt to impose a different individuality than their own upon them. Let the remarks of Bishop Andrew, on the death of Bishop Bascom, be read, and the account there given of his early trials, will express what I mean.

I would repeat, that what is said in these remarks, is not applied to "Observer," for I think I know who he is, and have quite a different opinion of him. The issue I make with him is upon the propriety of the expression, "confirm," and upon this simply.

Somewhat similar to this case, is the fear which some Methodists have of the use of the words "election" and "elect." Because Calvinists have abused them, in their application, some guard against the proper use, and, by a circumlocution, emasculate the idea which these words would express with proper force. They are afraid to speak of the "elect," lest they should be thought to advance the idea of the Horrible Decree.

OMEGA.

THE LAST WITNESS.—We take the following from the London Watchman:

"Died—October 25th, at Chesterfield, in his sixty-eighth year, Mr. James Rod Rogers, retired revenue officer. He was the son of the late Rev. James and Hester Ann Rogers. For thirty-five years he was a useful and consistent member of the Methodist connection. He was present with his parents at the death of the late John Wesley, and was the last survivor of the party who witnessed that impressive scene."

THE RIVER.—Less ice running yesterday, and the quantity decreasing rapidly under the influence of the comparatively mild weather we have had during the past two days. The water continues to recede slowly; it has fell altogether about twelve inches since the ice began forming. Notices from the upper streams—they are probably still blocked up tight, or we would have some arrivels before this. There are upwards of twenty boats at the levee ready to begin business immediately, most of them belonging to the up-river trade; and as soon as the long-closed streams re-open, business will commence with a rush, and our levee will be plunged into a perfect jam before we are done congratulating ourselves upon the resumption of navigation and trade.—St. Louis Intelligencer, 3d.

THE GORGE IN THE KANAWHA.—The Parkersburg (Va.) News gives an account of the "gorge" of ice in the Kanawha. It extends from the mouth of the river to Clayville, a distance of seven miles; contains all the ice made on the river and its tributaries during the five weeks freezing weather preceding the break-up, and is solid, it is supposed to the bottom of the river. That will be something for the spring sun to work upon.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

The rapid growth of this country—its unparalleled expansion, its inconceivable increase in extent, in population, in resources, in everything that adds to the wealth, power and importance of a great nation—has been the pride and boast of its citizens at home and abroad for many years. They have compared the present with the past and found a development as unexpected as unexampled. They have measured the present with the shadow of the future, and seen an empire such as the world never saw. The inhabitants of other lands, looking through inverted glasses, have been slow to acknowledge that as real, which was so accepted here, and have set down as vain boasting the somewhat vague statements confidently published for facts. This vagueness and uncertainty has been cleared away by the official records and public documents of past years. They show the tendency of the advance and its exact ratio; they point out the degree of development and give a stable ground-work on which assertions may be based.

The last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on commerce and navigation, shows the advance that has been made in that direction, and goes far towards justifying the laudable pride that is felt in our merchant marine. The document is one of so much interest that we abstract from it some of the more important facts.

It seems from the report that during the year ending the 30th of June, 1854, the value of the exports of the growth, produce and manufacture of the United States amounted to $252,047,806; of which sum cotton amounted to $93,596,220; tobacco to $10,016,040; flour to $27,701,444, and no other article to more than $12,000,000. During the same period the value of articles of the growth, produce and manufacture of foreign countries, exported from the United States, amounted to $278,241,064—making a total of exports amounting to $530,288,870. In the same space of time the value of our foreign imports was $304,562,381—of which $215,370,273 were imported in American vessels and only $88,117,821 in vessels belonging to other countries. We imported $13,406,070 of brown sugar; $14,018,267 of bar iron; $26,260,519 of piece goods; $17,423,240 of printed, stained or colored cotton; $14,530,945 of coffee; and of wines and liquors $5,310,544.

The total number of vessels which clearep from the United States for foreign countries during the year was 19,078, representing 6,019,194 tons. Of this number 9,670, with a tonnage of 3,911,302, were American, and 9,503 of 2,107,892 tons, were foreign vessels. The crews amounted to 239,045 men, and 9,393 boys. The total registered tonnage at the close of the year was 2,333,810.16; the total enrolled tonnage, 2,411,185.77; the total enrolled in steam navigation, 681,570.77; the licensed, in the coasting trade and cod fishery under twenty tons, 57,947.65—making a grand total of 4,802,902.08 tons. During the year the amount of tonnage sold to foreigners amounted to 60,038,24; the number of ships and barques built was 324; of brigs, 112; of schooners, 631; and of steamers, 281. The actual increase of tonnage is 305,802.20. The total tonnage in 1852 was 4,138,444.47; in 1853, 4,207,010.45, against 4,802,902.08 for 1854.

A more complete idea of the amount of the maritime interests of this country can, perhaps, be obtained by a comparison with those of some other country. We have received, from an official source, the following statistics concerning British shipping in 1852:

On December 31st, 1852, the number of sailing vessels registered in the various ports of England and Wales was 6660 under 50 tons; 11,941 above 50 tons; in Scotland, 1200 under 50 tons, 2070 above 50 tons; in Ireland, 1008 under 50 tons, 1075 above 50 tons; the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, 508 under 50 tons, 341 above 50 tons—a total of 24,824 sailing vessels of the collective burden of 3,640,068 tons. The number of steam vessels was 1272 of 209,310 tons. The number of vessels built and registered during the year in the United Kingdom was 608 sailing vessels and 104 steam vessels, the collective tonnage of which was 167,491 tons.

The number of vessels built and registered during the same year in the United States was 1185 sailing vessels and 260 steamers, the collective tonnage of which was 351,498.41 tons. We are not able to procure the returns of vessels built in the United Kingdom since 1852. In the United States, during the year ending June 31, 1854, there were built 1493 sailing vessels and 281 steamers, the collective tonnage of which was 535,616.01.

At the British colonies there were registered, in 1852; in Africa, 179 sailing vessels and 3 steamers, tonnage 16,197; in Australia, 773 sailing vessels, tonnage 66,606, and 23 steamers, tonnage 1778; in British North America, 5,444 sailing vessels, tonnage 420,772, and 113 steamers, tonnage 11,160; in British West Indies, 723 sailing vessels, tonnage 21,178, and 3 steamers, tonnage 146.

The United States has no colonies scattered over the world, with little fleets and little armies of their own, to add to its importance; has no commercial monopolies with other countries; no ancient associations nor political ties to foster its commercial interests. The ship whose keel is laid on the Passamaquoddy or James River and which is "up" at the wharves of Boston, New York or New Orleans, depends for its success wholly upon individual energy and superior merit. Its sails are spread for China or Bombay, where British influence is, and long has been, pre-eminent, depending solely on its ability to surpass competition for the reward of its voyage. Thus far, the merit has been equal to the emergency. American enterprise has seized one branch of commerce after another, and expanded with the needs of a steadily expanding trade. A country that a hundred years since had no ships, nor commerce of her own, is to-day the fair and equal rival of the oldest commercial nation in the world, and willingly compares the numbers, the size and the excellence of her vessels with any the world can produce.

Every successive report of our Departments booms in honor of some new advance, and shows how steadily and strongly the good Ship of State surges forward in her glorious career. These things are in 1855—what will they be in 1900?

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The remarks which we made a few days since, with regard to the proposed charter of a Southern Pacific Railroad, have elicited the following communication. It comes to us from a distinguished source, and is worthy of perusal as explanatory in some respects of the intentions of the Company. Our remarks concerning the power of this State to charter a Company, giving it the right of minting money, maintaining armies and making treaties, were on the supposition that the Company was to be an American one. It seems, from the communication appended, that it is to be, so far as these matters are concerned, Mexican. Is it not proposed the corporators to make [illegible] this country. Very well. If the Mexican Government sees fit to allow the Southern Pacific Railroad Company all the rights and immunities granted by the Louisiana Legislature, it most undoubtedly possesses the power to do so. We do not see that any ground is taken from under us by this shifting of localities. It remains indisputable that, under the Constitution, many of those privileges which are asked for in the proposed charter cannot be granted, to be exercised in the United States, by one, or thirty-one States.

In order that the subject may be seen on both sides, we append the communication to which we have alluded:

Editor Crescent—You object to the Southern Pacific Railroad bill, now before the Legislature of Louisiana, as a great political commercial organization, endowed with certain dangerous and unnecessary, as well as illegal powers.

You or I, citizens of the United States, may go to the government of Mexico and purchase a right of way for a railroad—may agree to maintain an armed force to Mexico along the line of the railroad—may pay the [illegible] employed—may buy land for stations and for [illegible]—may purchase mines and work them, and coin money, in Mexico—may we not?

If we can do so as individuals, so we can as partners, or as a corporation.

The charter in question merely makes the corporation competent to do these very things, in order that the appropriation of the funds of the company for these purposes may be legitimate. It does not create any power in the corporation not already existing in the individuals composing it; and it is of no importance, who may be the corporators. The only person known to the law will be the corporation—being separate and distinct from all the individuals who compose it. The powers complained of are all to be exercised in a foreign country, and conflict with no provision in the Constitution or the United States.

You say that no State can [illegible] coin money, or purchase foreign territory; and that is an old maxim of law, that no vendee can convey title to that to which he has no title.

But a citizen of a State can employ armed men to defend his property in another country—can build forts there—can coin money there—can buy property there! You incorporate ten men, and they become one citizen, and can do the same, if the charter authorizes them so to employ the funds. The charter does not create the power, but simply makes the corporation competent to exercise them.

The object of the provisions in question is perfectly plain. They are inserted in order to provide for the contingency of having to pass through Mexican territory; and in that event to give the company the authority to buy a right of way, and a landing on the Pacific or Gulf of California, to defend the road against Indians, and to pay the men so employed.

What is there impracticable, enormous, impossible or absurd in all this? There are [illegible] provisions. They invest the Company with the same kind of powers as those possessed by the Panama and Tehuantepec Companies—powers with which the Constitution of the United States has nothing at all to do.

As to your law maxim, it is, as you apply it, a mere fallacy. A State cannot emit bills of credit; but it can incorporate itself, and then issue bank notes. It cannot purchase foreign territory; but its citizens may; and it can make two or more of them a corporation, which can do the same.

All these questions were fully discussed in the Convention at Charleston, where some of the most acute minds in the South raised the same objections which you now raise. It was not found difficult to answer them; and if you refer to that the charter merely makes as a corporate citizen of Louisiana, you will see that if the Legislature chooses, it may give that citizen the capacity to exercise all such powers as any citizen may exercise; and which, in the nature of things, it can exercise.

That the power and influence of such a corporation will be very great, is true. That is precisely why the General Government ought not to [illegible] company of northern capitalists [illegible] Eastern States, corporations [illegible] them. To [illegible]

LATER FROM THE RIO GRANDE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP NAUTILUS.

By the arrival Monday morning, from Brazos Santiago, of the steamship Nautilus, Capt. Thompson, we have received dates from Galveston to the 16th inst., and from Brownsville to the 28th ult.

The Nautilus reports the Mexican war steamers Hurtado and Santa Anna lying off the mouth of the Rio Grande, receiving troops for Vera Cruz and Tampico.

We find nothing in the Galveston papers.

The Brownsville Flag has the following paragraphs:

On Saturday night last the store of the widow Tarraza & Co., in this city, was entered and robbed of between four and five thousand dollars. The work was done by an evidently well-regulated secret band, who was provided with implements for opening both the door of the house and the iron safe in which the money was deposited.

For some time past it has been almost impossible for us on the frontier to obtain any reliable information from the continually agitated nation of our neighbors. Everything arrives to us in the shape of rumors, which are ever exaggerated and colored as suits the humor of those who receive and distribute them. Though at present we are enjoying temporary peace and quiet on this frontier, there is no evidence that it will long thus remain. Circumstances certainly argue otherwise.

Within the past week two Mexican war steamers have arrived at the mouth of the river, and pretty well authenticated rumor has it that they come for troops. It is stated that the insurgents at the South are overcoming every obstacle and are enthusiastically pressing their triumphal march to the seat of Government. Santa Anna's forces being too weak, retire before them, while the people are flocking to the standard of the insurgents from all directions.

We have been assured that [illegible] the troops at this place now, as soon will be placed [illegible] portion of them for Vera Cruz [illegible] for Tampico, where did not [illegible] removal of the troops from this [illegible] outbreak here, which is not the [illegible] large bodies of government forces [illegible] The popular commandant, Gen. La Vega, is [illegible] return instantly to the capital.

Santa Anna has issued an address to the nation in which he says that though now far advanced in years, having been repeatedly called by the voice of the people to supreme command, he now again takes position as their head. He laments that the nation has been brought to the verge of an abyss, and that it will require all the force of energetic people, united, to save it from the ruinous [illegible]

Every one will remember the splendid role played by the two distinguished Mexican statesmen, Antonio Canales and Jesus Cardenas, the two gubernatorial chiefs of the two [illegible] of Tamaulipas, have presided over the destinies of that State for so many years. Both of these men present a living exemplification of the uncertainty of human supremacy of humble power; each one of them rose into executive office on the great hopes of the [illegible] revolution, and both have been in turn crushed by the [illegible] as a war that sealed them and they are [illegible] bottom rung of the ladder of fickle fortune.

The great Guadalajara revolution, which drove President Arista into exile for the second time, also robbed them of so two men of their great positions, and set them to playing hide and seek in their own country. The latter is now a teacher of mathematics in some obscure village in the interior, while the former is an [illegible] on a church in the Valle del Maiz, both in obscurity, and both reduced to destitute poverty.

The Montgomery Journal, of the 10th, states that the grading for about fifty miles of the Alabama and Florida Railroad Company has been let to contract, and that the work is rapidly progressing. A large number of hands are daily at work upon the road, and by the [illegible] tracts made for the grading, monthly instalments [illegible] th, have to be paid to the contractors.

This last book is highly entertaining, beautifully illustrated, and accompanied by a map of the countries explored by the Amazon between the parallels of 3° 30' and 10° south latitude, and 77 and 70° west longitude. Sabbath Observance in New Orleans.

Whether the desecration of the Sabbath in New Orleans, whether it takes the form of business or pleasure. Those who rob the Sabbath Day among us, do so purely from principle, and a solemn conviction of duty. We are glad to know that there are not few, in the more important branches of commercial enterprise, who are actuated by high Christian motives, and who remember the Sabbath, and do no manner of work.

But among those engaged in the lighter and more fanciful branches of business, such examples are rare as yet; this fact makes the Sabbath observance of Mr. Gowan, confectioner, No. 143 Canal street, the more noteworthy and commendable.

We commend Mr. Gowan's large, well-stored and elegant establishment, to the patronage of the friends of Sabbath Observance, both in the country and city. We commend him to each one of our six thousand subscribers. We do this without any personal acquaintance, and entirely without the knowledge of Mr. Gowan.

Fighting the Common Version.

"He fights the words too much," was the comment of a worthy hearer, after a year's listening to a preacher whose learning generally took the turn, in the pulpit of controverting the correctness and complaining of the weakness of the common version of the Bible.

The impression this makes upon a promiscuous assembly is often mischievous. Reverence and confidence in the holy oracles are thus needlessly assailed.

A prince among biblical critics, Moses Stuart, once said to his class that when he began his ministry he used to find many texts where he thought he could improve the rendering, and he altered King James. Some fifteen years later he found less occasion to alter; and now at the end of thirty years' study he could only admire the excellence of our common version, and seldom attempted to improve a verse.

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

STEAMER ELDORADO, AT SEA,
MARCH 3, 1855.

Dear Brother—As it is likely that many of our friends would like to hear from us, I snatch a few moments to give you a hurried account. We are now in sight of land, and [illegible] to be at Aspinwall. We have been favored with weather, yet most of our company have suffered very much from sea sickness. My wife has suffered a good deal, but has borne it with her accustomed Christian fortitude and cheerfulness. She is up this morning, and I trust that she will soon be in her accustomed health. We are here in the tropics, with the weather as hot as August. I don't know how people do to live here. We reached Havana on Friday morning, and had to wait for our steamer a day, so that we did not leave till Sunday morning. Americans are in bad repute there just now, yet we went into the city and spent several hours in safety, we paying a dollar each for a pass. The bay of Havana is magnificent, and the city itself, with its surrounding hills, presents a scene of rare beauty. Pity that so fine a country should belong to the Pope and that paragon of womanly and queenly dignity, Isabella of Madrid. Yet it does, and is likely, in my judgment, to do so for a long time to come. In the midst of all which has transpired and may transpire, my great rests in God; and I look forward with an anxious hope that God will prosper our visit to California a blessing to the Church and to my own soul. I invite the prayers of the Church for our safety and usefulness. We are a day or two behind hand, and I am not without apprehension that the steamer on the other side of the Isthmus may come on to wait for a few days. This would not be so pleasant, though in this, as in everything else, God will order all things well. This must suffice for the present; when more at leisure, I shall write you more in detail. Till then, adieu. God bless you! Yours, affectionately,

JAMES D. ANDREW.

It is related that one evening, when the House of Commons were going to adjourn, John Wilkes asked permission to make a speech, "for." "That's sent a copy to the Public Advertiser, and how ridiculous should I appear if it were published without having been delivered."

erican Tract Society.

A meeting in behalf of this society was held in Odd Fellow's Hall on Sunday evening last. A very respectable congregation attended, and the services of the Presbyterian Church, now held in the Hall, gave way to the society.

The Rev. Mr. Cook, Secretary of the parent society, who was the first speaker, briefly mapped out its doings and plans. Within the twenty-seven years of the society's active exertions. It has translated books into one hundred and seventeen languages, published and circulated ten millions of religious classics, and two hundred millions of smaller publications, at a cost of four millions of dollars, and has employed three thousand colporteurs. The country has been mapped out, and each commercial centre made the head-quarters of the society's operations for that section. New Orleans is about to become the centre of operations for the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas and Texas, and Rev. Mr. Waldo has been appointed the General Agent for these States.

The population of these States to be operated upon was stated by Mr. Waldo at about three or three and a half millions. He has lately been on a visit to Eastern Texas, and drew a touching picture of the destitution of that country. From this centre of South-western operations it is proposed to reach Mexico and Central America.

The management of the society is certainly energetic and far seeing. Its instruments are well chosen, and its plans may teach others a lesson. Its annual receipts are now over four hundred thousand dollars.

The ministers of the Methodist churches in the city were waited upon by the Secretary and Agent, and courteously invited to join in the union meeting of Sunday evening. They, however, and we think very properly, did not close their churches, but preached to large and attentive congregations. One of them, after the sermon, invited mourners for prayer, and several came forward, and we hope for a revival there.

We noticed, also, that two of the Presbyterian churches did not close for the union meeting. Some of our Presbyterian brethren begin to stand off. We presume they are of that class not afraid of their doctrines, but believe, with Dr. Plummer, that the "Confession of Faith," even, can cut its own way. Well, we like honest, hearty belief, though differing from the thing believed. Others think the management and publications of the American Tract Society enough Calvanistic for their taste, and continue their adherence.

It may be as well, here and now, to say something in reference to the relation of this society to Methodists, and the claims it has upon their co-operation.

Let it be understood, then, that the Methodist Episcopal Church has no official, influential, controlling or responsible connection with the American Tract Society. The talks and writings, and speeches which tend to make the contrary impression we must characterize as disingenuous.

The Secretary, agents and colporteurs tell it and persist in it that all the leading evangelical denominations are represented in the publishing committee, and, according to the constitution, nothing can be published to which any member of the committee objects. And there are two Methodists in that committee! We ask, who appointed them? Their Annual Conference did not, nor the General Conference. They make no report to, receive no instructions from those bodies. How can it be claimed, then, that they represent Methodists, or that their censorship over the society's press amounts to anything? As well tell us that we are represented in the American Abalition Society, because two or more Methodists are members of its publishing committee, on their own account.

In the next place, we have a tract society of our own, with agents, and editor, and publishing committee, appointed by the proper authorities of the Church, and accountable thereto. Through it and by it Methodism proposes to continue doing its own work, in its own way; to print the truth, and publish it, and scatter it abroad; the truth we preach, the same doctrine, and not another. While we are at it, spending money and spending men, let us work out fully and openly that form of evangelism which God has so signally blessed, and which we believe is according to his will. Here we can invest our funds and our energies, as we conscientiously believe, most to the glory of God and good of man. Our position to this society is not one of hostility. We admit freely and rejoice in all the good it has done. So we admit freely and rejoice in all the good that has been done by other churches. That, however, is not a reason why we should abandon Methodism and be absorbed in them. There is as much reason for a denominational book as a denominational church. A neutral literature and a neutral pulpit seem to be as much alike as any two things.

In this connection we will refer to the Secretary's report, presented at the anniversary of the South-western Bible Society, and published with its Fifth Annual Report. Speaking of the Bible House, just built:

"Arrangements have been made with the American Tract and New Orleans Sabbath School Societies, by which, for a rent of $600 per annum, the publications of the former and those of the American Sunday School Union are to be kept on sale in the store of the Bible House. Allying in harmonious and beneficient action the energies of the various churches of Christ, these societies are co-workers in his cause, and are eminently desirable as co-tenants with this society."

The Bible House is the product of the liberality of various evangelical denominations, Calvinistic and Armenian, Prelatic and Presbyterian. It is the symbol of a genuine and substantial union in the Bible, without note or comment. This union does not embrace and never contemplated the American Tract Society, the New Orleans Sabbath School Society, and the American Sunday School Union. They may be very good tenants for room which the South-western Bible Society, proper, is not prepared, at this early stage of its operations, to fill; and we doubt not the faithful and energetic committee who have charge of the matter would put their rent as low as they could get equal accommodations for elsewhere. But they are different, altogether different from the South-western Bible Society. This alliance, "in harmonious and beneficent action (of) the energies of the various churches of Christ" was never meant, if we know the history of the Bible House, to extend to them. As they are different, they cannot be kept too distinct. And we must confess to some regret at this incidental plea for them, in a report prepared with much care and ability, and otherwise so satisfactory.

A New Society.

WHO WILL ENROLL HIMSELF?

We hear of the brotherhoods and sisterhoods of patron societies and Christian juntas of various titles. We confess to some jealousy of these communities, as tending to divide the resources of united Christianity, and by unions to destroy union.

We present a society free from these objections, one to raise means for every good thing—the sinews of war for the triumphs of peace. The hint is taken from the late report of the Secretary of the Louisiana Conference Missionary Society. We preamble it with some well put reflections of that report:

"Where, it may be asked, is the soul of the Lord's House which consumes the people? Here are the people, but where is the zeal which burns brighter and brighter, until the Kingdom comes?

"Where is that action of charity which answers to the nature of charity, which never faileth? Surely it is not in the Church generally. There are some who give, who go, who die to save the Heathen; may be 'seventy thousand'—God knows! There are seven times seventy, though, who do neither. In the main, the property of God seems to be in such hands as will not use it to spread the Gospel of God. The visible Church of God is endowed with the amplest means, but her covetousness has outstripped her temporal prosperity, and sealed up many of the fountains of her benevolence. The hope of the world is, that the present race may for the most part be displaced by a better race of Christians, who shall love in deed and in truth; who, loving Jesus Christ, still keep his commandments and follow his example; who will imitate him who gave his life for the world, in this, at least, that they will give to the utmost of their substance.

Acknowledge the justness of that, you must. Every benevolent institution is complaining, "without means." Do we want them endowed and placed, in common phrase, beyond contingencies? Not all. Endowments are a calamity, except in those institutions which do not, by their nature, rest in contact with public sympathy. An endowed missionary society would be a grand sinecure. Like a fountain, it cannot rise and flow in healthy streams above its source, and that is in praying hearts and renewed offerings.

But this is wanted: for Christians to give more in proportion to what God gives them; and to give it, not on their death-beds, or semi-occasionally, but regularly, systematically, and at least annually. Under the law, tithes scoured this. Shall the Gospel dispensation be less liberal? The least in this ought to be greater than the greatest in that. Who will enroll himself to give as much as the least, "the very least" demanded by the law? We quote from the report again:

"One-seventh of our time and one-tenth of our income belong to the Lord. Until both these shall be allowed by the Church her heart must be unequal, inadequate, half-paralyzed. Let this be preached, be felt, be done by preachers and people, and the Heathen can be fed, and the church that feeds can be filled, and there will be bread enough and to spare. Such a rule is worth vastly more than all the present ways and means of our Missionary Society. Less than this the Gospel never contemplated as the offering of a Christian heart, nor could it even have provided that the love of a child should be less generous than the obligation of a servant. The fragments of such a system would be worth more than the loaves of the present one. Who will enroll himself to give as much as the very least the law demands? Like all the requirements of the law of liberty there is room left for the exhibition of a spontaneous obedience. They are suggested, rather than enacted, and the rest is left to love. Surely the Levitical system was, in the law of tithes, a school-master to bring us to the liberality of Christ. The condition and the promise stand alike valid: 'Bring all the tithes into my store-house, and see if I will not pour you out a blessing, and there shall be no room to receive it.'"

The Triad Society is revolutionizing that dark, dead empire, China. The Decennial Society would revolutionize the world.

Let two or three, or as many as are minded band themselves under this vow, "We will give to the Lord, every year, one-tenth of our income." A mutual vow, but no mutual inquisition into each other's affairs. Each man's conscience be his own tax assessor, each his own tax-gatherer.

There is a nucleus to form about. The society, in some churches, would grow slowly; in others, half or the whole of a church would soon be joined in. Its fruits would everywhere commend it. Let the poor join it, and the widows with their mites, and the rich with their abundance. A Decennial Church would bring on a Millenial Church.

No question is involved about appropriations. Those giving would exercise the same discretion and freedom as now; choose the objects; put their contributions into any channel that irrigates the waste and desert places of earth. This one thing be kept in view, and conscientiously performed, "We will give, every year, one-tenth of our income to the Lord."

Who will enroll himself?

The Churches.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

The members of Soule Chapel, Cincinnati, a society connected with the M. E. Church, South, have disbanded. A portion of them have joined the M. E. Church, some have connected themselves with the M. E. Church, South, in Covington, Ky., and the remnant have organized themselves into an Independant Church, and have rented a hall for public worship.

Bishop Pierce has accepted the appointment to preach the funeral sermon of Bishop Capers, at Nashville, 15th April.

The German Methodist Church at Nashville, Tenn., numbers twenty-five members, the majority of whom were originally Catholics. Rev. Charles A. Quelenals is their pastor.

The Editor of the Richmond Advocate gives the items of the settlement of the Cincinnati concern:—

"We have received a letter from Dr. Stevenson, and also had an interview with Dr. Smith, in relation to the settlement of the Property Question in Cincinnati. The Commissioners, Rev. Drs. Smith, Green and Parsons, of the Southern; and Rev. Dr. Thompson, and Rev. Messrs. Wright and Marley of the Northern Church, and Messrs. Swormstedt and Poe, Book Agents, met on the 12th ultimo. Dr. Stevenson was present on the 13th. Dr. Smith was chosen chairman of the meeting; and after a careful examination and comparison of facts and opinions, they came to an adjustment with a great deal of harmony. The subject was not without its difficulties, but these were frankly and courteously discussed, and settled to the satisfaction of each of the parties. By this settlement the Church, South, receives the nominal sum of $92,000, viz.: in cash, bonds, &c., $80,000, and in debts due the Western Book Concern, by persons residing in the South, $12,000. If a fourth of this be realized, it will be a total of $83,000 accruing to the Southern Church. The sum of $80,000 is to be paid as follows:

Cash,	$15,000 00
Stock in trade with our Agents,	20,000 00
Four notes of $10,000, each, paid yearly, at interest,	40,000 00
One note of $5000, five years from date, with interest,	5,000 00
	$80,000 00

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Bishop James publishes, in the Northern Christian Advocate, this decision on a point presented at the Oneida Conference:

Question.—Is it lawful for a preacher of one Conference to go into another Conference, or for a Presiding Elder to go into the district of another Presiding Elder, or for a preacher to go into the charge of another preacher, to act as counsel in conducting trials?

Answer.—No. This decision is based in part upon the gross impropriety of a member of one Conference interfering with the administration of another Conference, or of one Presiding Elder interfering with the administration of another Presiding Elder, or one preacher interfering with the administration of another preacher, and the painful practical consequences that often follow—but especially upon express discipline, found in part 1, chap viii, answer to 5th question, where, in conducting an appeal before the General Conference, the representatives are required to be members of the General Conference. This is the highest judicatory of the Church, and controls the lower.

Bishop Baker has transferred Rev. Eleazer Thomas and Rev. S. B. Rooney from the Genesee to the California Conference. They go out with him to the Pacific coast in the steamer of the 5th of April.

WESLEYAN METHODISTS.

We are glad to learn that a revival spirit is prevading the Wesleyan Methodist Churches in England. We have seen other notices corresponding to the following, which we copy from a correspondent of the Zion's Herald:

"During the present week, special revival services have been held throughout the Wesleyan Connection, by the appointment of the last Conference, which, it is earnestly hoped, may result in a large amount of spiritual good. In the Circuit town where this letter is written, we have had undoubted tokens of the sanction of the God of Salvation. There has been a short sermon every evening, and a protracted meeting for prayer afterwards. We are still in the midst of these hallowed services; but up to Wednesday evening, twenty-one conversions had taken place, and many more are deeply impressed. And this is only an example of what is occurring generally among us. We are only now fairly recovering from the blighted, deadening influence of the agitations which commenced in 1849; and nothing but revived piety, and more zeal for the conversion of sinners will save us, as a Church."

EPISCOPAL.

The following editorial bit appears in the Banner of the Cross, an Episcopal paper, of December 23:

"One of our bishops is in the habit of reviewing the sermons of his clergy preached before him at his visitations, and sometimes of flatly contradicting their doctrines and views, in the presence of the congregation, immediately after their delivery. It is not long since, as we learn from undoubted authority, that an excellent young minister was appointed by one of the Convocations of the diocese to deliver a discourse on 'Apostolic Succession.' Knowing that the Bishop would be present, and anxious to avoid offence, the clergyman copied and preached the sermon of Bishop ——, as contained in his two volumes of 'Select Family and Parish Sermons; a series of Evangelical Discourses, &c., 1828'—a sermon preached originally at the consecration of Bishop ——, and the publication of which the first Bishop ——, with others, had asked at the time of its delivery. As soon as the printed and rewritten sermon was finished, Bishop —— arose in the chancel and in a pointed and provoking manner denounced its teaching! The young clergyman was about to stop the congregation, and read to them Bishop ——'s note to Bishop ——, asking the publication of the very sermon, which he had just read to them; but for 'peace' sake was persuaded to abandon his purpose."

We have omitted to mention that Bishop Polk, of La., has accepted the Rectorship of Trinity Church, New Orleans, and has associated with himself, as assistant Rector, the Rev. Dr. Colton, formerly of Washington City.

The vestry of Trinity Church, New-York, has voted to Mrs. Wainwright, widow of the late provisional bishop, a pension of two thousand dollars a year.

The suspended Bishop (Onderdonk) draws $3000 per annum.

The sum of $50,000 is being raised to endow the Episcopal Theological School of Virginia. This institution has given a bishop to the diocese of Louisiana, and missionary bishops to China and Africa; has furnished clergymen for every diocese in the Union, and has sent forth all the American Episcopal missionaries now in foreign lands.

BAPTIST.

The new Baptist University at Rochester, N. Y., has made provision for a regular collegiate and theological education of pious Germans, in their own language, for the German Baptists of this country. The position of that nobly endowed and sustained institution is specially favorable for such a mission, being on the grand highway to the great North-west—the peculiar field for German colonization and enterprise. But the Baptists at the South-west, and to some extent throughout the whole South, have reasons to look upon this evangelical enterprise with interest. Comparatively few in all the older States, even among us here at the South, seem to have any adequate appreciation of the extent of German emigration into the vast regions of Texas, to say nothing of some contiguous parts of the South.

The friends of Rochester University did a noble thing for their library when they purchased the entire personal and private library of the great Neander, and to thus offer the same books which onabled that prince of church historians to furnish his immortal work.

Three of the Baptist Churches in Baltimore—the First, Seventh, and the High-street—besides supporting their own pastors, have each a missionary laboring under their auspices. The First Church has, during the year, erected a chapel, as has also the High street, for missionary and Sabbath-school purposes. The First Church reported contributions, the past year, to various benevolent objects, amounting to $14,766 22; the High street, $7,278; the Seventh, about $9,000.

PRESBYTERIAN.

A correspondent of the St. Louis Presbyterian writes as follows: "As a fair specimen take the following facts, namely: In Iowa, Wisconsin, and Northern Illinois, ten years ago, our Church had but 1 presbytery, 9 ministers, 23 churches, and 81 communicants. Now, on the same ground, we have 2 synods and material for a third, 8 presbyteries, 80 ministers, 98 churches, 3,800 communicants, of whom 1,217 were received on examination. On this same field, the whole sum reported as contributed to all objects of benevolence in 1844, was $6; last year, $5,153.

"In the same territory we have, during the last five years, doubled the number of our ministers and churches, and nearly trebled our memberships."

The receipts of the Boards of the Presbyterian Church, for the month of January, were: Board of Domestic Missions, $6424,14, and $46 50 for Church Extension; Board of Education, $6572 90; Board of Foreign Missions, $16,751,08; and Board of Publication, $1199 33.

A memorial to the next General Assembly, adopted by several of the Western Presbyteries, proposes the organization of a Board of Extension.

An Old-School Presbyterian Church was lately organized in Chicago, consisting of thirteen members, and one of them alone pledged two thousand dollars per annum for five years as the salary of the pastor.

LUTHERAN.

Six Lutheran missionaries from Germany arrived in Texas on Dec. 28th, to labor among the German Lutheran population. Several congregations are still without pastors, and desire aid from their friends in the North, or in the father-land.

GENERAL.

The Church of England is now in somewhat of a crisis. The question, whether the Romish doctrine of the Eucharist, may be held by ministers holding the livings of the Establishment, is to come to trial before the Archbishop of Cantorbury, in the case of Archdeacon Denison. The Puseyites are in a panic. We would that they had more occasion for it. It has been affirmed that the ultra-Tractarians are prepared to secede, should the decision be adverse to their views; but that, even in that case, they will still regard themselves as constituting the Church of England, and the adverse party as the Separatiste!

The report of the Canada Wesleyan Missionary Society states the contributions to it during the last year to be £7,539, which is an advance of £1,866 upon the preceding year. The society supports 15 Indian missions, 62 domestic, 21 missionaries to the Indians, 79 domestic and 16 day schools. In the mission churches are 10,624 members, of whom 1,142 are Indians.

A WONDERFUL ASSYRIAN OBELISK.—A dealer in curiosities, named Dropsy, of the Quai Malaquais, was recently tried by default, by the Tribunal of Correctional Police, at Paris, for an impudent fraud. Knowing that an elderly savant, named, Barrois, had a great passion for antiquities, and had even written a book on the subject, proposed to him to purchase an Assyrian obelisk, in a fine state of preservation, which he said had been sent to Paris by an English company, who had discovered it in some excavations at Babylon. M. Barroie eagerly grasped at the proposition, and finding, on investigation, that the obelisk was covered with cuniform characters, and bore appearance of antiquity, he paid down 5000f. for it. But some time after, to his great mortification, he found that it was a perfectly modern production. Having made inquiries, he ascertained that it had been made by order of Dropsy, by a sculptor named Lebœuf, out of the stone from the quarries of St. Louis; that Dropsy had given this person 2000f. for the work; and that Lebœuf, in order to make it as perfect as possible, had gone to the Museum to examine Assyrian antiquities, and had even consulted M. Barrois's own book! The Tribunal sentenced Dropsy to fifteen months' imprisonment, 5000f. fine, to repay M. Barrois his 5000f., and besides, to pay him 1000f. as damages.

ERRATA

IN THE MINUTES OF ANNUAL CONFERENCES.

By request of the Book Editor, we publish the following errata for correction. The Minutes of the Louisiana Conference have been forwarded to him ten days ago.

The special attention of the bishops and secretaries of the Annual Conferences is called to the following errata in the manuscript minutes of the Annual Conferences forwarded to the Book Editor for publication. Great complaint has been heretofore found with the minutes, or account of their incorrectness; as they are now to be edited by the Book Editor himself, he is exceedingly desirous of having them as correct as possible. He has carefully and repeatedly gone over the calculations, and has found numerous errors, which he has no means of correcting except through the bishops and secretaries of the Conferences. He takes this method of rectifying the mistakes in question, because he does not know who the secretaries are, in many cases, or where they reside. Besides, one of the bishops has gone to California, and another to Parndiso; may his mantle fall on many an Elisha that he has left behind! Some of the mistakes were obviously occasioned by the omission of the numbers of some of the circuits and stations in copying from the Conference records. It will be expedient, therefore, to furnish us with the entire statistics of every District in which errors occur. The editor, moreover, wishes to be informed at what place each Conference was held, when the session began, and when it closed.

OUACHITA CONFERENCE.

Camden District—For 13 local elders, put 14.

Recapitulation—For 36 local elders, put 37.

ARKANSAS CONFERENCE.

Fayettville District—For 2,320 whites, put 2,321.

Recapitulation — For 9,142 whites, put 9,143.

NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

Raleigh Colored Mission—For 237 whites, put 237 colored.

Greensborough District—For 5,050 whites put 5,956.

Salisbury District—For 38 local preachers, put 30; for 5,865 whites, put 5,215; for 835 colored, put 742.

Danville District—For 16 local preachers, put 13; for 3,208 whites, put 3,787; for 580 colored, put 619.

Washington District—For 1,163 colored, put 955.

Newberne District—For 17 local preachers, put 13; for 3,233 whites, put 2,844; for 2,681 colored, put 2,561.

Wilmington District—For 4,644 colored, put 4,646.

Recapitulation—Of course, wrong.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Natchez District—For 1,608 whites, put 924; for 3,383 colored, put 2,908.

Covington District is placed at the head of Hillsboro', &c. We suppose it should be Paulding District, in which, for 2,346 whites, put 2,345.

The next District is not named; we suppose it is Covington.

Recapitulation—This, as given in the minutes, shows 10,720 colored, though the totals give 10,740, not correcting the foregoing errors.

Vicksburg, Yazoo and Sharon Districts have no presiding elders assigned them.

Question 14 is not answered.

FLORIDA CONFERENCE.

No return from Madison, where last year, 523 whites, 239 colored were reported. Nor are those numbers put down this year, the last year's numbers are put down to Orange, Tallahassee, Wakulla, Suwannee, Santa Fe, Glynn, Key West, Manatee, Ocala.

In the Florida minutes, Bishop Capers wrote: "Those deficiencies are alike sad and frequent." Why do brethren, by sheer negligence, give occasion for such complaints? Is there no remedy?

Questions 14, 15 and 16 are not answered.

TEXAS CONFERENCE.

Huntsville District—For 836 whites, put 907; for 433 colored, put 461.

The numbers on Cold Springs Circuit, we presume, were not counted.

Victoria District—For 87 colored, put 97.

Recapitulation—The total numbers for last year are reported 7,921; the printed minutes give 8,025; the 104 local preachers would make the difference. How were they counted?

EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE.

Clarksville District—For 41 local preachers put 51.

Recapitulation—Marshall District—For 27 local preachers, put 32.

Clarksville District—For 41 local preachers, put 51.

Total local preachers—For 138 put 153.

Increase—For 995 whites, put 885; for 1 local preacher decrease, put 14 increase.

The Minutes of the Holston and Louisiana Conferences have not yet come into the editor's possession. He hopes they will be speedily forwarded, and that the correction of the foregoing errors will be made as soon as possible, so that there may be no delay in the issue of the General Minutes, except such as is occasioned by the late session of the Pacific Conference.

The labor performed in preparing the minutes for the press is, to say the least, irksome, perhaps thankless! yet, on mature reflection, every one must acknowledge that it is indispensable, if there be any importance in securing correct statistics. It is hoped that all concerned will assist the editor in this undertaking.

AN HONEST BANK.—A New York letter writer tells the following story:

About fifteen years ago a merchant of this city was in England. One morning as he was preparing to return home, he had by his side on his table ten or fifteen bank notes, of one thousand pounds each; as he opened the window for some purpose, a puff of wind blew the notes from the table, and one was blown into the fire and consumed. The merchant made known his loss to the bank; a note was made of the transaction, but he was told that no relief could be afforded him by the bank. He bore his loss as well as he could. The affair passed from his mind. A few weeks ago this gentleman, now in business in this city, received a thousand pounds from the bank whose note was burnt. He was informed that the bank had waited the allotted time, fifteen years, to see if the note would come back to the bank; no presentation had been made and the bank had now legal proof that the note was destroyed as the merchant had stated, and that he was entitled to the money. In these "tight times" such a lift was quite timely.

LINES.

How wonderfully planned hath Heaven
The fitness of all things,
To man how much of good is given
That no remembrance brings.
Blessings he still enjoys, but heeds
Not their adjustment nice,
Proportioned to our suffering needs,
Undreaming such device.
Softly the tempered breeze is said
On lambs now shorn to blow,
And say, doth not on aged head
Fall soft the wintry snow?
Long seems the day to heedless youth,
More brief to years mature;
A marvel this of love and ruth
To sorrowing nature poor.
Yet who who hath passed youth's careless joy
But feels the truth sublime
That still as multiply life's cares
More briefly fleets the time?
Though chiding nature, oft we see
(As age comes on apace)
Lapsed memory's failings, yet might we
From this a blessing trace.
For if the mind retained the woes
Of all the years by-gone,
How might man's spirit find repose
By early suffering won?
Then let us, while we observe how fit,
How kindly each decree,
Heaven's vast beneficence admit.
Though stern its teachings be!
Ancient of days, be thine the praise
For goods of grace untold,
That cheers youth, age, and every stage
Of being manifold.

New Orleans, March 12, 1855.

Madame de Staël

Madame de Staël, daughter of Necker, a [illegible] cocious genius, nurtured in the saloon of [illegible] father by reading, and [illegible] the conversation [illegible] the orators, philosophers and poets of [illegible] eighteenth century, had imbibed the revolutionary [illegible] even le hor cradle. A daughter of Helvetia [illegible] transplanted into courts, her soul and her mind [illegible] participated in this double origin. She was [illegible] republican in imagination, and an aristocrat [illegible] manners, partaking of the nature of Roland and Mirabeau, fanciful as the one, and eloquent as the other. Her rival party in politics was that of the Girondists. Greater in talent [illegible] more generous in soul than Madame Roland, she may be compared to an illustrious man with the passions of a woman. But these passions, powerful and tender, imparted to her talent the qualities of her soul, the accent, the warmth and the heroism of sentiment. Napoleon considered her more dangerous to his tyranny than Lafayette, and had banished her far from Paris. This ostracism had made her house, situated on the shores of the Lake of Geneva, the last asylum of liberty.

The writings of Madame de Staël, sometimes poetical, although proscribed or mutilated by the police, had aided in diffusing through France and Europe, during the reigns of the Empire, the hidden fires of the heart, the enthusiasm of the spirit, the aspirations of liberty, and the holy hatred of British stupidity and of servitude. This woman would have been the idol of the Romans under the modern Cæsar, if they had dared not to strike, and could not abuse her. Faithful and generous friends of both sexes, Madame de Montmorency, Madame Recamier, the German philosophers, the poets of Italy, and the liberal statesmen of England—[illegible] continued attached to her.

During the last years of Napoleon's reign, which his accelerated fall had made him to misapprehend, Madame de Staël had fled to the North, where she roused the insurrection of courts and of people against the oppressor of the human mind. On his fall she re-appeared in Paris, triumphant on the ruins of her enemy. The armed world have avenged her without pleading for it. She herself desired that this victory of nations over conquest should also be a victory over despotism. Many years and by the experience of human affairs she had lost the ruggedness of those republican ideas which had influenced her youth in 1789 and 1792. She had benevolent remiaisences for the Bourbons; and she formed the highest expectations from a restoration, tested as it has been, by the scaffold and by exile, and which around the throne would reconcile representative liberty with the traditions of national feeling.

Her enloon at Paris was one of the centres of the restoration. Her eloquence converted the old republicans, the young liberals and the royalists that were wavering, to a constitutional system copied from that of England, which would secure independence to opinions; a scope to parliamentary eloquence, and consign the Government to the intellect. Louis XVIII, by the elevation of his mind, by his literary taste, and by the sentiments of admiration for her, consoled her for the [illegible] dain and brutalities of Napoleon. He called Madame de Staël es aa ally of his crowe, because she was the representative of European opinion.

She was then as happy in her heart as she was glorious in her genius. She had two children; a son who did not display the [illegible] his mother, but who promised to have all the solid and modest qualities of a patriot and a good man; and also a daughter, since married to the Duke de Broglie, who resembled the latest and most beautiful thought of her mother incarnate in an angelic form, to elevate them to heaven, and to represent holiness in its purity. While scarcely yet in the middle age of life and blooming with that second youth which renews the imagination, that essence of Madame de Staël had married the dearest object of her sensibility. She loved and she was loved. She prepared herself to publish "Considerations on the Revolution," which had so closely observed, and the personal impassioned narrative of her "Ten Years' Exile."

Finally, a book on the genius of Germany, which she had poured out, and, as it were, scattered drop by drop all the springs of her soul, of her imagination, and of her religion, appeared at the same time in France and England, and excited the attention of all Europe. Her style, especially in the work on Germany, is not lacking the splendor of her youth, but it seems to be imbued with light more lofty and more serene in approaching the evening of life and the mysterious shrine of thought. It was no longer painting, nor merely poetry; it was adoration; the incense of a soul was rising from pages; it was "Corinne," the prophetess, and catching a glimpse from the height of life of the unknown Deity, in the remote horizon of humanity.

About this period she died in Paris, leaving a bright resplendence in the heart of her friends. She was the Jean Jacques Rousseau of women, but more tender, more sensitive, and more susceptible of great actions than he was; the two sexes, one for thought and one for action, the most impassioned of women and the most masculine of writers in the same being. Her name will live as long as the literature and history of her country. [Restoration of Monarchy in France, by A. D. Lamartine.

CONGRESS.—The thirty-third Congress closed its proceedings to a close and terminated its existence yesterday, at 12 o'clock—having, in order to consummate appropriation bills for carrying on the Government, been compelled to protract its session to noon of the 4th of this month; and it required extraordinary efforts on the part of the working members and the officers of the House during this exhausting sitting of twenty-six hours, to get the indispensable measures of the session through the various forms of legislation; even in the hap-hazard manner in which they were finally shaped and passed. This unsatisfactory and improper mode of transacting the public business, at the close of a Congress is owing, as every body knows, to the remissness and waste of time which are permitted to take place in the earlier stages of the sessions, long and short. The reproach, however, does not attach especially to the Congress just ended. The evil has been increasing, and has become systematic; but it has been growing worse, until now the main business of the session was thrown so near to the close that it was apprehended during the last two days that the appropriation bills could not possibly be completed, and that a called session would become unavoidable.

Let us say of the late session, however, that, while it is remarked above, is all true, it deserves the credit of having enacted several important and excellent laws, and, amidst all its hurry and confusion, of having provided for many valuable objects. Some of these are mentioned in the preceding columns; others it will be our agreeable task hereafter, to specify and recommend. So, reversing the moral of Mark Antony, we say: "Let the good that live after them, the evil be buried with their bones!" [Washington Intelligencer, 6th.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

Writes a brother to me: "It is almost provoking that I read eloquent and commendatory notices of the work, [the Southern Methodist Quartorly Review,] but get no Review." Do have it "put through at once." Now, may bo some other brethren, who became now subscribers for the Quartorly at Conferonoo, have not received it, and are getting "almost provoked" about it, and are blaming mo for it. To all such I would say, keep cool, and do as I advertised you before Conference adjourned: Writa on yourself to Richmond, Va., and it will be "put through at once," as I have received information from Dr. L. M. Lee that your names are there. Take due notice horeof, and govern yourself accordingly." J. A. CLEMENT.

DEATHS.

DIED—January 26, 1855, in Choctaw county, Miss., OPHELIA CARLINE, wife of John F. Johnson, in the 22d year of her age. She professed religion at an early age, and joined the Methodist Church in her sixteenth year. Naturally of a mook and quiet spirit, her piety flowed in the same channal. The consistency and uniformity of her religious life, though young, attested the strength of its principle and purity of its source. She was the eldest daughter of Elbert McGowin, of Pickens county, Ala.

C. H. ALLMAND was drowned near the south of Pearl River, on the night of the 4th Feb'y, whilst endeavoring to board the New Orleans and Mobile packet Florida. Mr. Allmand was a native of Tennessee, and for the last five years a resident of New Orleans. He has been a member of the Methodist Church for many years, leading a life of consistent piety, and living in a state of preparation for death. There is no doubt of his readiness for the summons, and that his sudden call to die was also a call to rest in the bosom of his God. He leaves a wife and eight children in a state of sorrowful dependence upon the providence of God. May that Providence never forsake the widow and the children.

CHURCH DEDICATION AT JACKSON, LA.

JACKSON, LA., March 7, 1855.

Mr. Editor—We have long needed a large and commodious church in Jackson. True, our town is small, but so many students attend the college and the other schools in the town, male and female, that we need room for the Lord's Day.

This room we have been trying to create, and on last Sabbath (March 4) we dedicated our new, large and beautiful brick building erected in this place by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the worship of Almighty God.

The day was beautiful; the house was crowded. The dedication sermon was preached by Rev. A. T. M. Fly, with the liberty, unction and acceptability usually attending his discourses.

The church cost $9,000, and $4,000 had been paid on it, leaving a debt of $5,000 yet unpaid. After the sermon a collection and subscription were taken up, amounting to $1,000. We thought this liberal, and were thankful for the blessing of Heaven in suffering us to complete the building, and in giving us a fine day, a full house, and liberal hearts, hands and pockets.

The Jackson in Louisiana, though it may be the smallest of the namesakes of the old General, is destined to be one of the brightest gems in his earthly crown. It Centenary College and the other schools located here receive the care and patronage they deserve. The centre building for the Insane Asylum is rapidly rising. The brick are being made for the centre building of the college, and now there are two beautiful brick churches in town, with other improvements, which are to give the place not only the appearance of wealth and durability, but also of architectural taste and beauty. May it be filled with piety and learning, sending forth streams to water and bless all of the north-west, and tho world.

Yours, truly, A. G. MILLER.

The 20th ult. was probably the coldest day of the season, the thermometer, at many points in the State, ranging at twenty degrees below Zero.

SOUTH AMERICAN EXPLORATION.

Within the last few years our Government has added to the labors of its military and naval officers some of those scientific duties in which so many French and English officers have won distinction for themselves. Com'r Wilkes was sent on a surveying expedition that lasted for years, and gave to the world eight folio volumes of useful information. Lieut. Lynch was sent to the Dead Sea, and published a most entertaining account of what fell under his observation. Col. Fremont was ordered to mark down the geography of the Rocky Mountains. Lieut. Strain was ordered to examine the Isthmus. Lieutenants Herndon and Gibbon were dispatched to map the course of the Amazon, the number of its tributaries, the character of the countries it washed, and its capacities for navigation. Grinnell's Expedition to the North Pole was under the charge of American officers. Dr. Kane, now in the ice, belongs to the navy, and an expedition in search of him is being fitted out by the Government. Thus it is seen that our Government is competing with the Governments of older countries in scientific and geographical progress, as well as political and national.

When, some few months since, reports were published in nearly all the papers of this country concerning the unhealthiness and unproductiveness of the countries drained by the Amazon, and the impossibility of navigating the river itself by a company of disappointed speculators who had gone to Para from New York, and ascended the stream a few hundred miles in quest of gold, we took occasion to doubt the accuracy of their information and the reliability of their reports. The company did not profess to be scientific, nor to have made any other observations than those which were incidental to the main object of its enterprise. The members saw just so much of the country and people as was necessary to aid their search for gold, and traveled just far enough towards the Andes to miss the very region they ought to have explored. Neither the account of Herndon, nor of any previous geographer, reported the probability of mineral wealth being discovered far down in the lowlands. It was invariably found in the mountainous country or in the bede of streams flowing directly from the hills.

Since the expression of our doubts concerning the accuracy and reliability of the accounts of the New York Mercantile Company, Lieut. Gibbon has published his report of observations in Peru, Bolivia and Brazil, undertaken by the order of the United States Government, in connection with Lieut. Herndon. The report makes a volume of three hundred and forty pages, containing novel and valuable information concerning the Andes and their mineral wealth, the rivers Mamore, Madeira and Amazon, the governments of the different countries, their people, character and products, together with interesting incidents that occurred during the progress of the exploration.

The initial point of Lieut. Gibbon's travels was the city of Tarma, lying back of Lima, in Peru. From thence he proceeded to Cuzco, the capital of Peru under the Incas, and branched off to the north along the banks of the Rio Madra-de-Dios. Finding it impossible to continue in the direction he returned to Cuzco, traveled on to Lake Titlocaa, crossed over into Bolivia, struck a tributary of the Rio Mamore, followed it down to the Madeira, descended the Madeira to the Amazon, and the Amazon to the ocean, whence he returned home laden with the results of a long but most valuable investigation. Thus, within the last two years this Government has given to the world, through the reports of its officers, more valuable information concerning South America than previously existed in all the geographies published, and shown that it possesses sources of commercial, mineral and agricultural wealth, not surpassed by any portion of the globe. The report of Lieut. Herndon, who descended the Amazon some thousands of miles, was, as all who read it will recollect, strong and decided in its statements concerning the resources and capacities of the countries through which he traveled. The report of Lieut. Gibbon, who, starting from the same point, reached the same end through a different region and by the waters of different streams, is even stronger than that of Herndon in its praise of the climate and natural capacities of the countries he visited.

The population of the eastern slope of the Andes is almost wholly Indian, and so continues to the mouth of the Madeira—intermixed with some emigrants and residents of Spanish descent. The Andes are represented as rich in gold, silver, tin, quicksilver and other metals, now mined in a very inferior and unprofitable manner and carried over the Andes on the backs of lamas and mules. Peruvian bark, cotton, tobacco, sugar cane, and a thousand other articles of export grow in profusion in all the valleys around the lake Titlocaa and in the basin of the Madeira. The people are friendly and solicitous for a traffic from the Atlantic, which can be easily accomplished by means of steamers. He says that all the silver and gold of Peru cannot compare with the undeveloped commercial resources of the beautiful garden of the Madre-da-Dios; that while the door to the interior of Bolivia is plainly by the Madeira river, the people go back up-stairs, and pass their goods and chattles over the roof, down through the chimney to the Pacific; stemming the current, and struggling against difficulties among the clouds, through storms and dangers, passing through cold and frozen regions, on the way to market; leaving a most productive country road, and passing through one less and less valuable, until they get into a desert—the abode of which may be approached by a ship. Lieutenant Gibbon, at the close of his report, says the distance from the foot of San Antonio Falls to the mouth of the Madeira is five hundred miles by the river. A vessel drawing six feet may navigate this distance at any season of the year. A cargo from the United States could reach the foot of the Falls in thirty days. By a common mule road, through the territory of Brazil, the goods might be passed from the lower to the upper Falls on the Mamore—a distance of one hundred and eighty miles—in less than seven days; thence by steamboat, on that river and the Chaparo, a distance of five hundred miles, in four days. Ten days more, along the base of the Andes, would make fifty-one days passage from Baltimore to Cochabamba, or fifty-nine days to La Paz, the commercial emporium of Bolivia.

These two official reports of explorations in South America by Herndon and Gibbon seem to show positively that the great Valley of the Amazon is open for a profitable trade, and that sooner or later the scientific researches of our country will be repaid by an illimitable amount of mercantile wealth. All that is to be, cannot be accomplished in a day. The stars have risen, however, and ere long we shall see the dawning of day in a new country, adjacent to our own, and yet almost as unmapped and unknown as Nubia or Patagonia. [Daily Crescent.

The Madison Patriot tells a good story. It says that, after the State officers were indicted by the Grand Jury last fall, one of them said to a noted clergyman there: "Well they've indicted us; but if they convict, I don't see how in Hell they can punish us." To which the parson coolly replied: "Oh, sir, leave off the Hell, and I don't see, myself, how you are to be punished."

ONE WEEK LATER FROM CALIFORNIA.

The U. S. Mail steamship Philadelphia, Lieut. Schenck, commanding, left New-York at 2 o'clock, P. M., on the 24 inst., in company with the steamship United States, Capt. Graham, for Mobile.—Entered Havana at half-past 6 A. M., on the 9th inst., in company with the United States, sailed again same day, and arrived at the Balize on the 12th. The El Dorado, Capt. Gray, left Havana for Aspinwall as the Philadelphia was coming out. The Isabel, for Key West, and the United States, for Mobile, were to sail next morning. The U. S. steamer Princeton, Capt. Eagle, was in port—all well. The Philadelphia brings the passengers and mails which left San Francisco for New Orleans on the Golden Age of the 10th ult. The following is the list of passengers:

Mrs Iegalls, Miss robinson, J R Duncan, A Michell, P Odlin, Jr, H Marit, X Meyer, J Hitch, Thos Ascurra, P Key, 2 de Escalon, H W Tucker, F H Moore and lady, J Smackeford, Thos Gaynor, Montgomery, W E Pocket, E Westphasin, A L Lowe, C H Towne, A V L Pruyn, lady and nephew, Miss Gardner, Rev N Pocket and lady, A C Hutchinson, Dr Geo Jones, J R Wynn, S R Gaff, M L Montague, Mme Platit and three children, Wm Greig, J L Wilmot, C Lamb, O A Raymonds, W Sloan, L H Martin, R Martin, S Goff, X R Street, J T Thornton, P Lewis, H H Staples, C G Heath and lady, W F Gaffy, Capt Auld, J Glover, M Servent, and 65 in the steerage.

The Purser of the Philadelphia furnishes the following report:

The U. S. Mail steamship El Dorado, Capt. Gray, from Aspinwall bound to Havana, was fired at off Cape Antonio, on the night of the 9th inst. After the first shot, which fell about twenty yards short of the steamer's port bow, Capt. Gray showed his ensign and ran down to speak her, when within about three hundred yards, a second shot came which passed close over her port pilot-box aft. Her engines were immediately stopped, and the frigate's hail was answered by informing them that it was the U. S. Mail steamship El Dorado, Capt. Grey, from Aspinwall. The reply was, "we will send a boat aboard." The boat came alongside, and the lieutenant, after carefully examining the papers, told Capt. Gray he might proceed on his voyage.

The California papers received by this arrival contain very little news of interest and none of importance.

On the 15th ult., a highly important suit, which was brought as a test—the city vs. Hagan—was decided in favor of the city by the Superior Court. About $3,000,000 were involved in this decision.

Adams & Co. have successded in permanently establishing their express to Salt Lake. This is a preliminary step to carrying it through to Missouri.

The people and authorities of San Francisco experience much trouble with the Chinese portion of the population. The Mayor had proposed to assign a quarter of the city to the Celestials and compel them to remove thither en masse, but this was found impracticable. A large meeting of the Chinese had been held for the purpose of forming an "Emigration Association," to raise funds, and determine upon a place to which to emigrate.

The Chinese complain that, by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the State, they are deprived of all rights as citizens, and that by the action of the white people in the mines they are excluded from working therein, thereby throwing out of employment hundreds of theis countrymen who have no other means of support.

Resolutions were passed, complaining of these things, and joining issue with Gov. Bigler as to the proper course to be pursued towards them. It was thought that Utah would be the country towards which they would turn their steps.

The Evening News states that it was understood Lola Montez would soon reappear on the stage in San Francisco.

The Herald states that the Board of Directors of the Sacramento Valley Railroad had given instructions to the engineer to let out at once the grading of all the line from Negro Bar to a point about three miles out of Sacramento City, as the first ground will be broken in a few days. It was confidently expected that the cars would be running from Sacramento City to Negro Bar before the month of August.

A correspondent of the Marysville Express, writing from Sand Hill, Zuba county, gives an account of a terrible affray between two parties of miners, numbering six or eight each. The quarrel arose in regard to a mining claim, and resulted in the death of three men named Webster, Anderson and Rice, who were shot. Anderson was from Paducah, Ky., where his family reside; Webster was a young man, a native of Concord, N. H.; Rice was from Washington, Maine.

A lump of gold was recently found near City of Six weighing nearly a hundred pounds.

From Salt Lake.

By Adams & Co's Express line of the Deseret News to the 11th of January had been received, but they contained nothing new of interest. The legislature was organized on the 11th of December, and Leber C. Kimball was elected President of the Council; J. M. Grant was elected Speaker of the House.

Lieut. Col. Steptoe has advertised for proposals for the construction of a military road through to the eastern boundary of California, in the direction of the Cajon Pass.

On Monday, January 1st, the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Utah Territory, gave a New Year's Festival, in compliment to Judge Kinney, his Associates, other U. S. Officers of the Territory, and Lieut. Col. Steptoe, with the officers in his command.

The news of the appointment of a new Governor had not reached Utah at the last advices.

From Fort Yuma.

Major McKinstry had arrived at San Diego on his way to the Atlantic States. The works at Fort Yuma are going on with great rapidity.

GOLD EXCITEMENT.—The Southern California says that within the last few days the most startling intelligence of the great extent and extraordinary richness of the Kern river country has reached us from the most undoubted sources, and evidences of which are daily and hourly afforded us in the arrival and departure of freight trains of mining companies, &c., as also in the renewed life and business of our city; our merchants have for the last two weeks been actively engaged in filling orders for the mines, and large quantities of goods of various descriptions, have been leaving almost constantly. Bands of cattle and sheep are on the road, and will realise to their owners handsome profits, as we learn that provisions are very scarce and high. It is supposed that by this time there cannot be less than from two to three thousand people actually at the mines, to say nothing of those who are flocking thither from all parts of the country. Mines are now being worked within fifteen or twenty miles of this city. A portion of a company who are operating in a cannon of the San Gabriel, came in for supplies last Friday; they report an average yield of six or seven dollars per day to the man. Gold is being discovered throughout the entire region, not only in the vicinity of the river, but far down to the San Fernando, and out in the direction of the Stockhaus. Some gentlemen arrived in town yesterday evening from the mines, who confirm all that has heretofore been said of them; miners are making from five to fifty dollars per day; goods are commanding good prices, and all doing well.

The steamer Oolah has sailed from San Francisco, crowded with passengers, the majority of whom were bound for the Kern River mines.

Capt. Coupe, of the revenue cutter Jefferson Davis, from Puget Sound, states: That a gentleman who resides on Neah Bay, (Cape Flattery) informed him that the Indians in the vicinity of Flattery Rocks (near where the Southerner was lost) had brought to the head boards of a vessel with "Desdemona" upon them. The Indians informed him that two vessels went ashore on Vancouver's Island about fourteen months since. They could not tell their names, but from their report, one is supposed to be a French ship. The Indians also proclaim if they would accompany them that they would show them where the vessels were lying, and one of them had been most heads out of water. They also state that a boat with nine men on board, from one of the vessels, succeeded in landing on Flattery Rocks, where they were surprised by the Indians and murdered and robbed, while asleep.

From the Sandwich Islands.

The U. S. sloop-of-war St. Mary had arrived at San Francisco with Honolulu papers the 27th of January, making the shortest trip on record—ten days from shore to shore.—King Kamehameha IV, received at Court, on the 16th January, the Representatives and Consuls of Foreign Nations, and the Captains and Officers of Foreign Vessels in port. At this reception he addressed the officers of the United States, French and English vessels of war, and declared that they represented the three great maritime powers of the earth, and the three greatest supporters of the independence of his kingdom. On January 24th, Mr. Gregg, U. S. Commissioner, received a dispatch from Mr. Wyllie, the Minister of Foreign Relations, stating that the latter had been ordered by the King to discontinue the negotiations for the Annexation of the Islands to the United States; commenced and cancelled on by his late Majesty, Kamehameha III.

TREASON.—On January 25th, Commander Bailey, of the U. S. sloop-of-war St. Mary's entered a strong protest, through the Commissioner, to the Hawaiian Government, against the language of the King's Proclamation of December 26th, which states "that the naval force of the United States would be employed in protecting the King's sovereignty."

King Kamehameha IV thus concludes an address recently delivered to his new Privy Council;

"From all my Councillors I desire frank and faithful advice, and those who advise me honestly have nothing to fear, while those who may abuse my confidence and advise me more from personal interest than regard for the public good have nothing to hope."

News had been received at the Sandwich Islands of the arrival of the clipper ship John Land at Tahiti, in distress, with her crew in a state of mutiny. Matters had been arranged, however, and she was soon to leave for San Francisco.

From Australia.

By the arrival at San Francisco of the bark Fanny Major, files of papers to the 11th of November had been received from Sydney, and from Melbourne to the 8th of the same month.

The citizens of Melbourne and of the Colony of Victoria generally have gotten up a strong agitation against the admission within their limits of convicts at large, on conditional pardons, hundreds of whom it is charged are arriving from the penal colony of Van Diemen's Land. Several stringent bills have been introduced into the Victoria Legislature to prevent such an influx of criminals. Monster mass meetings had been held to denounce the grievance.

On the 31st of October, in the Legislative Council of Victoria, Mr. Ammand submitted a proposition to erect the colony into an independent province, and moved:

That it be referred to a Select Committee for the purpose of framing an address to the Queen, and another to the British Parliament, to request that those Imperial authorities do take the proper steps to erect this colony into an independent province or kingdom, under an hereditary Chief Magistrate or a branch of the Royal family of Great Britain and Ireland, and that in connection with the new Constitution, sanctioned by this House at its last session, that such Committee consist of the Colonial Secretary, the Attorney-General, the Surveyor-General and Messrs Hrthill, Miller, Nicholson, Horne, Strachan and the mover.

The motion did not prevail.

The Council passed, by a vote of 22 to 11, a proposition to grant Mrs. Chisholm the sum of $25,000, as a testimonial for her valuable services in the colonies, conditional on the sum of $75,000 being raised by private subscription. Mrs. Chisholm was engaged at last accounts at the gold-fields, endeavoring to find outlets for the superabundant labor that begins to surplus population to the towns.

The Melbourne Morning Herald, of November 1st, says: "The screw steamer City of Norfolk, after lying so long idle in Hobson's Bay, has been purchased by Captain Green, late of the Fanny Major, and is announced to start for San Francisco, via Tahiti, on the 20th of November."

SHIPWRECKS.—Late papers from the Cape of Good Hope give particulars of a terrible shipwreck attended by great loss of life, which occurred on the 22d of September. The ship Charlotte, with troops on board for Calcutta, was lying asleep at Port Elizabeth, Algoa Bay, and went to pieces during the night.

At daylight next morning the ill-fated vessel was to be seen, where she was wrecked, a mass of broken masts and timber rolling on its sides and torn sails, strewed the beach.

The total loss numbered 62 soldiers, 11 seamen and 28 children—in all, 101 lives; but five women out of sixteen were rescued. The poor children—twenty-eight in number, all perished, with the exception of one; the falling of a boat or spar having caused the death of one women and three children. Some of the bodies of these poor children (some infants) were driven in by the waves, and picked up, together with large quantities of the wreck. So melancholy a spectacle has never been witnessed in this town as that presented by the poor, half-dead creatures segregated round the fires, and lamenting the loss of their wives and children, while giving thanks for their own escape.

The ship Ira Hamlin, bound for Sydney, had been wrecked on Rice's Island, at the entrance of Bass's Straits, and 8 Europeans and 9 Lascars perished; the remainder of the crew and passengers, twenty-six in number, were saved. There happened fortunately, to be two native women on the Island; and by their assistance the unfortunate people subsisted for five months on kangaroo and other animals; until having sufficiently repaired a leaky long-boat, two of the party started from the Island, and after a sail of fourteen hours—the distance being eighty miles—they arrived at Sandridge, a suburb of Melbourne on the evening of the 18th of October.

The ship Chancellor, of 800 tons, from Bombay to London, with a full and valuable cargo, was wrecked on the coast of Africa, near Cape Infanty, Sept. 10. Two persons lost their lives, the rest were saved. The English ship Nana Valley, with a full complement of passengers from London to Australia, went ashore on the south Australian coast, Oct. 10, and was totally wrecked. All the passengers were landed in safety, but the the mate and three seamen were drowned. The ship Waterwitch, from Melbourne for London, was wrecked on King's Island, on the coast of Australia—all on board, together with $100,000 in gold, were saved.

THE NEW POST OFFICE BILL.—We find in the Globe a syn opsis of this bill, which is likely to work many important changes, not in any improvements in our postal system. Everything is to be prepaid after July, and the postage in California is to be ten cents instead of six. The bill provides that, in lieu of the rates now established by law, there shall, after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter, be charged for every single letter in manuscript, or paper of any kind in which information shall be asked for or communicated in writing, or by marks or signs, conveyed in the mail for any distance between places in the United States not exceeding three thousand miles, three cents, and for any distance exceeding three thousand miles, ten cents. For a double letter the charge is to be double, for a treble letter, treble and for a quadruple letter, quadruple these rates.

Every letter or parcel not exceeding half an ounce in weight is to be deemed a single letter; and every additional weight of half an ounce, or of less than half an ounce, is to be charged with an additional single postage. Upon all letters passing through or in the mail of the United States, excepting such as are to or from a foreign country, the postage is to be prepaid, except upon letters and packages addressed to officers of the government on official business, which shall be so marked on the superscription.

And from and after January 1, 1856, the Postmaster-General may require postmasters to place postage stamps upon all prepaid letters upon which such stamps may not have been placed by the writers. All drop letters or letters placed in any post-office for transmission through the mail, but for delivery only, are to be charged with postage at the rate of one cent each; and all letters which are hereafter advertised as remaining uncalled for, in any post-office, are to be charged with one cent each, in addition to the regular postage, both to be accounted for as other postages now are.

No postmaster or other person is to be allowed to sell any postage stamps or stamped envelopes for any larger sum than that indicated upon their face, or for any larger sum than that charged therefor by the Post-Office Department; and any person who violates this provision is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, is to be fined in any sum not less than ten, nor more than five hundred dollars.

The following amendments were made to it and accepted:

Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to alter the law in relation to the franking privilege.

And be it further enacted, that for the greater security of valuable letters posted for transmission in the mails of the United States, the Postmaster-General be, and hereby is authorized to establish a uniform plan for the registration of such letters, on application of the parties posting the same, to require the prepayment of the postage as well as registration fee of five cents for every such letter or packet, to be accounted for by the postmasters receiving the same in such manner as the Postmaster-General shall direct; Provided, however, that such registration shall not be compulsory, and it shall not render the Post-Office Department, or its revenue liable for the loss of such letters or packets, or the contents thereof.

In Washington Irving's new work, "Wolfert Roost," we find the following pleasant legend:

THE ORIGIN OF THE WHITE, THE RED AND THE BLACK MAN.—When the Great Spirit had made the three men, he called them together and showed them three boxes. The first was filled with books, and maps, and papers; the second with bows and arrows, and knives and tomahawks; the third with spades, axes, hoes and hammers. "These, my sons," said he, "are the chattels by which you are to live; choose among them according to your fancy."

The white man, being the favorite, had the first choice. He passed by the box of working-tools without notice; but when he came to the weapons for war and hunting, he stopped and looked hard at them. The red man trembled, for he had set his heart upon that box. The white man, however, after looking upon it for a moment, passed on, and chose the box of books and papers. The red man's turn came next; and you may be sure he seized with joy upon the bows and arrows and tomahawks. As the black man, he had no choice left but to put up with the box of tools.

From this it is clear that the Great Spirit intended the white man should learn to read and write; to understand all about the moon and stars, and to make every thing, even rum and whiskey. That the red man should be a first-rate hunter and a mighty warrior, but he was not to learn anything from books, as the Great Spirit had not given him any; nor was he to make rum and whisky, lest, as he had nothing but w rking tools, it was clear he was to work for the white and red man, which he has continued to do."

The Naval Appropriation bill provides for the construction of the six steam frigates authorized at the last session of Congress and appropriates $853,000 for the ten per cent line of Liverpool steamers, together with the usual provision for the support of the Navy. The whole amount covered by the bill as it passed the two Houses, and doubtless received the President's signature, is $15,000,000 or upwards. The Senate's amendments, incorporating the Texan Navy with that of the United States—appropriating $100,000 for a naval depot at New Orleans, $53,000 for the improvement of the Naval Academy at Annapolis and a further sum for the establishment of a navy yard at Memphis, were stricken out by the Committee of Conference, and so were lost. Also the Senate's amendment, regulating the mode of steam navigation upon the navigable waters within the limits of the United States.

A writer in the London New Monthly says of the great sculptor, Gibson:

I shall never forget my first meeting with Gibson. It was in a portion of his studio devoted to his pupil, a young American lady of independent fortune and great talent, enthusiastically devoted to the arts who left America when almost a child to place herself near him whose works she so much admired. On her first arrival Gibson refused to have any thing to do with the romantic creature; but at last her importunities overcame his will, and she is now regularly established in his studio, happy as a queen, her bright eyes beaming with content as she her dainty little working-cap operating around her forms and faces of real classical beauty.

LAUNCH OF A STEAMSHIP.—The steamship Ariel, which was to have formed one of Commodore Vanderbilt's European line of steamers, if he had obtained the mail contract, was launched on Saturday, the 3d inst., at New York. She is 205 feet on deck, 34 feet beam, and 23 feet hold. Her frame is built in the strongest manner, and diagonally braced with iron throughout. Her estimated capacity is 2363 tons. She will be propelled by a walking beam engine, the cylinder of which is 70 inches in diameter, with ten feet stroke. The aggregate cost of this steamship is $250,000.

A New York despatch, of the 8th, says the Collins' steamship Pacific probably did not sail on the 24th ult (her regular day) from Liverpool, which may, in some measure, account for her supposed protracted passage.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP MEXICO.

The steamship Mexico, Capt. Lawless, arrived Monday morning from Galveston, bringing dates to the 14th.

The Texas papers state that the peach trees in many parts of that State have been injured by the severe frosts, and that the crop would probably fail.

The Chronicle of the 10th says burglaries are at present actively carried on in their calling at Matagorda. That paper thinks that in the present state of things here, the business must be a poor one.

Odd Fellowship appears to be progressing in Houston. The Telegraph announces the establishment of a second lodge in that city, by the title of Houston Lodge No. 58.

Report says that a few days since, a negro man belonging to Mrs. Hudson, a widow lady, residing in Rogers' prairie, Madison county, went out into the woods to chop timber, and did not return. Search being made for him, a piece of one of his legs was found near the spot where he had been chopping, and fire dead wolves. It is supposed that he had been attacked by a gang of these animals, and that he killed five of them with his axe before they had destroyed him. The story seems rather strong, as we have never heard of persons being attacked by wolves in this country. [Leon Pioneer.

The Pioneer states that some gentlemen are constructing a boat at Hall's Bluff, on the Trinity, that will be only fifty feet long and carry three or four hundred bales of cotton on three feet draft of water. This vessel is to be propelled by paddle wheels, worked by horse power.

We learn from the LaGrange paper that the people of that town recently raised a subscription to have a reconnoissance made of a route for a railroad from Richmond to LaGrange. The duty was entrusted to Mr. A. S. Steele, Assistant Engineer on the Harrisburg road, who presents his report through the last LaGrange paper.

Mr. Steele has examined two routes, the shortest of which is sixty seven and a half miles in length, and three miles more than a straight line between the towns named. The cost is estimated at twelve thousand dollars a mile.

The LaGrange paper advocates the adoption of this route, and estimates that in three years the road may be completed to LaGrange. The means proposed are voluntary subscriptions and taxation in the counties interested. We trust to find our contemporary an advocate of the State plan after the Convention in that place shall have closed its labors.

NEW ORLEANS AND TEXAS RAILROAD.—We learn from the Galveston Chronicle, that the directors of the Sabine railroad were to have a meeting at Nacogdoches on the 9th of March. It is understood, says the Chronicle, that measures are to be adopted which will place the New Orleans and Texas railway in its proper position with reference to the Louisiana roads, and that will secure the ultimate construction of a road along the line which the wants of the interior and the geography of the country point out as the best route for the great commercial highway of the State.

In the Gazette, a new paper published in Liberty county, we find the following item:

Allen, a little girl of five years, and twin daughter of Mrs. H. Jackson, of this place, died on the 6th inst., from the poisonous effects of the yellow jasmine flower, some of which she plucked from a vine that grew in her mother's yard and ate. This species of the plant is very poisonous, and persons should be careful in handling it.

Joseph Hell, who was under arrest at Austin for a murder committed in Louisiana, made his escape, a few days ago, and a man named Leverett was arrested for aiding his flight.

The Austin State Gazette says:

We are at last in receipt of intelligence from an attentive correspondent, that the United States expedition against the Southern Comanches has started from Fort Patrick Calhoun, and consists of two companies of the Second Dragoons and three companies of Rangers. The men are well equipped and in excellent condition to meet the Indians. A train accompanied the expedition numbering sixty-three government wagons laden with supplies. When last seen beyond Pleasant Hill, the expedition was making fine progress and had as yet experienced no difficulties.

Our correspondent says that the Camanches will meet with a rough reception if they encounter the expedition, and will hardly parley to ask the Captain for a calf, and claim to be Austin this time. Every effort will be made by the expedition to strike a blow against the Camanches.

A curious illustration of the general result of attempting to keep public matters out of the newspapers, was afforded recently by the Massachusetts House of Representatives. A note appended to the report of the Allen Commissioners was distasteful to some of the members, and an attempt was made to suppress it in the publication. The result was that everybody wished to see what it was that the House did not wish to have published and all the papers published it, and called attention to it.

We learn from the St. Martinsville (La.) Gazette, of the 3d inst., that Valsain Dupuissel, who was in jail at that place awaiting transportation to the penitentiary, to which he had been sentenced for a term of twenty years, for killing a man named Joseph Babineau, made his escape a few nights previous, by breaking his fetters and cutting a hole through the floor of his cell.

A lady in Boston presented herself before a dentist of that city for the purpose of having a tooth extracted; and dreading the pain accompanying extraction, requested the administration of chloroform. Questions respecting her health, the condition of her lungs, etc., were propounded, and being answered favorably, the dentist applied the ether to her nostrils, and death ensued in a few moments.

Fort Mifflin, at the mouth of the Schuylkill river, is dismantled and deserted. The Secretary of War, in consequence of the inadequacy of our national military force, and the crying necessity for troops to protect the Western frontiers, was obliged to order away all the men stationed at the Fort. The guns have been dismounted and housed, and there is only one man kept there to prevent depredations. This fortress, though seemingly insignificant in appearance, is exceedingly strong when properly defended. It is a second class fort, but admirably constructed with walls of formidable thickness, covered with earth, and concealing casemated batteries, etc.

INDIAN MURDERS IN MINNESOTA.—A correspondent of the Milwaukie Sentinel, writing from St. Anthony's Falls under date of February 14, states that a band of Chippewa Indians had visited the lumber camp of Joseph L. Day, situated on a branch of Rum river, about ninety miles from the Falls, and demanded whisky. This being refused, a scuffle ensued between one of the Indians and a white man employed at the place, when the latter got possession of the Indian's gun and shot him dead. The Indians then shot two of the white men dead and left the camp, which was immediately broken up for fear of another attack.

The High Court of Errors and Appeals at Jackson, Miss., has reversed the judgment of the Lauderdale Circuit Court, convicting Weedon of murder. The High Court has also reversed the judgment of the Clark County Circuit Court against Browning and Clark for murder, and ordered new trials in both cases.

The exclations of a couple of infants were found buried in a heap of leaves under a log, a few days ago, near Atalanta, Ga., a dog made the discovery, and attracted attention by barking and howling after he had uncovered them. It was supposed the children had been murdered.

It will be remembered that the Portuguese Consul in New York recently refused to attend in one of the law courts and give evidence in the case of Bartholomew Blanco, who was being prosecuted as a party to a certain slave case, accompanying his declension with a statement that his office exempted him from compulsory attendance as a witness. The District Attorney thereupon represented to the Secretary of State the above refusal; a conference took place between Mr. Marcy and the Portuguese Minister on the subject, and the result is that the Consul, without waiving his privileges, consented to appear in court and undergo the necessary examination as to his knowledge of the case.

AN IMPROVEMENT ON THE "AMERICA."—Geo. and James Steers, the celebrated yacht builders, are about to construct a beautiful pleasure vessel for Messrs. Edgar & Brothers, of the New York Yacht Club. She will be eighty-six feet long on deck, one hundred and twelve tons burthen, and sloop-rigged. Her keel was laid on the 1st of March. She will be an improvement on the plan of the renowned "America" and the yachts lately built by these gentlemen. The estimated cost of the vessel is seventeen thousand dollars. She will be finished in time to compete with the Yacht Club in the summer regatta in New York harbor.

SUING FOR WAGES.—Two hundred members of the police force of New York have sued the corporation and recovered damages; the cause of the trouble being the refusal of the Comptroller to pay the additional compensation which was ordered by the Common Council. The police contended the decision of the Comptroller, and the Superior Court, in full bench, has sustained the appeal. The amount involved, with costs, will probably amount to $50,000.

GREAT SPEED.—On the 2d inst., the express train on the Hudson River Railroad ran from Hudson to East Albany, a distance of thirty miles, in twenty-five minutes. Passengers were landed in the Central Railroad depot at Albany in thirty minutes from the time of leaving Hudson.

On the morning of the 4th inst. a female slave, belonging to a planter in Louisiana, was taken from a vessel off Newcastle, Delaware, by the police of Philadelphia, and the kidnapper, named H. Warwick, was arrested and committed.

WHAT CONGRESS HAS DONE.—Among the more important measures affected by the late Congress, we may mention (in addition to all the usual appropriation bills) the prepayment of postage after January next; the reformation of our Hydrographic and Coastular system; the creation of a Board of Officers; the Bounty land bill improvements in the Naval service; the augmentation of the Army; appropriation of means for renewing and increasing the coast defences; the conferring of rank upon children born abroad while fathers were Americans; the creation of Lieutenant Generals in the Army; the appropriation to carry into effect the convention to settle claims between citizens of the United States and Great Britain; to provide for more efficient discipline in the seaming passenger ships; providing for the construction of four additional Revenue Cutters; appropriating $250,000 to the Washington Water Works, and various other bills of more or less importance. The Judiciary Reform bill of the District of Columbia was also passed, but so amended as to retain all the old Judges.

Among the measures defeated or not finally acted upon were the proposed appropriations for Post-Office buildings in the several Atlantic cities including, we presume, the city of Baltimore; the reduction of the Tariff; the appropriation to improve the Patapsco river, and the bill to protect officers of the United States in the discharge of their duties. This last had reference to carrying out the fugitive slave law, and had passed the Senate, but was not taken up in the House.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN ST. MARY'S, GA.—On the 3d inst., a disastrous fire occurred in the town of St Mary's City, by which fourteen houses and stores, with their out buildings, were entirely destroyed. Among them was Hudson's great cotton gin manufactory. It was thought to be the work of an incendiary.

The following gentlemen are the principal sufferers: S. Burns, J. Bashlott, Joseph Arnow, P. Arnow, J. Novello, estate of Silas D. Peaslee, Samuel Burns, Messrs. Gibbean & Dufour, John Burns est and R D Fox. The first three gentlemen are the only persons who were protected by insurance, Mr. Burns in the sum of $1,000.

OCEAN MAIL STEAMER BILL.—The mail steamship appropriation bill was vetoed by the President principally on the ground, though not giving the notice which the Postmaster General recommended, ought, in the opinion of President Pierce, reserve to itself the right to do so if it thought proper. The Senate, as soon as the veto message was received, tacked the mail steamship appropriation to the naval appropriation bill, with which the House concurred. So the Collins steamers will continue their fast trips; but the company is not bound to launch the fourth ship; which they agreed to do, if not disturbed by the notice.

The dwelling house of Mr. Eloming Boone, in Franklin county, Va., was destroyed by fire on the night of the 22d ult. Nearly Early Mississippi Methodists.

WILLIAM WINANS, D. D.

My recollections of the Methodists begin with the distinguished man who will be the subject of this article. Circumstances, in my early life, enabled me to know him well, to hear him often, to meet him in the family circle, to be the recipient of his paternal counsel, and his correspondent; and yet I feel incompetent to recount his public services and do justice to his merits.—His long connection with the ministry; his unflagging zeal; his high personal character; his exalted talents; his great reputation; and the affectionate regard entertained for him wherever he is known, demand a portrait worthy of the subject. I can only furnish a rough outline, drawn from a faithful memory, and prompted by a feeling of the deepest reverence.

William Winans was born November 3, 1788, in Western Pennsylvania, on the top of the Alleghanies, near Braddock's grave, a region of sublime associations, and visibly stamped with the footsteps of the Almighty. He has given birth to a race of men whose industry has clothed the barren rock with verdure, and extracted riches from the hidden depths of the mountains; whose enterprise has carried commerce and the arts into the wilderness—a race of Titans, on whose mountaine ramparts the flag of the Republic waves, and will wave forever.

In this mountain country William Winans was born. When he was only two years old his father died, leaving a widow and three other children, all elder than William, but too young to labor. They were in very humble circumstances, dependent wholly on the industry of their mother. She was one of those noble matrons—fortunately not rare in this country—whose natural strength of mind, moral convictions and reliance on Divine goodness inspire them with fortitude to battle with adversity, and who send their children, disciplined by poverty and self denial, into the world with pure principles and high resolves. These humble firesides are the nurseries of patriotism, and around them are learned the first rudiments of Christian duty. There religion builds its altar and finds the patience, humility and sacrifices it demands; and there faith sheds its consolations over the fortunes of the wretched, and illuminates their pathway to the grave.

Blessed with a pious and energetic mother, the orphans never wanted for bread or raiment; the evening hymn and the hum of the spinning-wheel lulled them to sleep; the cheerful voice of their ever toiling parent roused them in the morning to render what assistance they could in household matters. She likewise taught them to read—this extent of her own frontier education. Their library consisted of the Bible, and perhaps a well worn copy of the Pilgrim's Progress. By some means or other, the elder brother learned to write, and afterwards taught the younger children. When William was about thirteen years old, he received instructions in arithmetic thirteen and a half days, and he then returned the obligation to his elder brother by initiating him into the mysteries of figures. This is all the education, literally speaking, this eminent divine ever received. The primer, the Bible, and Dilworth's arithmetic constituted his literary stock. And in this, perhaps, we find the germ of the originality and strength, the simplicity and freedom, that characterize his discourses, so different from the trite imitation, the puny scholarship and disgusting pedantry of the mere sciolist. When we find a man, thus self-taught, standing in the first class, and retaining himself during near half a century in public service, one is almost tempted to adopt the sentiment of the celebrated Locke, and his discourse on study:

"I think it is an idle and useless thing to make it one's business to study what have been other men's sentiments in things where reason is only to be judge, on purpose to be able to cite them on all occasions. However he be esteemed a great part of learning, yet a man that considers how little time he has, and how much work to do, how many things he is to learn, how many doubts to clear in religion, how many rules to establish himself in morality, how much pains to be taken to master his unruly passions, how to provide himself against a thousand accidents that will happen, and an infinite deal more both in his general and particular calling—I say, to a man that considers this well, it will not seem much his business to acquaint himself with the various conceits of men that are to be found in books."

This may be regarded as conclusive against the useless lumber, the maze of words and phrases invented to instruct people in the art of disputing; conclusive against the logic, physics, dialectics and divinity of theological schools that send forth men clothed in shining armor, like the effeminate followers of Xerxes, to be hewn down by the strong arm and common sense of the cabin-born, log-taught Methodist itinerant.

When the subject of our sketch was only seven years old, his mother removed to Ten Mile Creek, Green county, Pa.; seven years afterwards, to George's Creek, Fayette county.

When he was in his sixteenth year, she established her homestead in Clermont county, Ohio; and thus commenced his connection with the Valley of the West.

From his earliest years he was sensible to religious impressions. The touching piety of his mother, her prayers and hymns, were heard and felt. At ten years of age he and Valentine Cook and James Smith, preachers well known in the annals of Methodism, and was so deeply impressed that for a long time afterwards he was sad, and shed tears, and prayed that God would make him like them when he became a man. These impressions, however, were subsequently suppressed by the evil companionship into which he fell. His mother lived in the vicinity of extensive iron works, and necessity compelled him to seek employment in them. The hands were men of all countries, and for the most part dissolute and depraved. He learned to dance and swear, gamble and drink, and his Sabbaths were devoted to debauchery. While he was thus plunging into profligacy, a young man, named Davidson, proposed to Mrs. Winans to make her house the preaching place in that part of his circuit. He prayed with them and for them with great fervor, and left an appointment to preach; but severe illness prevented his return. His prayer, however, had not passed unheeded. The petition of the young disciple and the prayer of the widowed mother went up from that lonely dwelling. God heard them; and every word that they uttered, through his sanctifying spirit, pierced the heart of the prodigal son. He fell upon the bosom of his mother and wept, and then sought the deepest solitudes to commune with his wounded heart. Soon after, Simon Gilespie, James Hunter, Wm. Knox, Thornton Flemming and Andrew Hemphill successively preached at Mrs. Winans's, and organized a small society, of which William became a member. The preaching of the brethren Hunter and Hemphill particularly affected him. His evil associations at the iron works, of necessity, still continued, but he was graciously strengthened to resist the demoralization, and to maintain his now engagement, at least in his morals and external forms, faithfully. When they removed to Ohio, he carried with him his certificate of membership. But the dissipating influences of emigration, and a protracted separation from the ordinances of religion, brought with them a careless and indifferent state of mind; and when at length there was an opportunity to claim membership in the church, he declined it from a scruple of conscience that he was not worthy of the relation. Nevertheless he yearned to be a Christian: his love for the Church grew stronger; he was ever striving in prayer, and punctual in seeking the means of grace at love feasts and class meetings. This continued until Christmas Day, 1806, when he was excluded from the privileges of love feast by the Rev. John Collins, a minister whom he warmly loved. This sagacious man had fathomed the heart of the young backslider, and evidently foresaw the effect of the exclusion. Deeply wounded, shut out, as it were, from the people of God, he found consolation in prayer, and on the same day, weeping and heart-stricken, he was received on trial.

But it was not until 1807 that he became truly penitent, and sought diligently and in bitterness of soul for pardon. His conversion and covenant may be dated from Easter Sunday, March 29. He was leading in prayer, at a prayer meeting at night, when God gave peace to his soul and wrought a wonderful change in his whole moral nature, shedding his love abroad in his heart. Very soon thereafter he was appointed class-leader, and on the 29th August was authorized to exhort. His first attempt to preach was in a private house, his mother, brothers and sister being present. Their presence embarrassed him exceedingly. His text was Ephesians, 5: 8. He has since written a sermon on this text, but has never ventured to preach from it, so vivid is his recollection of the embarrassment he experienced.

August 22d, 1808, William Winans was licensed to preach, and immediately entered upon the responsibilities of an itinerant. His first regular appointment, October, 1808, was to Limestone Circuit, Kentucky, including the towns of Maysville, Washington and Augusta, and afterwards Flemingsburg, by the union of the two circuits before his year expired. This appointment was a high compliment to one so young, for the circuit then, as now, embraced the most enlightened population in Kentucky. His next appointment was to the Vincennes Circuit, Indiana, including all the settlements on the Wabash and White rivers, from the Indian line to the Ohio river. He began duty on this circuit—then, perhaps, the most important and extensive west of the mountains—October 17, 1809, and remained until October 23, 1810. But one circuit rider had ever preceded him; there were but three local preachers in his bounds, and during the whole year he met with no traveling preacher. Yet, by the blessing of God, the great work prospered in his hands. Much good was done. Religion made its conquests. Methodism planted its roots deep and wide, and the young itinerant established for himself a reputation still fresh and honorable in that now rich and populous country.

It was while laboring there that Mr. Winans made the acquaintance and enjoyed the confidence of the late President Harrison, then Governor of Indiana Territory and Superintendent of Indian Affairs; a man whose whole life was passed in the service of his country; who filled for thirty years the most responsible appointments invested with plenary powers, and resigned them when no longer necessary, rich in fame, but poorer than when he accepted them; an able and gallant soldier, an enlightened magistrate, an accomplished scholar, a liberal patron of agriculture and the arts, a fervent patriot, a tolerant politician, a generous and good man. While Mr. Winans was enjoying his hospitality at Vincennes, the conference (now historical) with the famous Tecumseh occurred. The Indian Warrior and the American governor were equally brave, patriotic and wise. They viewed the matter in debate—a recent sale of territory by the Miami tribe to the United States—from different standpoints, and both honestly believed they were defending the right. Tecumseh had spoken, very eloquently, from 10 A. M. to 2 P. M. Harrison was replying, pausing after each sentence, that it might be duly interpreted. His manner was stately, grave and impressive. When one of his statements of fact, implying, perhaps, the cordial assent of the Miamis to the sale and the perfect adequacy of the compensation, was rendered into the Indian tongue, Tecumseh sprang to his feet, and cried out, fiercely, "a lie! a lie!" His warriors instantly leaped up, and with menacing gestures reiterated the insult. Harrison placed his hand on the hilt of his sword, but remained silent and calm. Gen. Gibson, who had lived twenty years among the Shawnees, whispered to the officer of a guard of thirteen men, "Have your troop ready; these fellows mean mischief." They were instantly posted five paces in front of Tecumseh and his party, with arms presented and bayonets fixed. This prompt movement doubtless prevented a horrible massacre. The Indians were armed with knives and tomahawks; the whites, with the exception of the small guard, were unarmed. The Governor's house, ten paces distance, was crowded with women and children, spectators of the council, and now pale and trembling with terror. Mr. Winans was standing near Gen. Gibson, and heard him give the order to the officer of the guard. He immediately seized a musket, and took post at the door of the mansion; a movement to which his own modesty attaches no importance, but which history has recorded as equally judicious and gallant. Gen. Harrison always referred to it in strong terms of praise and admiration, and often said that William Winans had all the qualities of a good soldier—quick perception, decision, courage, perseverance. To the latest hour of his life the statesman cherished for the minister the highest respect. I have before me a letter, addressed to me a few days after his election to the Presidency, in which these words occur: "Your opinions on these questions are such as I entertained at one period of my life, and upon which patriotic men may differ. I appreciate your scruples; but you do not understand me as your father would have understood me, had it pleased God to spare his life. You will see me and know me better. Confer with my old friend, William Winans. He is one of the best and one of the wisest men known to me."

And now, having thus imperfectly traced the career of this eminent man through a period of twenty-two years, through a childhood of orphanage and poverty, a youth of trial and temptation, to his happy regeneration and first fields of labor in the ministry, I propose, in my next number, to follow him to the South, whither he came, in his Master's service, some forty-five years ago, and has, ever since striven, not as priests "who seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ," but as two generations will testify, with singleness of purpose, for the salvation of souls.

Bishop Simpson--An Anecdote.

The Philadelphia correspondent of the Pittsburgh Advocate relates the following anecdote in regard to Bishop Simpson:

I am greatly tempted to relate a little incident concerning him which lately occurred within the bounds of our Conference. I hope the Bishop will pardon me bringing him thus unceremoniously before the public, but it is too good to be lost. Some time since, while traveling East, he arrived in Lancaster (a place in which, personally, he was unknown) on Saturday evening, and being unwilling to travel on the Sabbath, he remained until Monday. On Sunday morning he set out from the hotel to find the Methodist church. On his way he happened to inquire of one of the members going to it. As they were walking together this brother discovered that he was a preacher, though from his appearance he supposed a local one, from the country. On arriving at the church he introduced him to the pastor, Rev. Wm. Bishop. Although Brother Bishop heard the name, he never for a moment thought who it was, hesitating whether to ask him to preach, lest he should be ashamed of the effort of one whom he supposed to be a country farmer, he at last gave the invitation, and the Bishop consented. All fears of him were dispelled while he offered his first prayer. During the sermon he enjoyed peculiar liberty, and such a heavenly influence rested upon the congregation that almost every soul was melted, subdued, or carried away on the tide of exultant joy. Brother Bishop was perfectly astonished. Soon after the Bishop had taken his seat, and the intensity of feeling had a little subsided, the pastor said to him:

"Are you a traveling preacher, brother?"

"Yes; I have been an itinerant for several years, and am now traveling a very large circuit."

"What Conference do you belong to?"

"I did belong to the Pittsburgh, but I cannot say that I am now attached to any particular Conference."

"What did you say your name was?"

"Simpson."

"Simpson! Simpson! not Bishop Simpson?"

"Why, they call me Bishop sometimes," was the reply.

In the excitement of the moment, the delighted pastor sprang to his feet, and informed the congregation that they had the pleasure of listening to Bishop Simpson. The day will not soon be forgotten by the Methodists of Lancaster.

MENTAL EXERCISE AND OLD AGE.—Jeremiah Mason said, "Unless a man occasionally tax his faculties to the utmost, they will soon begin to fail." President John Adams said to Mr. Quincy, when he found him reading Cicero, "It is with an old man as with an old horse: if you wish to get any work out of him, you must work him all the time."

SERIAL SERMONS.

NASHVILLE, Feb. 16, 1855.

Mr. Editor—Some time last year I drew up, by request, a plan of discourses on the articles of religion, and published in the Southern Christian Advocate. A desire has been expressed that it should be republished in the columns of the New Orleans Christian Advocate; a copy of the plan I herewith furnish you for that purpose. The insertion will oblige some others as well as yours, truly,

THOMAS O. SUMMERS.

Having been requested to select texts and suggest themes for a series of sermons, I have drawn up the following paper, which, with some diffidence, I present to the consideration of such of my junior brethren in the ministry as may be interested in the matter. In doing this, I shall take occasion to commend and encourage that desire and effort to make full proof of their ministry which, in various ways, is evinced by the young preachers of our communion. We cannot maintain our status in the community, much less extend our influence, unless there be variety, fulness and originality in our pulpit ministrations. Dr. Olin, I believe, speaks of some preachers of his acquaintance, who had been many years in the ministry, whose entire stock in trade consisted of a dozen or two meagre plans of sermons, "yellow papers," he significantly called them, as they had become well begrimed and dingy, by reason of age and constant service. Such preachers' skeletons are marvelously proper name for them, by the way—are not like Ezekiel's dry bones, for he says, "there were very many of them;" and yet they are like them, for "lo," says the prophet, "they were very dry." Dry, indeed, are such skeletons; there is no marrow in these pulpit bones, no flesh on them.

It must be confessed that an itinerant minister is specially exposed to the temptation to indolence in preparation for the pulpit. That temptation is yielded to by some; we are happy to know it is bravely resisted by others. One method by which it may be successfully resisted by ministers is, to resolutely tax himself with the careful preparation of several series of sermons, to be delivered as circumstances and occasions may suggest. In those cases where a minister delivers three or four sermons every week to the same congregation, how edifying it may be to both preacher and people to deliver a series of discourses at one of the services, whether on the week night or the Sabbath, morning, afternoon, or night; the time, of course, to correspond with the circumstances of the congregation and the character of the series. There may be a doctrinal series, taking the apostles' creed and the articles of religion for the basis; there may be a devotional one, taking the liturgical psalms or the Lord's prayer for the basis; there may be a moral course, the ten commandments or the Sermon on the Mount for the basis; there may be an apologetic course, taking the prophecies and miracles, each by groups, as the foundation; there may be an historical series, taking the salient points of Biblical history for the particular subjects; there may be a biographical course, Scripture characters constituting exceedingly interesting and profitable topics for the pulpit; there may be a specific series for extraordinary occasions of religious interest; and there may be other series suited to the genius and talent of the preacher, as well as the circumstances and capacity of his auditory.

In delivering a series of sermons, a minister must be specially guarded against going too much into detail on any one subject. He must confine it to those points which are the most suggestive, and resolutely pass by a thousand others which may clamor for attention, if his library be well stored, and his mind be of the analytic type. Take, for illustration, the articles of religion; a preacher might very well deliver two and fifty discourses on the first article, entitled—unphilosophically and unscientifically, it must be confessed, like nearly all the rest—"Of Faith in the Holy Trinity." On this there may be a sermon, or more than one, on the existence of God; on his perfections, severally considered; on his works in creation and providence; on the unity of the Godhead; on the Tri-personality. On the other hand, if, as Solomon says, the preacher seek to find out acceptable words, carefully maturing and condensing his thoughts, he might discuss every point in the article, very greatly to the edification of his hearers, in a single sermon, coming within the orthodox limits of an hour. It may not be improper to observe that the Anglican confession, of which ours is an abridgement, was formed, so to speak, by accretion, entire articles and portions of articles, many of them of a negative form, being introduced from various sources, concocted at various times, in opposition to Pagan, Gnostic, Manichæan, Sabellian, Arian, Apollinarian, Nestorian, Eutychian, Donatist, Pelagian, Antinomian, Romish, Anabaptist, and other errors. There is, therefore, a lack of unity and scientific arrangement in those articles, whether the twenty-five or the thirty-nine, though not so much so in the former as in the latter. This makes it difficult to arrange them in convenient themes, each with an appropriate text, for pulpit discussion. I have attempted to do this in the following scheme—with what success, others must judge. As I have aimed at the greatest possible simplicity, brevity and comprehension, I have purposely avoided the citation of proof-texts and theological authorities; every man must seek out these for himself. The Bible must be the minister's great text-book; nevertheless the immortal work of Pearson on the Creed, and the inferior though highly valuable work of Burnet on the thirty-nine articles, may be studied with great advantage. There is a small book by Mr. Jamieson on the twenty-five articles, recently published. I have not read it, and have not a copy, but the papers speak of it as a very useful work.

SCHEME OF DISCOURSES ON THE ARTICLES OF RELIGION.

Art. 1. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity—Text, Deut., vi., 4. Show that a trinity of persons is not inconsistent with a unity of essence.

2. Of the Word, or Son of God, who was made very man—Text, John, i., 14. Show that a quality of nature is not inconsistent with a unity of persons, and that the hypostatic union was indispensable for the redemption of man.

3. Of the resurrection of Christ—Text, 1 Peter, i., 21. Establish the fact, and show the design and necessity of Christ's resurrection.

4. Of the Holy Ghost—Text, John xiv., 16, 17. Show the compatability of his procession and personal distinction from the Father and the Son, with his essential identity with them.

5. The sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for salvation—Text, 2 Tim., iii., 16, 17. Prove the genuineness and authenticity of the Scriptures, and show that they are the exclusive and sufficient rule of our faith and practice.

6. Of the Old Testament—Text, John, v., 39. Show that the Gospel is contained in the Old Testament as well as in the New, the conditions of eternal life being substantially the same in both.

7. Of Original or Birth-Sin—Text, Rom., v., 9. Show the inherent and inherited depravity of man's moral nature.

8. Of Free Will—Text, Phil., ii., 12, 13. Prove the natural, moral, total inability of man, and show his capacity of holy volition and action, as restored by preventing and renewing grace.

9. Of the Justification of Man—Text, Rom., v, 1. Show that the sacrifice of Christ is the sole meritorious cause, and faith the only instrumental cause of justification or pardon.

10. Of Good Works—James, ii., 21, 22. Show that our declarative justification by works cannot precede, but must follow our gratuitous justification by faith.

11. Of Works of Supererogation—Text, Luke, xvii., 10. Show the philosophical impossibility of works of supererogation, as well as the arrogance and impiety of pretending to perform them.

12. Of Sin after Justification—Text, James, v., 19, 20. Show that saints may fall into sin and lose their souls, and that apostates may repent and be saved.

13. Of the Church—Text, Acts, ii., 14, 42. Discriminate between the Church as visible and particular, and the Church as invisible and catholic, and show by which notes or signs the invisible Church is identified with the visible.

14. Of Purgatory—Text, Matt., xv., 8, 9. Show that purgatory and other Romish superstitions are vain, because they are unscriptural.

15. Of Speaking in the Congregation in such a Tongue as the People Understand—Text, I Cor., xiv., 18. Show that the celebration of public worship in an unknown tongue is unscriptural and unprimitive; of course, no sound reason can be urged in its defence.

16. Of the Sacraments—Text, I Cor., xi., 1. Define a sacrament, and show that there are but two ordinances that correspond with the definition.

17. Of Baptism—Text, Matt., xxviii., 19, 20. Show the nature, perpetuity, subjects, administration, mode and use of baptism.

18. Of the Lord's Supper—Text, 1 Cor., xi., 23, 32. Show the nature, obligation and advantages of the Lord's Supper, exposing Popish perversions of this ordinance.

19. Of both Kinds—Text, 1 Cor., xi., 23, 29. Show that the denial of the cup in the Lord's Supper to the laity is unscriptural and sacrilegious.

20. Of the One Oblation of Christ Finished upon the Cross—Text, Heb., ix., 24-28. Show the perfection and exclusiveness of Christ's oblation, and the blasphemy and deceit involved in its pretended repetition in Popish masses.

21. Of the Marriage of Ministers—Text, I Cor., ix., 5. Show that the forced celibacy of ministers is unlawful and exceedingly pernicious.

22. Of the Rites and Ceremonies of churches—Text, I Cor., xi., 16. Distinguishing rites and ceremonies which particular churches may ordain and change from ordinances and institutions which they may not; and show why the members of particular churches are bound to observe the former as well as the latter.

23. Of the Rulers of the United States of America—Text, Rom., xiii., 1. Show in what sense civil government is a divine ordinance; prove that the rulers of the United States are rightfully clothed with governmental functions, and that submission to their authority is a Christian duty.

24. Of Christian Men's Goods—Text, Acts, v., 4. Show that the Pentecostal community of goods was designed to subserve a specific purpose, but was not obligatory then, much less intended for a permanent policy; yet it is suggestive of the duty of liberality.

25. Of a Christian Man's Oath—Text, Jer., iv., 2. Distinguish between the swearing which Christ and James forbid and that which "the prophet's teaching" allows; exposing the false reasoning of Anabaptists and others on this subject.

PERVERTS.—The London Christian Times gives a list of the clergymen of the Established Church who have gone over to Rome during the past year. The number foots up only nine!

A GENERAL EUROPEAN WAR.

When the possibility of a rupture between Russia and Turkey was first recognized in Europe, a general belief pervaded all classes, that the mediation of other powers would be sufficient to prevent its ripening into war. When war was proclaimed and actually commenced, even after the interference of France and England, it was thought by eminent men that the trouble had come to a head and was ready to be healed. The fond delusion lingered on until the departure of the Armada for the Baltic, and had life when Odessa was attacked. It is not altogether defunct yet, but in the last stage of existence. Possibly the negotiations at Vienna may result in an armistice—possibly in a peace. It is far more likely they will end in nothing other than a grand European war, such as the world has never seen, engaging all nations to the uttermost extent of their power.

At present we have England, France, Turkey, Egypt, Morocco, Naples, Piedmont, and other smaller States, engaged in a war against Russia. All the available military force of Great Britain has been sent to the Crimea, together with the flower of the French army and the great bulk of the Turkish. Austria has recruited her regiments and Prussia is ready to put her troops upon a war footing—as Sweden and Denmark have already done—at a moment's notice. The Circassians and Persians are both actively engaged; the Poles and Hungarians only wait the moment. These nations, if once they are drawn into active operations, will make the tocsin of war ring its alarum, as widely and wildly as when Frederick the Great or Napoleon met embattled Europe. We shall see a red line of battle drawn from the Atlantic to the Black Sea—from the Mediterranean far above the Gulf of Bothnia. Armies such as have not been marshaled since the time of Xerxes will be put in motion, supplied with such materials of war as no previous age has had a knowledge of. The marauding expedition of Napier and the fruitless siege of Sebastopol will be the minor incidents only of the great contest—its preface and introduction. How great the upheaval of society will be, under such a state of affairs, no one is competent to predict; but that it will result in revolutions, national and international wars, beyond the expectation of most men now ruling, there can be no doubt.

We say that it seems probable a general European war will grow out of the one now existing. There is nothing in the latest advices that have been received, concerning the progress of negotiations, which can be tortured into a reasonable ground of belief that the present Vienna conference will accomplish more than its predecessors—that accomplished precisely nothing. The nations most directly interested in the contest, apparently, have no faith in them. Russia is calling out all of her reserves, strengthening all her defences, increasing all her resources. England is collecting her troops from every colony in which they have been located, augmenting her stores of war in every branch, and preparing for a struggle that becomes of greater magnitude the longer it progresses. France has taken the full conscription for the last two years, and made arrangements for a contest the end of which cannot be surmised. Although Austria has not yet crossed bayonets with any other power she is prepared to do so; and Prussia has followed her example. The gates of Janus have been closed long enough—they are now thrown open. Of all the great nations of the world, our own is the only one not at war with some other.

It is not our present purpose to speculate concerning the result of a battle-field that stretches over the world, or a contest that involves all the energies of all the nations of the earth. There is a great probability that most of us now living will behold the realization of those things that are at present so ominous. The great hope is that we shall not be nationally entangled by them, but that when all other flags are in danger on the high seas, our own will fly proudly in every water, and be an object of regard to every power; that we shall be the common carriers of the world, the ultimate arbitrators of the contest; the only people who, from a general and destructive contest, will reap real prosperity and material advantage.

THE COST OF WAR.—The estimates for the English army and navy for the year 1855-6 have just been published. The total amount required for the army is upward of $58,000,000. The increase on the year 1851 is about $32,000,000. The total increase provided for is 50,819 men and 2610 horses. The navy estimates for the same period, including transports, amount to something like seventy-nine millions of dollars. Of this, about one-third (£5,181,465) is required for transport service and prisoners of war. These estimates are based on employing in the service 38,819 seamen, 10,000 boys, and 16,000 marines; which, with their officers, will make an effective naval force of 70,000 of all ranks.

Thus we find that the English Government contemplate having engaged in the war during the opening year no less than 253,594 men of all ranks in both the services, land and sea, and that the sum necessary to support and render efficient this body of men and the ships to be manned by them, for a single year, will be more than one hundred and thirty-eight millions of dollars. Such is the cost of war in dollars and cents for a single year; or rather, such is the estimated cost, for the actual cost will in the aggregate doubtless greatly exceed these estimates.

AN ECCENTRIC LADY ARRESTED.—Yesterday morning an old, but eccentric, lady named Mrs. Merla Student, was arrested by the police of the Third District for disturbing the congregation of the Dutch Reformed Church on President street, during the morning service. It appears that the old lady has been in the habit of attending the church for several years, and every now and then she has been in the habit of disturbing the congregation. When the domine says any thing in the pulpit that does not please her, she gets up in her seat and tells him he is not preaching according to the constitution of the Reformed Church, and she calls him to order. She did this yesterday morning, and so annoyed the congregation that she had to be removed. For about eight years she has insisted upon occupying one of the best seats in the church free, and refuses to take any other, though they have often been offered to her. On one occasion some six or seven police officers took possession of her seat, but she forced her way in among them, and would have sat upon their knees, if they had refused to make room for her. The congregation yesterday opened a new place of worship, but still the old lady was there. In one of the seats, with her usual habit of calling the minister to order, and for this interruption she was removed by the police. She threatened to try their right to remove her in the station-house, and was very indignant, but after being detained several hours, she was allowed to depart in peace. [Brooklyn Journal.

The Czar's Death, etc.

HALIFAX, March 5.—The advices by the Africa, in addition to the reported death of the Czar of Russia, possesses many features of interest. In the House of Lords, the Earl of Clarendon stated that it was his duty to inform their lordships of the death of the Emperor Nicholas, accompanying his remarks with the announcement that there was no doubt of the authenticity of the statement.

Lord Palmerston made the same announcement in the House. The definite news of the death was received by telegraph at an early hour on Saturday morning. No details were received, but there can be no mistake in the announcement, as it was previously known that all hope of the Emperor's recovery had been given up by his physicians.

The first surprise was, that he was assassinated, but the above view of the case indicates that the Czar's death was caused by pulmonary apoplexy, after an attack of influenza. The event occurred, as has already been stated, on the morning of the 21 of March, and caused great excitement throughout Europe.

Expectation had become stronger in favor of peace, and even Prussia seems now more favorable to the Allies. The Vienna Conference was to open on the 5th inst.

Lord John Russell had arrived at Berlin, and immediately had an audience with the King of Prussia, who seems to be making an attempt to come to an understanding with the Western Powers. All the plenipotentiaries, except Lord John Russell, had arrived at Vienna.

Notwithstanding the Russian professions of peace, warlike preparations were never greater in that nation.

The Crimea.

The news from the Crimea is embraced in the accounts of two night sorties by the Russians. They occurred on the 13th and 14th of February, and resulted on the part of the Allies in the death of forty Frenchmen.

On the 7th ult., Eupatoria was attacked by a force of 25,000 Russians under Gen. Osten Sacken, who, after a combat of five hours duration, were vigorously repulsed by the Turks. The Russians lost 500 men killed and wounded, in proportion, while the Turks had 88 killed and 250 wounded. The latter lost seventy horses. Of the French who were engaged in the battle, eighteen were killed. Six steamers of the Allied fleet were sent to Eupatoria to assist in the defence, and many villages in the neighborhood of Eupatoria were damaged by their fire.

Great Britain.

The Earl of Carlisle has been definitely appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. With this exception, there had been no change in the Ministry since the departure of the Pacific.

The Duke of Newcastle had been summoned to give his evidence before the Roebuck committee of investigation into the delay in the prosecution of this war. The investigation was being vigorously prosecuted.

Meetings deprecating the war were on the increase throughout the country.

The Earl of Lucan publishes a convincing letter to Lord Raglan, exhonerating himself from all blame in the matter of the cavalry charge at Balaklava.

France.

Nothing further is known respecting the Emperor's proposed visit to the Crimea. He was at the latest date at the camp of St. Omar.

There were rumors of important arrests for political causes having been made in Paris. Persons of high distinction are implicated.

Italy.

The Chambers have voted the suppression of monasteries.

From China!

The overland mail had arrived with dates from Hong-Kong to January 15. The insurgents still held Canton in siege, and had gained several victories over the Imperialist fleet.

HALIFAX, March 15.—The Cunard steamship Africa has arrived at this port, with dates from Liverpool to March 3d.

It was officially announced in both Houses of Parliament, on Friday night, that the Emperor of Russia died on Friday morning.

Great excitement was caused by the announcement, and strong hopes of peace are now entertained.

The Vienna Conference was to have been opened on the 5th inst.

Commercial Intelligence.

The Liverpool cotton market was dull, and prices were without change since the departure of the Pacific.

Breadstuffs were quiet and without material change. Consols closed at 91¼.

NEW YORK, March 14.—The Collins steamship Pacific, Capt. Nye, has arrived at this port, with ten days later news from Europe.

Her advices are to February 27, three days later than her regular day of sailing, but are not of marked importance. The following brief summary embraces all the news of interest.

The War.

The Russians attacked the Turks at Eupatoria on the 10th of February, but were compelled to retire, after a desperate struggle.

There is nothing of the least importance from Sebastopol.

The British Cabinet.

Mr. Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Sidney Herbert and Sir James Graham, First Lord of the Admiralty, had resigned their positions in the British Cabinet, owing to the passage of Mr. Roebuck's motion of inquiry into the management of the war by Parliament.

Riots in England.

Great riots had occurred in London and Liverpool, and there was much distress throughout Great Britain, owing to the severity of the winter.

Details of the News by the Pacific.

NEW YORK, March 14.—The resignation of Messrs. Graham, Gladstone and Herbert is reported to have been caused by squabbles in the Cabinet. Lord Palmerston had great difficulty in filling the vacancies. Lord John Russell has accepted the Colonial Secretaryship. Members of the Government appear confident that the present negotiations will lead to an honorable peace.

Louis Napoleon seems determined to go to the Crimea, and England and Austria are endeavoring to dissuade him therefrom.

It is reported that Russia has declared war against Sardinia.

In the affair at Eupatoria the Russian and Turkish forces were about equal. The Turks were protected by the fire of the English ships, and after four hours fighting, the Russians retired. The Turks did not pursue them.

At Sebastopol the weather was moderating, and the condition of the troops improving. It was believed that the assault would soon be made.

Lord Lucan was recalled from his command in the Crimea, on account of differences with Lord Raglan.

The new Baltic fleet is to consist of one hundred ships, carrying 2300 guns.

Destitution in England had reached a frightful point.

The riot at Liverpool lasted two or three days.

Know-Nothingism and Methodism.

The Southern and the Richmond Advocates are out in able editorials, defending the Methodist Church from any implication, pro. or con., in which there is an effort to involve it with the Know-Nothings. The politicians, who are pulling at that string, had better let it go.

We hope our contemporaries may be more fortunate than we have been in the candor of those journalists they reply to. We had a right to expect of the Louisiana Courier, to whom unjust, injurious and unfounded charge we, a fortnight ago, made a respectful but decisive reply, that it would make the amende honorable. This it has not done.

Instead of a prompt apology and unequivocal retraction of its publication that two days out of a session of four were taken up by the late Mississippi Conference in "initiating circuit riders into the new order," the conductors of that journal profess to be "extremely gratified at this (our) assurance from so respectable a quarter," and in the same sentence assert that their information, upon which the slanderous charge was published, "was obtained from sources as respectable as any in this or any other State." So the readers of the Courier are left in doubt whether the charge is true or untrue.

Is this candor? Is it justice?

The Synagogue.

This chaste and fine building, corner of Canal and Bourbon streets, is being torn down, to give place to stores, one of which has already been rented at $15,000 per annum. Commerce is king.

The Jewish Church will build in less costly and noisy ground.

This was the first Protestant Episcopal Church in New Orleans. On the removal of the congregation lower down on Canal street, it was bought by Judah Touro, and by him donated to the Jewish Church.

Mr. Touro had a penchant for the temples of Christians. The First Presbyterian Church was bought by him, also, and the First Baptist. When sold, he stood ready to buy.

A GREAT WORK.—We publish such items as this to encourage Christians and stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance that this is the dispensation of the Spirit. Great works may be expected and must take place before the KINGDOM comes.

"The Reverend Wm. Stevenson, writing to the Western Christian Advocate, from Paris, Ill., gives an account of a revival in progress in the M. E. Church in that place. He says: 'Among the number converted are nineteen entire families, none of whom were religious at the commencement of the meeting. Among the accessions are fifty-seven young men, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five. If faithful, there is no estimating the amount of good these young men may accomplish.'"

OUR FOREIGN NEWS.—Says a reader, "I get more correct and satisfactory accounts of foreign matters in the Advocate than any other of my papers." The vastness and profound moral and social significance of events now transpiring in the Old World as well as the New, justify our patrons in expecting to be kept posted up, and this we endeavor to do as far as possible.

SALARIES.—We have seen a striking table of calculations, made for the longitude and latitude of various churches, going to show that the ministry was paying the cost of public worship. We clip an extract:

"The average claims of preachers belonging to the Kentucky Conference for the year 1854 were $402, and the average receipts $312. The highest salary paid any one preacher was $1,200, and the lowest $60.

REVIVALS.—The revival department of the Chicago Advocate, of Februnry 21st, shows an accession of 1,050 members; the Northern Advocate, of same date, about 200; the Christian Advocate and Journal, near 700; and the Pittsburg Advocate, over 300.

MOUNT ZION CIRCUIT, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.—Rev. G. Hawkins, pastor, writes:

"We have just held our first quarterly meeting for this circuit. We have had a good meeting for this season of the year. The members all alive. Many penitents at the altar of prayer. Four conversions, five accessions, and great seriousness throughout the congregation.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS are prospering in Texas. They are manifesting much interest in ministerial education, and sustain a paper at Huntsville. A Presbytery of the New School was organized in Crockett on the 20th of December last.

X. Y. Z.—Our English correspondence was received too late for publication this week.

FOR THE MINISTRY.—Nine beneficiaries of the Young Men's Aid Society of the Virginia Conference are pursuing their studies for the ministry at Randolph Macon College, Va.

Going and Returning.

President's Election—Faculty—Friends—Capital of the State—Asylum for the Blind—Review of Louisiana Educational Enterprise—Failures—Cost—Present Statistics—New Cemetery—Vandalism—Last night of a Legislature.

A called meeting of the Joint Board of Trustees and visitors of Centenary College, Tuesday finds us in Baton Rouge, which is all astir with the expiring activities of the Legislature. As a rival in size and appearance to the Capitol, the Asylum for Mutes and Blind rises up, situated a quarter of a mile below and a little further back from the River. A centre building and wings, now ready for roofing. The Legislature granted an appropriation of forty thousand dollars for finishing it. Around the State House a rail fence is being put up, at a cost of forty thousand dollars. Singular time to be expending money for that purpose, when a vote is again to be taken on the location of the State House. Restless people, ours are. A few years ago it was moved. The foolish jealousy between city and country plays a see-saw.

Our friend Cronshaw brings us, in company with the Presiding Elder of the District, on our way. He lives on the capitoline suburbs; house built on broad acres, shaded and swarded round with refreshing coolness, and large enough to meet the demands even of his generous hospitality. Meet here with Rev. T. H. Foster, the pastor of the Methodist Church, and glad to find him installed in his place and the hearts of the good people. Sitting in the galleries of the Legislature, hear an act passed to pay him and three co-officiating clergy $150 each for chaplain services.

Centenary College has for some time been without a President. From the number of students in attendance it seems the professors were doing well, without a head. In the college proper, over a hundred; all departments included, two hundred students. Some eighteen members of Joint Board present on Wednesday, 14th March. Dr. Winans, President; Rev. W. H. Watkins, Secretary. The college faculty was finally completed with unanimity, and stands thus:

Rev. J. C. MILLER, President.

A. R. Holcombe, Professor Greek Language and Literature.

G. H. Wiley, Professor of Latin.

Rev. W. H. Scales, Professor of Mathematics.

Dr. T. Jones, Professor of Natural Science and Philosophy.

Rev. A. G. Miller, Principal of Preparatory Department.

The preparations for completing the college buildings go on, and by commencement, in July next, we expect to see the corner stone of the centre building laid. The funds already in hand amount to $12,000. The Legislature lately made an appropriation of $10 000 for this purpose, on condition that the college educate, free of tuition fees, three indigent students from each Congressional District, said students to be nominated by the Governor, and not more than twelve to be in the college at any one time.

This judicious appropriation and the results of the meeting of the Joint Board on the 14th inst. will give increased confidence to the country in the success of this institution. The report of Judge Carrigan, Superintendent of Public Schools, accords to Centenary College a high place in usefulness and success among the institutions of this State.

Louisiana has held a liberal but not always judicious policy towards the higher academic institutions. She has spent almost fabulous sums on colleges that now are not. Not one, but many trials has she made. In his message of 1839, Gov. Roman thus brings the subject to the notice of the Louisiana Legislature:

"I have often urged a reform of our existing system of public education, and I think it necessary to do so again. The intelligence of the people is the basis upon which rests the stability of our institutions; it is the only support upon which we can rely to maintain the supremacy of the laws. If despotic governments find sometimes an advantage in checking the diffusions of light, it is always the first of a popular one to afford to all the citizens the means of becoming acquainted with their rights, and of acquiring that degree of knowledge indispensably necessary for the performance of the public functions which may devolve upon them.

The Legislature of Louisiana has shown itself fully sensible of this truth; for there is not a State in the Union in which such liberal provisions have been made to bring instruction home to the people.

The State of New York in 1838, appropriated $110,000 for the support of its primary schools.

Louisiana, in the same year, devoted $115,382 to purposes of public education. But in New York 528,913 children profited by the bounty of the State; while here we cannot obtain complete returns showing the condition of the schools!"

The main baulk has been a want of proper supervision, uninterfered with by party fluctuations. The able report, just printed, of the State Superintendent of Public Education, reviews the whole system from the beginning, and brings us to this conclusion.

The College of Orleans was first established. After a lingering existence of ten years from the date of its organization, the college was abolished, and the moneys heretofore appropriated to that institution were apportioned to the Louisiana College, established at Jackson, 1825, and the Poydras Female Asylum.

The College of Rapides was established in 1820, and considerable sums were annually appropriated for the erection of suitable buildings and for its support. No report is on record relative to its proceedings. The moles and bats have possession, we presume.

In 1831, Gov. Roman said:

"Twelve years have passed since the enactment of our first law on public schools. Such a lapse of time is undoubtedly long enough to enable us to judge of the result of the present system. It has had a fair trial. From the books of the Treasurer it appears that $354 012 57, since 1818, have been appropriated and paid out of the public funds for the use of schools, and it is doubtful whether 354 indigent children have derived from those schools the advantages which the Legislature wished to extend to that class throughout the State. It is useless to add anything to show that this system is bad, and ought to be abandoned. It is, however, calculated that four hundred young Louisianians are now receiving their education either in the colleges of the other States of the Union or of Europe, and the sums annually taken out of the State for their education cannot be estimated at less than a hundred thousand dollars. Part of their youth is spent far from the fostering care of their friends and parents; they return completely strangers to our manners, our customs, and above all, to our climate; whilst the same money expended in Louisiana would produce the same advantage, without any of the evil consequences. The Legislature that shall be enabled to change such a state of things may well flatter themselves of having merited the applause of their constituents."

From the year 1835 to 1840 there was great enthusiasm manifested in favor of the establishment of colleges and academies, to which liberal appropriations were granted, the primary school being in a measure lost sight of. Jefferson College, in St. James' parish, was added to the list. It shows finely to the traveler on the river.

During a few years the State colleges were in a flourishing condition, and the most encouraging reports were received, both from the trustees and the legislative committees who were yearly appointed to examine them.

In a report dated 5th March, 1841, it is stated that the following appropriations were made to the colleges of the State up to the 31st December, 1840:

To the College of Louisiana	$217 878 57
To the College of Jefferson	188 917 74
" Franklin	62 415 00
" Baton Rouge	12 000 00

The College of Louisiana has an annual appropriation of..... 20,000 00

The College of Jefferson has an annual appropriation of..... 15,000 00

The College of Baton Rouge has an annual appropriation of..... 3,000 00

At the College of Baton Rouge there are 4 professors and 50 students.

At that of Louisiana, there are 5 professors and 78 students.

At that of Jefferson, there are 9 professors and 238 students.

At that of Franklin, there are 3 professors and 61 students.

In 1842, the treasury of the State being embarrassed, it was recommended to withhold the annual appropriations. They were gradually withdrawn, and the colleges ceased operations. They ought by that time to have been on a self-sustaining basis. The Jefferson was the last to let go the State teat. In 1845 it received its last appropriation, fell off and died. The others had died before it. Nothing was left, after all these hopes and expenditures, but bare walls. The chairman of the Committee on Education, speaking of them in 1845, reciting their inglorious career, adds:

"To none of these institutions would your committee recommend any further appropriation. Their failure to attain the objects the State had in view in their establishment and liberal endowment has proven most clearly the impracticability of succeeding with colleges as State institutions."

By such a small appropriation as this ten thousand dollars to Centenary, the State furthers the interest of education more than she has done with hundreds and thousands otherwise expended.

This is the summing up in dollars. We condense from the report:

"The Secretary of State, in his report for 1845, stated that from 1812 to 1843 there had been paid by the State Treasury for city and parish schools, $358,771 99, and for academies and colleges, $781,406 26, making together, $1,540,178 25. The amount paid for the support of free public schools, from 1st April, 1843, to 1st April, 1845, was $45,115 30. The amount paid out by the Treasurer in 1846 was $23,292 34; for 1847-8, $40,000."

The appropriations since the commencement of the present system of public education have been as follows:

Year.	Amount.
1849	$250,000
1850	250,000
1851	240,000
1852	240,000
1853	250,000
1854	300,000
Total	$1,520,000

Total amount of appropriations for public education, from 1811 up to March 31, 1855..... $2,168,885 72

The present state of public schools is thus presented:

"Complete returns have been received from the parish assessors, from which it appears the total number of white youth in the State between the ages of six and sixteen years, is 62,682. The total number of children attending school during the year is 24,000, to which must be added 12,000, attending the public schools of the city of New Orleans, making a total of 36 000 children attending the public schools in this State."

The average price of tuition per scholar, per annum, is nine dollars.

If our readers will excuse the heaviness and dryness of these items, on account of their usefulness, and find out the true causes of these failures, and perfect a plan, we will pass on to other things. Rev. L. Campbell, the agent, will bring these facts before them to good purpose.

Returning to Baton Rouge, the cemetery attracts attention. Now yet; a marble or granite shaft rising only here and there. Not a tree or shrub growing—naked and bald; ground covered with stumps; adjoining is a forest of magnolias and other fine trees. Why did they not spare the noble aborigines? It will take a generation to raise up their like. Wise cemetery commissioners, to be sure! They remind us of Paddy, who was employed by a gentleman to trim the trees of his choice orchard. "Have you finished?" was the question at dinner time. "No, but I divided out them all even, and would trim them in the afternoon!

Thursday night the Legislature adjourned, as nothing was expected. From the gallery we see singular pranks for the assembled wisdom. Republicanism is run down at the heels. The session is closing, and gentlemen let themselves out.

The Speaker of the House is signing bills. A member in the chair. House waiting for Senate business and Governor's message. Members pelting each other, first with balls of paper, then heavy pamphlets, knocking over candles and inkstands. The page, smirking, hands up a paper to the clerk. Clerk bawls out, "Resolved, that the gentleman from Livingston be requested to express his views on matters and things in general." Roars of laughter. The chairman (a gentleman on a crutch happens to be "the gentleman from Livingston") says if they intend to insult him, he will leave the chair.

A few quiet members, in the outskirts, are writing at their desks; the mass walking, hallooing, whistling, smoking; paper balls flying particularly thick at heads crying, "Mr. Speaker!"

"Message from the Governor—Senate." Slight lull. Another chairman. At it again. A Jewish looking gentleman called; mounts the clerk's desk—sings; encored; sings again. Another vociferation brings out another amateur, who sings "Widow Machree." The gentleman from Jerusalem reappears; sings a solo, and the honorable members the chorus.

A new fun maker appears. "The gentleman from New Orleans," who is in the chair, raps the hammer on his head. He rubs it and wrys. Shouts of laughter. "Bring a fiddle," cries the hummerboard. He is the "gentleman from St. Landry." A fiddle is brought; "the gentleman from Plaquemine," steps forth with the confidence of a Paganini, at the call of the House, and takes hold of that dignified instrument, pulls off his coat, strips down his collar, and the ceremony seems instinct with life. Out jumps "the gentleman from ———," coat off, and does the Sambo, in a real breakdown; the "wisdom" assembled close around and cheer uproariously. It is 9½ o'clock, and we leave, of opinion that the "assembled wisdom of the State" was a very lively assembly just before adjournment.

The ayes and noes were taken with a perfect yell. As well try to hear the falling of a single drop of the cataract of Niagara, as the speech of any legislator. One, a small gentleman, from New Orleans, took his own way to catch the Speaker's ear by catching his eye. Mounting a chair, with an accompanying gesticulation, he bawled, "Mr. Speaker! Mister Speaker! M-i-s-t-e-r Speakuh!" Paper pellets, pamphlets, reports, storm his bald head, but he maintains his position—on the chair. A tall, intellectual looking gentleman, (some fun in him,) walks up to him. Slam! comes down on the bald pate of tall gentleman—a big pamphlet. House splits its sides. "Hit him again!"

We feel bound to say of the breakdown dance that it was well done—done to the music! The "Widow Machree" was well sung. The "Star Spangled Banner" chorus hardly got well under way before it was interrupted by a messenger from the Senate. It bid fair to swell to magnificent proportions.

We never saw a legislature upon the eve of adjournment before. Though called the "Lower House," some of its members were pretty "high." "From Muine to Louisiana" there is a distance.

We would not, of course, be understood as disapproving the good humor prevailing. The prospect of return to home and families and winding up the toils of a session, must be cheering. And—

"A little nonsense, now and then,
Is relished by the wisest men."

The rowdyism—for by that name we must call it—shocked our every idea of legislative dignity and propriety. Looking on the scene, we could not down at bidding the horrid suggestion, "our Government is yet an experiment."

We left sympathizing with those members who would not join and could not suppress these Saturnalia. Passing by the Senate Chamber, we found an earnest and grave assembly. The manner in which laws are made here, would help one to respect as well as obey them.

Dr. Achilli.

From late accounts, this neophyte Protestant turns out a scurvy fellow. He is nearer Swedenborgian than anything else, and this is the best that we learn of him. By the time Romanism has passed a man through a course as thorough as Achilli's was, there is not left much foundation of character to build a reformation on.

The St. Louis Watchman, 8th inst., says:

"This somewhat noted gentleman lectured in our city on Sabbath afternoon last, to an audience of from two to three hundred. He has so much of the foreign accent as to make it difficult to follow him. We could understand enough however to satisfy us thoroughly that he is 'on the wrong track.' His 'beautiful tree,' 'new (Jerusalem) church,' 'the youngest of the family,' and therefore, as he thinks, worthy to be 'cherished by all,' is of quite too modern growth altogether too young, to suit the lovers of old fashioned, primitive Christianity.

"We understand, on good authority, that the Doctor has translated two of Swedenborg's works for the edification of the 'new church' in Italy. The poor man has also made the discovery that 'Evangelical Protestantism' is full as bad as Romanism."

Assurance Extraordinary.

Should not the multitude of words be answered; and should a man full of talk be justified? Is the interrogatory our correspondent "Zophar" puts in a communication of facts that we should be slow to believe but for the good authority avouching them. Moreover, we have been obliged to believe some hard things of the same sort.

The Bishop of a Diocese not far off, and given to proselyting and anabaptism, entered our correspondent's "work," and in conversation with a lady, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, asked if she had ever been baptized. She had. By whom? A Methodist minister. His deep regret was expressed. He hoped to have had the satisfaction of baptizing her himself; and added, "I would rather have my right arm severed from my body than to be baptized or receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper at such hands." The last our informant heard of this successor of Paul (who was sent to preach the Gospel, rather than baptize) he was beating up candidates for baptism among Methodist families.

Surely he is not aware of the enlightenment and spirit of this age. We advise that he seek out those dark corners where the people believe Gen. Jackson still alive and vote for him at the elections. There he may pass off his ecclesiastical brass and bogus.

The intelligence of Southern people is much overrated if such assurance can be played off. They are not so Green as that. We wish these gentlemen could learn something from the wiser ones who have honored their own titles.

"I am fully satisfied," says Bishop Hoadly, "that till a consummate stupidity can be happily established, and universally spread over the land, there is nothing that tends so much to destroy all due respect to the clergy as the demand of more than can be due to them; and nothing has so effectually thrown contempt upon a regular succession of the ministry as the calling no succession regular but what was uninterrupted, and the making the eternal salvation of Christians to depend upon that uninterrupted succession of which the most learned must have the least assurance, and the unlearned can have no notion but through ignorance and credulity."

The Sunday School Fruits.

The agents, Carlton & Phillips, have favored us with the annual report of the Sunday School Union of the M. E. Church.

The report for 1854 is full of encouragement to the friends of Sunday schools. It exhibits an aggregate of 9,908 schools, containing 553,065 scholars, under the care of 107,649 officers and teachers. This is an increase of 470 schools, 28,057 scholars, and 1,917 officers and teachers over the returns of 1853. The increase in the number of communicants in the Church, last year, was 20,732. So that for nearly every new member received in the Church a new scholar was added to the Sunday schools.

The number of conversions in the schools during 1854 is set down at 17,494. An increase of 578 over the returns of 1853. What a delightful fact this is! More than 17,000 children and youth led to Christ in one year, by the instrumentality of Sunday school labors. Assuredly, if the Sunday school institution is insignificant in its details, it is more than magnificent in its results. It creates a multitude of tiny springs, whose waters flowing together pour a mighty, unceasing tide of health, youth and vitality into the Church. The man who despises it must be either ignorant of its real importance, or wanting in true regard for the prosperity of the Church.

The income of the Union was $9,935; an increase of only $351 over the preceding year.

An English Lady in Germany.

An English lady resident at Coblentz, one day wished to order of her German servant (who did not understand English) a boiled fowl for dinner. Grettel was summoned, and the experiment began. It was one of the lady's fancies that the less liar words resembled her native tongue the more it must be like the German. So her first attempt was to tell the maid that she wanted a clucking, or cooking. The maid opened her eyes and mouth, and shook her head. "It's to cook," said the mistress, "to cook, to put in an iron thing, in a pit—pat—pot." "Ish understand risht," said the maid, in her Coblentz patois. "It's a thing to eat," said her mistress, "for dinner—deener—with sauce, sauce—sowses. What on earth am I to do?" exclaimed the lady, in despair, but still making another attempt. "It's a little creature—a bird—a beard—a hen—a bone—a fowl—a fool; it's all covered with feathers—fathers—feeders!" "Hu, ha!" cried the delighted German, at last getting hold of a catchword, "ja, ja! fedders—jah woh!" and away went Grettel, and in half an hour returned triumphantly with a bunch of stationer's quills.

SINGULAR CONVERSION.—A writer in the Glasgow Record gives the following:

"The conversion of ———, a young lady, is very strange as related to me. She, being much honored and favored in gay circles, was waiting one evening on a pair of silk shoes for a soiree and ball to which she had been invited. When the shoes came they were wrapped in a fragment of a missionary magazine, and as the time to go was not yet at hand, it came into her mind, for diversion's sake, to look into the curious paper and see its silly meditations. And the gracious God was near, and so blessed that glance and reading that from that hour she felt no rest till she knew by heart the kind Saviour of men, and by faith had won an interest in him."

Mezzafonti.

HIS WONDERFUL MEMORY.

In distinguished men the thorough awakening and vigorous exertion of the mind has more to do with their eminence than is generally thought. In most men the intellectual energies slumber, or are but half put forth. A correspondent of the New York Tribune, writing from Rome, relates some anecdotes of the eminent linguist, Cardinal Mezzafonti, which illustrates this truth. Mezzafonti is able to speak fifty-two languages. The Pope attributes his extraordinary powers in this respect to miraculous aid. A friend of the Cardinal's informed the writer that he took the same view of the case; which, with the circumstances mentioned below, shows that his powers as a linguist did probably receive, when extraordinary exertion was demanded, a remarkable impulse and development.

He states that when he was an obscure priest, in the north of Italy, he was called one day to confess two foreigners condemned for piracy, who were to be executed the next day. On entering their cell he found them unable to understand a word he uttered. Overwhelmed with the thought that the criminals should leave this world without the benefits of religion, he returned to his room, resolved to acquire their language before morning. He accomplished his task, and the next day confessed them in their own tongue. From that time on, he says, he had no difficulty in mastering the most difficult language. The purity of his motive in the first place, he thinks, influenced the Deity to assist him miraculously. A short time since a Swede, who could speak a patois peculiar to a certain province in Sweden, called on him and addressed him in that dialect. Mezzafonti had never heard it before, and seemed very much interested. He invited him to call on him often, which he did, while the conversation invariably turned on this dialect. At length the Swede, calling one day, heard himself, to his amazement, addressed in this difficult patois. He inquired of the Cardinal who had been his master; for he thought, he said, there was no man in Rome who could speak that language but himself. "I have had none but yourself," he replied. "I never forget a word I hear once!"

Day of Humiliation and Prayer.

By proclamation, Gov. Wineton has appointed the 7th of April next to be observed by the people of Alabama as a day of humiliation and prayer.

Ministers are requested to hold services in churches on that day. The Governor's proclamation is based upon the "course of Providence in withholding rain and cutting off communication within our country, as well as in permitting disturbances and conflicts of nations, having a wide spread influence, and affording matter for reflection and prayer for the devout and profound and serious solicitude to the patriotic."

Rev. J. Hutchinson writes us from Columbus, Miss.: "We have given out all idea of a river for this season. Our merchants are waggoning their goods from the head of the railroad, and planters send down their cotton by like conveyance."

Letters from the interior of Alabama speak despondingly and in the same strain.

Eternal Glory.

The term of glory is forever. Even in the short life of man, men who are raised very high in place and popular esteem may, and often do, outlive their own glory. But the glory of God lasteth as long as himself, for he is unchangeable; his throne is forever, and his wrath forever, and, therefore, his glory forever.

Praise—but what wonder is it that the Lord loses the revenue of his praises at the hands of the common, ungodly world, when even his own people fall so far behind it as they usually do? The dead cannot praise him; but that they who are quickened by his Spirit should yet be so surprised with dullness as to this exercise of exalting God, this is very strange.

That soul is most noble which singly and fixedly aims at exalting God, and seeks to have this stamp on all it speaks and does, and all that it desires: All to the greater glory of my God.—Leighton.

Wesley's Sermons Wanted.

Rev. W. C. Moreland, from an interior parish of Louisiana, concludes a business letter with the following request. We take pleasure in advising our brethren that the book agents have on hand an excellent edition of Wesley's Sermons. If we only had a depository in New Orleans, they could be furnished. If!—

"Dear brother, excuse the suggestion, but as too few in this section of country have Mr. Wesley's Sermons, a few extracts through the columns of your paper from them on the subject of 'Evil Speaking,' 'Dress,' &c., &c., would no doubt accomplish much for practical religion and Methodism."

New Postage Law.

We copy the following statement in relation to the new Post office regulations from the Washington Union:

"We are requested to call special attention to the law just passed by Congress modifying the rates of postage, &c., particularly to those provisions requiring that all letters between places in the United States shall be prepaid from and after the 1st April, 1855, by stamps or otherwise, and that from and after the 1st of January next postmasters must place postage stamps upon all prepaid letters upon which stamps may not have been placed by the writers, or which may not be enclosed in stamped envelopes.

"From and after the 1st April, 1855, the postage to be charged on each single letter for any distance in the United States, not exceeding 3,000 miles is three cents, and over 3,000 miles ten cents."

Notices of New Publications.

Through J. C. Morgan's Literary Depot, adjoining the Post Office, we have been furnished, by the publishers, with the new publications following. Morgan keeps them, with a various assortment, on sale.

THE ESS OF CONTROVERSY CONTROVERTED. A Refutation of Milner's End of Controversy—By Bishop Hopkins, of Vermont. Two vols. 8mo. Stanford & Swords: New York.

Letters addressed to Archbishop Kenrick, of Baltimore. He is addressed, because of a printed address of his to the Bishops of the P. E. Church in the United States, in which, encouraged by the movement in that direction, he invites them all to read Milner's book, and hasten to transfer themselves to Rome, lest their flocks should go before them. Milner is much relied on by the priesthood, as an instrument for proselyting. His style is popular; besides, he is an adept in historic perversions, and in all these concessions made by English Divines in favor of Romanism.

Bishop Hopkins is garrulous. His work is limited to the vindication of the Church of England and his own. Occupying this distinct ground and narrow, the vindication is not so clear and strong as Protestantism admits of. Yet he rectifies many important sophistries and falsifications. We cannot see any difference in his favor in the question with Rome about "Hear the Church," and the "Scriptures the only and sufficient rule of faith and practice."

STANHOPE BORLEIGH—The Jesuits in Our Homes. By Helen Dhu. Stringer & Townsend: New York, 1855.

The author is said to be C. Edwards Lester, late correspondent of the London Times, by which appointment he made notoriety. It is another and ingenious defence of Know-Nothings, in novel. This free land opened an inviting field to the "S. J.," as they sign themselves—Society of Jesus—who in 1848 fled in dismay from the crumbling monarchies of Europe. They survey the seat of future empire with keen and far-seeing eyes, and locate their institutions accordingly. It is only within the last year or two that anything like a general alarm has spread over the American people about the progress of Jesuitism in this country. The late missal of their chief, resident at Rome, instructing them to have nothing to do with politics, but confine themselves to the salvation(!) of souls, does not lessen this alarm. Shallow trick of instruction! Strange, if the salvation of souls, and not political scheming, be their business, that they have to be told of it in the eve of the world, at this late day.

As an expose of "Jesuits in our homes," this book is full of authentic information, and quite arousing.

FOLL PROOF OF THE MINISTRY.—By J. N. Norton, A. M., Rector of Ascension Church, Frankfort, Ky. Redfield: New York, 1855.

A "rector" of small but industrious capacity, cowed by the "sects," and anxious to wedge himself in and wedge others out, may find a guide and comforter here. The cause stands some chance now that novels have been taken up as a promoter. Party may thrive and bigotry; but the KINGDOM will never come on such a method.

THE INITIALS.—A Story of Modern Life. T. B. Peterson: Philadelphia, 1855.

Scene laid in Germany, as we gather from the jaw-breaking names. Glancing along we gather a few items of life in Germany.

Tribute of Respect.

The Auburn (Ala.) Gazette, 16th inst., records another of the many tributes to the deceased Bishop Capers:

"On Sunday last, according to previous understanding, the Rev. Mr. McCarty, pastor in charge, delivered a funeral discourse commemorative of the noble, godly and useful life, the great services, and the serene and peaceful death of the lamented Bishop. The audience was very large, and the greatest interest was manifested in the exercises of the occasion. The sermon established a parallel between the career of Paul, the apostle, and the good man lately deceased, showing the similarity of their conduct in the honesty of their intentions, the facility with which they yielded to conviction of truths they had once disregarded, the greatness of their personal sacrifices in carrying out their designs, the unwavering zeal with which they pursued their calling, their catholicity, their missionary spirit, their steadfast faith, their indomitable energy, their successful ministry, and their triumphant death."

DEATH OF A WESLEYAN MINISTER, AGED 108.—Rev. G. Fletcher, who has recently died, was born on the 2d of February, 1747. From six years of age he had been brought up in the tenets of Wesleyanism, and remained a faithful member of that body until his decease, which took place on the 2d ult. He spent eighty-three years of his life in active pursuits; he was twenty-one years a farmer, twenty-six years he served his sovereign in the army, was at the battle of Bunker Hill, and followed Abercrombie into Egypt, where he gained the esteem and respect of his officers. An excellent portrait was painted of Mr. Fletcher when in the 107th year of his age.

The Tercentenary of the martyrdom of Joe. Rogers was celebrated in London on the 4th ult., by sermons in St. Paul's Cathedral and several other churches. It is proposed to erect some memorial to the martyrs, whether monument or church, is a doubt.

Four members of the North Congregational Church, in Springfield, Mass., including one of the deacons, were excommunicated for having embraced the heresies of Spiritualism.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

Writes a brother to me: "It is almost provoking that so read eloquent and commendatory notices of the work, (the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review,) but got no review." Do have it 'put through at once.'"

Now, may be some other brethren, who became now subscribers for the Quarterly at Conference, have not received it, and are getting "almost provoked" about it, and are blaming me for it. To all such I would say, keep cool, and do as I advertised you before Conference adjourned: Write on yourself to Richmond, Va., and it will be "put through at once," as I have received information from L. M. Leo that your names are there. Take due notice hereof, and govern yourself accordingly." J. A. CLEMENT.

Deaths.

DIED—In Santa Rosa county, Fa., December 23, 1854, Mrs. ELIZABETH MCMILLAN, wife of Hon. Neil McMillan, in the 58th year of her age. The deceased was born in Richmond county, N. C., on the 22d of February, 1797, of religious parents, Edward and Margaret Wilkinson. She united herself in early life with the Presbyterian Church, and lived a faithful member of that Church until emigrated with her husband in 1830 to Florida, where she died.

Her coming to Florida, her opportunities of hearing Presbyterian preaching were not favorable, and not feeling willing to live out of the pale of the Church of Christ, she united with the M. E. Church, and lived a useful member to the time of her death. Although her afflictions were great, she bore them with calm resignation, looking to Jesus as her support, and feeling that through his blood she could be saved. The Gospel ministers ever found a welcome in her house, and it was truly her greatest pleasure to entertain them.

While surrounded by her family and some other numerous friends to console her, the messenger of death came.

"Dearest mother, thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel,
But 'tis God that hath bereft us
He can all our sorrows heal.

Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life is fled,
Then in Heaven we hope to greet thee,
Where no parting tear is shed.

DUNCAN.

COTTON.—Though the receipts of this article continue to fall off from day to day, we are gratified to observe that the arrivals of boats Tuesday on the Ohio river and Upper Mississippi were sufficient to create a good state of activity and business on the levee. Seven steamboats from above Memphis arrived during the day; these, with the coast boats, caused the increase of receipts which has so long been expected. There came to hand yesterday of cotton, up to 6 o'clock P. M., by the Peter Tellon, 1309 bales; by the Oceana, 862 bales; by the T. P. Sellers, 876 bales; by the Carrier, from Memphis, 272 bales; by the Laurel Hill, from Island Sara, 74 bales; by the Capitol, from Island Sara, 81; by the Rapides, from Alexandria, 118 bales; by the Elephant, 12 bales—in all 3943 bales cotton. Sugar 463 hogsheads and 200 barrels. Of molasses 1251 barrels and one half barrels.

The Nassau Hall, at Princeton, N. J., was entirely destroyed by fire on the night of the 10th inst., together with the books, clothing, and furniture of the students. The gallery of pictures, however, a choice and valuable collection, was rescued. The loss is estimated at one thousand dollars, on which there is insurance of three thousand. Nassau Hall as called in honor of the House of Orange, formed the principal building of the College of New Jersey or Princeton College, founded in 1748, an institution that has maintained the highest rank among seats of learning, and between which and Yale and Harvard colleges there has existed a generous emulation that has never been popular with the South, and numbered among its graduates Thomas Jefferson, John C. Calhoun and a host of others who have shone conspicuously in the department of intellectual effort.

VIOLENT AND DESTRUCTIVE HURRICANE AT NASHVILLE.—On the night of the 12th inst., a tremendous hurricane occurred at Nashville, blowing down and uncovering houses and doing damage to property in various ways. The State Capitol, one of the finest buildings in the South, although was first struck by lightning and then unroofed by the wind, sustaining damage to the amount of $50,000. The First Presbyterian Church was also much injured. Across the river the gale was so violent, it is said that a buggy was blown three hundred yards.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—Report for the week ending Saturday evening:

ARTESIAN WELL.—Three hundred and thirty-four feet. Sand and shells, as usual. Operations retarded for a piece of iron broken off from the bottom of the pipe. Mr. Reed back, in good health.

OBITUARY.—The total interments in the city of New Orleans during the week ending Sunday morning were 174. This we believe is the smallest weekly mortality of the season.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Kern River Excitement, etc.

The steamship Prometheus, Capt. Henry Churchill, arrived from San Juan on Sunday morning with dates from San Francisco to the 6th inst., two days later than previously received. The Prometheus left New Orleans March 1st and arrived at San Juan on the 7th. Her passengers left with those of the Northern Light, from New York, early the next morning, for the Pacific. The Prometheus was delayed at San Juan until Sunday, 11th, awaiting the arrival of the Panamian steamship Isaac Sam, which had been detained two days in San Francisco, leaving that port on the 26th inst., instead of the 24th, her regular day. The Northern Light left San Juan for New York on the same day as the Prometheus, with two hundred passengers and $2,000,000 on board.

The U. S. steamship Fulton, Capt. Mitchell, arrived at San Juan on the 5th and left again for Kingston on the 6th. She is in search of the U. S. sloop-of-war Albany, which is now generally believed to have been swallowed up in the gale of September, and that no one of her noble crew remains to tell of her melancholy fate. We have nothing in saying that nowhere could be found a more neat and staunch ship, a more gentlemanly and accomplished set of officers, or a more hale and hearty crew. H. B. M. steamship Devastation arrived on the 5th; this with the Held Eastern States, were the only vessels in the harbor when the Prometheus left.

In the interior "the tables have turned" with the Pastuzo parties. Chiriqui's prospects are somewhat brighter than one month ago, when, it will be recollected, he was penned in within the city of Granada by the Revolutionists. Since then he has made successful sallies upon Chontales and driven him back, and to turn has become the scourge of the revolutionary party. And, I believe, the head of Lake is almost possession of all the Southern Departments of the State. Chamorro's health, though, is rapidly failing him, and on this and on foreign assistance only can Castillo's party build their hopes. Many skirmishes or battles are reported to have taken place among these troops. Their contests have been more sanguinary than usual. Their troops have been more than decimated since this fratricidal war commenced. Several Americans taken in arms in the Castillon party have had their throats cut. Everything is quiet at Greytown. The Isthmus is perfectly healthy. The facilities for crossing is now unsurpassed both for comfort and speed. The land transit can be easily made in one hour and a half, and the river is in the best navigable order. Annexed is a list of passengers:

Mr Preston, lady and child; T S Allen, Butler Ives, J A Razer, S G Perier, lady and four children; S Hughes, D A Booker, O G Ford, Alex Fleck, Wm Elder, F Ewing, Wm Gilbert, John S Prime, W S Smith, O P Hill, J S Barker, Ke Brickell, J S Cottrill, W A Erwin, Penegee, Mr Abrahams, W Hinches, W Swarbiger, Benj Closs, C Gilchrist, W J Kimber, Samuel Gain, Alex Burnett, A Mellorida, John Acy, Robt Finley, F B Shaner, J Nephtaligo, S S Myers, W Gaultney, S Tattnall, Jas Sharey, David Woods, Adams & Co's messenger, M N Anthony, S N Davidson, E Bacon, Mr Stephens, Wm Donahue, Geddy J N White, F Reathbuster, J Tr able, N C Johnson. Three Jills, and others in the steerage.

On the 16th the Senatorial Convention adjourned sine die, by a vote of 13 to 44. Those voting in the minority were principally the friends of Dr. Irwin and the majority comprised Whigs and various factions of the Democracy.

On the morning of the 18th, the St. Charles Hotel and Hillman's Hotel, in Unicity, were destroyed by fire. Loss about $50,000. In Nevada sixteen houses were burned on Nov. 16th; and in Stockton, twenty-five houses were destroyed by fire on the 21st.

The Anniversary of the Birthday of Washington was celebrated in San Francisco by a general turnout of the Fire Department, and by appropriate ceremonies in the Metropolitan Theater.

The Native Californians have held several meetings in San Francisco, for the purpose of taking steps to emigrate to Sonora.

The Alta California of the 26th has the following:

The great feature of the day since the sailing of the last steamer is the failure of the several banking houses, which the news by the arrival of Page, Bacon & Co. at St. Louis, has rendered inevitable. Since then the run commenced at once on Page Bacon & Co., which was kept up all the day, and over; commencing with a run from the bank. Other banking houses, and brokers apparently were having their run, during the day of the 22d, when there was no specie paid at the usual hour, and shortly after hundreds were sent off over town, announcing that they must suspend. From this time forth no specie was paid out during all that day. All their paper was redeemed at less than $1,000 each, and those desiring specie were obliged to call at the counter. Many persons who were refused specie on Monday, returned on Tuesday, when after a rough passage of three hours, were successful, with freight and passengers from New York and passengers from Havana.

Business to Havana is very dull. Militia are embodied in all parts of the city armed and equipped. As we left the wharves were filled with spectators to witness the departure of the United States and see it fired from in the usual manner.

Latest important news was the decision of the Military Tribunal in the case of Lino Cadalgo and Pinel, which was death for the three.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILROAD.—The Jackson (Miss.) Mercury, in an article on Mississippi railroad matters, says:

The New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern is seriously embarrassed for present means, and appeals earnestly to our people for aid. The grading of the first section will very soon be completed, and the iron on it can be obtained, twenty-five miles north of the city, in a few months. The section of road as Canton, and it is to be finished by the 1st of January next. The bridging is progressing rapidly, and the cars will be running over the road next month. We must insist on the importance of pushing the road to Jackson, Miss. Jackson, Miss., is the capital of the State, and the seat of the Supreme Court. Besides, Madison county is the richest county in the State. Hinds county is next in wealth. Both these counties are interested in the completion of the road to Jackson. Let the people of Madison, Hinds, Rankin, Simpson and all the counties interested in the completion of the road to Jackson, come forward promptly and liberally, and the road will be finished to Jackson in a few months. FROM KERN RIVER.—The news from Kern river is of an exciting character. The accounts from the newly discovered diggings represent the miners as doing remarkably well, some say averaging $10 to $20 per day. The steamer receiving last from Francisco for San Diego is the nearest point of disembarkation for the miners were crowded with passengers.

The Southern Californian, of the 24th, published at Los Angeles, says:

We are constantly receiving the most flattering accounts from the locality and of the importance and richness of the diggings of Kern and tributaries. The large number of people who have flocked to those mines have discovered themselves over this section of country, and are also spending the numerous gorges and ravines in the different ranges of mountains, developing every stop diggings that pay from ten to fifty cents a pan.

The richest localities found thus far, are built up in the mountain gulches, where the snow of present makes it very difficult to work. Parties have already located the most rich claims, and are awaiting the first thaw of warm weather to commence their operations.

Although we still speak of Kern River mines as owing to the yielding region, but comparatively few persons are now straggling up; the country south and east has been discovered to be far richer. We may safely say that there are thousands scattered over these hills, and the gold is found wherever they prospect and we have no doubt but that others will be opened in the mountains bordering our valley, vieing in richness with any in the State.

We have seen a letter from L. T. Hereford, Esq., to B. D. Wilson, dated at the mines the 12th inst., in which he says that the miners are flocking from two to twenty strong to join. Parties having claims up in the gulches are doing much better still.

Notwithstanding the immense number that have gone to the mines already for the great pleasure of the gold region that they immediately become lost in the mountains, and one would hardly be aware of its great numbers, were he not to pass over the road and witness the throng of pack animals and teams that are hourly flocking to the land of hope.

The same paper has the following:

We have seen a quantity of gold taken out of the hills in the vicinity of San Fernando by Mr Hunt; he took the dirt from a hill and a pail of water for the purpose of washing it.

Gold has been found out near the Mission of San Gabriel, from all parties are said to be working up in the canons, and are keeping their whereabouts a profound secret.

Mining operations are still going on up the San Gabriel river, and the parties at work are doing well.

NEW DISUNION SCHEME.—The correspondents of the New York Herald appear to be all alike in the matter of getting up long-bow stories. The latest thing of this sort is furnished by a correspondent at San Francisco, whom over the signature of "Patriot," writes as follows:

I hasten to lay before you, in advance of all published accounts which is now of exciting, under profound secrecy, nothing is generally supposed, I can assert it reliable and from official citizens. I have no hesitation to commend, but prior to the plan, as the case seem, revealed to me without any injunction of secrecy or restraint.

A new republic is to be formed consisting at first of ten States three to be completed by the present Indian of the State of California, three of Oregon, three of Utah and New Mexico. The great railroad is to be abandoned, and every obstacle thrown in the way of Pacific railroad, and the basement that need for stabling. It was afterwards regained by the American soldiery, and during the struggles a cannon ball from the American ranks passed through the walls and destroyed a very gratified King the spell, which adorned the chapel, but the frame, which was uninjured, was subsequently filled with a full length portrait of Washington, painted by the elder Peale. It is said that Washington, after the battle, made the Quakers a present of fifty guineas to repair the damage sustained by the fire of his troops, and this sum they expended in procuring his portrait, which, among other relics of the chapel, was saved.

LATER FROM CUBA.

The Mobile Register of Thursday last contains the following memoranda from the purser of the steamship United States, which was [illegible] at that city on the previous day from New York, via Havana:

Had a pleasant run of five days to Havana, where we found everything in a state of excitement, more particularly regarding the filibusters, from the reports that have been freely circulated against Lopez, charging her as a filibuster, and in fact, the Admiral ship of the expedition. The Government seemed anxiously awaiting our arrival, and immediately dispatched officers from the custom house to examine her in every part, and also kept her closely guarded by placing officers on board in different stations during our stay in port.

The captain at once proceeded to pay his respect to the Captain-General of Cuba, and after a conversation with him, assured him that she was everything but what they took her to be, and offered him the noble ship of war as a protection to the Queen of the Antilles, which proposal may be accepted on his return to Havana, that he'll our ex Daily Post, and Mr. Berg, the house keeper and agent of Mr. Wm. Chealy, left the new mail of Mr John Lown with great fodder, and other provisions has been destroyed. How many more, it is impossible to tell, as the fire completely encircles the village and was with great difficulty kept from destroying our little town.

P. S.—3 o'clock.—While I write, the fire is still raging, and threatens our village. Had only known but we may all be burnt out to-night, as the wind continues very high, and we are completely surrounded by fire.

All that was said beforehand concerning that Dr. Ed. Ray's house burnt and [illegible] about six miles from this place, together with all the houses and barns in his neighborhood, say six to ten miles around have been destroyed.

The Columbia (South Carolinian) of Monday, the 12th, has the following further particulars:

The wind on Friday was blowing from the southwest in perfect gale. Unfortunately the sparks were on fire in several localities and much destruction of property has taken place.

We regret to hear that Col. J. Chappell lost a negro woman who was battling with the fiery element she was burned accidently as to cause her death. We also learn that Mr Wright Dibley had a negro child burned. The destruction of property in that quarter was considerable.

From the Charlotte Railroad we learn that the fire has done some damage by burning the track, (stringers and cross-ties, engine wood and timber,) but the loss is not as great as was anticipated. All the trains got in on Saturday evening and through the exertions of the management of the road we hope that the regular schedule time on all the trains will recommence on the morning.

From the South Carolina railroad we hear that several car loads of cotton were destroyed, ten of them on the Hamburg branch; a part of the track on that road was also burned.

From all dispositions we hear of an extensive destruction in the way of houses and fences. We doubt if there section of the country has ever been visited by such destruction and conflagration. The forlorn appearance of the country must be a serious loss to the planters and farmers.

The Recorder of Chicago recently sentenced a man named Nelson Bigge to ten years imprisonment in the Penitentiary, for having about $30,000 of counterfeit money in his possession. His sentence includes ten days solitary confinement in each year.

The Mormons are about to place a steamboat upon the lake. The boat has already been built, and only waits the machinery which is [illegible] to put into operation.

An Artistical Dodge.

A young French artist, just arrived from Italy, related the other evening a curious circumstance which happened to him in Milan. He had been taking lessons in singing for a year, and was about to make his debut, when one morning, a Signor presented himself.

"Desirous to make his debut as a baryton?"

"Yes."

"Does Monsieur retain his French name?"

"No."

"Has Monsieur made choice of the appellation he will assume?"

"No."

"Then I have a little proposition to make to Monsieur." And, upon this, the visitor drew from his pocket several pieces of paper, each of which was labelled with a name. On one was seen Arnoldi; on another Raimondi, on a third Bramanti and on a fourth Alberti.

"Monsieur," said the stranger, "here are names which have a reputation in some degree established. They are all barytones; you will understand I have brought you no other. Arnoldi is well known for his fine voice and figure. Raimondi has much fire and a natural soul. Bramanti is an excellent actor, a handsome man, and vocalizes admirably, and Alberti is already celebrated; he was recalled four times at the last opera."

"Where was that?"

"No ones knows, or can know. Alberti, Bramanti, Raimondi and Arnoldi have never existed. They are myths. It is necessary to embody them. You can be either at your pleasure. I invented them three years since, and have familiarised the public with their names, by proclaiming their success in all sorts of well known operas, but concealing always by skillful circumlocutions the names of the cities which applauded them. I have three newspapers, in which I cultivate the reputations of a dozen tenors, barytones and primadonnas, whose names and rising celebrity the public are, therefore, acquainted with. As soon as a stranger arrives, and is about to enter upon his career, I present him the list of my men of straw. Your name is Durand, monsieur; instead of Italianizing it into Duranti, and spending three or four years in making it known to the public, take Alberti, for example; Alberti has never been heard by any one, yet he is very well known. Look at these journals, in which for three years I have written of him, and see what I have said of this excellent artist. Read!"

And the Signor displayed a hundred newspapers, in which were paragraphs chronicling the gradual progress and final glory of Alberti!

"In the last city in which he appeared, Alberti was loudly applauded in the Giuramento of Mercadante; he received serenade before his departure, and had many complimentary verses addressed to him. Alberti will suit the best of the four. There have been many inquiries about him from theatrical correspondents. It is time that I should spoil him, for he begins to trouble me. I shall sell him to you cheap, as otherwise I shall be obliged to kill him, and make his funeral oration. Allow me to announce in my theatrical department that the celebrated baryitone, Alberti, is without engagement, and proposals will pour in upon you."

The artist turned the speculator in names out of door, and threatened to give publicity to his conduct. He has done it. [Courrier des Etats-Unis.

OUTRAGEOUS ATTEMPT TO KIDNAP A FREE COLORED WOMAN.—No little excitement was created yesterday morning, at the City Hotel, by the attempt of a party of negroes to run off with a free colored woman, named Caroline Cooper, who was supposed to be a slave. It appears she came to the hotel the night previous, in company with a ——s Slaymaker, from Lancaster, in this State, where she had lived since she was a girl of eight years. A report circulating among the directors of the "Underground Railroad" at this place, that she was a slave, travelling in company with her mistress, a delegation of their agents was instructed to spirit her away. Yesterday morning about six o'clock, while she was at breakfast, a crowd of some half-dozen negroes, headed by a barber named L. Davis, rushed into the room, and, despite her repeated assertions that she was a free woman, seized and carried her off forcibly, using considerable violence in so doing. Mr Slaymaker, who was also at the table, interfered to prevent the abduction, but was held back and rather roughly handled. The woman screamed loudly, but disregarding her shrieks, the rascally mob forced her along Third street, to near Wood, where they secreted her in some place prepared previously for the purpose.

A short time after, one of the proprietors of the City Hotel went to Dr. M. R. Delany, a prominent colored citizen (who is a director or conductor on the U. G. R. R.) and by representing to him that the woman was actually free, and never had been a slave, succeeded, through his influence, in having her returned to the hotel, where she still remains, suffering severely from the injuries received in the brutal kidnapping. [Pittsburgh Post.

It would appear from the above that the negroes of Pittsburgh do pretty much as they please. Another account of the affair states that the authorities were first consulted, and advised the extraordinary course of negotiating with the abductors for the purpose of obtaining justice.

Mr. B. D. Ragsdale has found on the plantation of T. M. Boulware, in Chester District, a rock resembling a head-stone, and bearing the date of 1616, and as that was some time before this State and North Carolina were settled, I have concluded to let you know of the circumstances, and see, if in the nnmber of your readers, there is one who can account for it. That the figures were made at that date I have very little doubt, as there is something peculiar in their formation which is after the style of ancient dates. The first grant made to Carolina was in the reign of Charles the First, in 1630, to Sir Robert I. Heath, but it seems that he made no settlements, and afterward his patent was declared void. The next grant was to Edward, Earl of Clarendon, in the reign of Charles II, in 1663, which was some time after the date on the stone.

It may have been done by some of the Virginia settlers who were roaming through the country. Two years before the date on the stone, the Virginia colony was massacred by the Indians. And as the Indians collected from all parts of the country, it might be possible that some of the English made their escape in that direction, and put themselves under the protection of the Catawbas, they being rather friendly than otherwise to the whites; or it may be the grave of some Spaniards who had settled in Florida, as the Carolinas were considered at one time to be part of Virginia and Florida, and the Florida party was claimed by the Spaniards. It is also supposed that Carolina was the first settled place in America by the Europeans. It is thought to have been selected by the celebrated Caligni, as a place of refuge for the Calviuists, when they were persecuted in the reign of Charles the Ninth of France. [Chester Standard.

MOBILE ITEMS.—The Mobile Register of Friday last, has the following:

What, with fogs, low waters, and destruction of telegraph wires, our city has been of late threatened with isolation from the balance of the world. The New Orleans mail boats have been unable to get up to the city for the past two days, in time to connect with the Eastern mail boat, and the telegraph wires are only working as far North as Peach Tree, on the Alabama river, and South to Gainesville, in Mississippi.

We had a telegraphic dispatch yesterday from Lower Peach Tree, stating that the steamer Heroine, on her downward trip, burst her boilers the day before, near Bleckley's Landing. Three negroes were killed outright, and Mr. Roberts, the pilot, seriously injured. Several of the passengers are reported to be missing.

There had been heavy rains in the region of Demopolis, and also in the country back of the Cahawba, and the river was rising.

The Tribune of Saturday, has the following announcement:

Another Pilothouse Steamer Arrived.—The splendid fast running and well equipped steamship Tom Thumb, arrived here yesterday from Pensacola. Her destination is not known, but she is supposed to be engaged in the filibustering expedition against Cuba, which, if we take the statements of the Cuban officials, is now being organized in the United States. The Tom Thumb has double engines, is about eleven tons burthen, and is a perfect model of a steam vessel and is large enough to carry Cocoa nuts a fit if she should make her appearance off the Moro.

Col. Dell, one of the oldest and most influential citizens of East Florida, is dead. He was one of those who, during the last war, regulated a detachment of Bristol troops five times their number, who were opposing Gen. St. Mary's Rivers to burn some saw mills, and he also distinguished himself on several other occasions during the war. He had been, moreover, a frequent member of both the Territorial and State Legislatures of Florida.

Formal Invitations.

The too frequent habit of extending mere formal invitations is justly rebuked in the following story of Vivier, the artist, which we find amongst the Parisian gossip in the "Musical World:"

Vivier, the celebrated and witty artist, passed recently some time at Paris, on his return from a summer travels. He had hardly arrived when he was invited to dine with Mons. X——, the musical amateur and rich capitalist. After the repast, the master and mistress of the house said to their agreeable guest, "We hope that we shall have you often to dine with us; your place will always be ready."

"Always," said Vivier, "that is, in the fashionable sense of the word!"

"By no means. We are not persons of such hollow politeness. You know how much we love artists, and you in particular. Our home is yours. Come and dine with us whenever you please." We should be glad if it were every day."

"In earnest?"

"Certainly, we should be delighted."

"Ah, well! since you are so cordial, I promise you I will do my best to be agreeable."

"We shall depend upon seeing you."

The next day at six o'clock, Vivier presented himself.

"You see," said he, "that I have taken your invitation literally. I have come to dine."

"Ah! it is very kind of you!—it is very charming," said his hosts, to whom his arrival appeared very piquant and quite original.

The dinner was very gay, and the artist, on taking leave, received many compliments.

The next day, as they were about to sit down to the table Vivier again appeared.

"Here I am, exact, punctual and faithful to my promises."

"But it is so singular," he continued, fixing a penetrating and quizical look upon the faces of his hosts,—"it is singular!—you appear surprised!—did you not expect me?"

"Oh! certainly, you give us much pleasure," the Amphitryon and his wife replied with a forced smile.

"So much the better."

Vivier sat down, was in his happiest vein, played the agreeable to all the family, and seemed quite unconscious that he had all the burthen of the entertaining, and that except a few monosyllables, the conversation was reduced to a mere monologue.

On the fourth day, at 6 o'clock precisely, the obstinate guest once more presented himself. This time coldness and constraint were very perceptible, and Vivier spoke of it.

The mistress of the house replied stiffly, "It is only because we feared you would not fare well, we have so poor a dinner to-day."

"I thought you expected me, but is of no consequence. I am not difficult. I wish only the pleasure of your society."

He seated himself with perfect composure, ate heartily, then turning to Madame with a complimentary air, he said;

"What could you mean? This dinner is quite as good as the others. Excellent fare! upon my word. I should desire nothing better."

The next day—it was the fifth—Vivier arrived as usual. The porter met him at the door—"Monsieur X—— is not at home. He dines down town to-day."

"Ah! very well! But I forgot my great coat yesterday, I must ask the servant for it," and darting across the threshold and up the staircase, he knocked. The door was opened unsuspected apparition.

"Your porter is a simpleton," said Vivier gaily. "He pretended that you had gone out. I knew that he was mistaken. But what long faces! What a sombre and melancholy air! Has anything happened? Any accident, any misfortune? Tell me, that I may offer my sympathies."

All dinner-time, the witty artist continued and redoubled his entreaties that the supposed misfortune might be confided to him. He complained of their reserve, and indulged himself in all sorts of conjectures and questions.

"Have you lost money in speculations? missed an inheritence? heard bad music? received a visit from a troublesome bore? Have you been wounded in your affections? in your fortune? in your ambition?"

Then, at the desert, bursting into a fit of laughter:

"I know what is the matter, and what troubles you. It is your invitation, so cordially made, and so literally accepted. I thought that I would make the trial, suspecting that you would not endure me long. To-day, you shut the door against me, and to-morrow, if I should return, you would throw me out of the window. But you will not catch me here. I wish you good evening.

THE LION'S STRENGTH.—The strength of the lion is very great. We are informed by Dr. Sparrman, that "this animal was seen to take a heifer in his mouth, and though the legs of the latter dragged on the ground, yet seemed to carry her off with the same ease as a cat does a rat. It likewise leaped over a broad dike with her without the least difficulty. A buffalo perhaps would be too cumbersome for this beast of prey, notwithstanding his strength, to seize and carry off with him in this manner. Two yeomen, upon whose veracity I can place some confidence, gave me the following account. Being a hunting near Boshiesman river several Hottentots, they perceived a lion dragging a buffalo from the plain to a neighboring woody hill. They, however, soon forced it to quit its prey, in order to make a prize of it themselves, and found that this wild beast had had the sagacity to take out the buffalo's large nud unwieldly entrails, to be able the easier to make off with the fleshy and more eatable part of the carcase. The lion's strength, however, is said not to be sufficient alone to get the better of so large and strong an animal as the buffalo, but; to make it his prey, this fierce creature is obliged to have recourse both to agility and strategem; inasmuch that, stealing on the buffalo, it fastens with both its paws upon the nostrils and mouth of the beast, and keeps squeezing them close together, till at length the creature is strangled, wearied ont and dies. Buffaloes which had escaped from the clutches of lions, bore the marks of the claws of these animals about their mouth and noses. The lion itself, however, risks its life in such attempts, especially if any other buffalo were at hand to rescue that which was attacked. A traveler once had an opportunity of seeing a female buffalo with her calf, defended by a river at her back, keep for a long time at bey five lions, which had partly surrounded her, but did not dare to attack her. I have been informed, from good authority, that on a plain to the east of Kromme river, a lion had been gored and trampled to death by a herd of cattle, having, urged probably by hunger, ventured to attack them in broad daylight. This the reader will perhaps not so much wonder at, when he is informed, that in the day time, and upon an open plain, twelve or sixteen dogs will easily get the better of a large lion.

LUSUS NATURÆ.—On Sunday evening last a slave on the Duncan plantation, a few miles above this town, was delivered of a still-born female child, which is an object of great curiosity. It has two spines, two necks, two heads, three legs and three arms, yet but one body. The heads and necks are perfectly formed, and in the proper place and position, except that there are two of them; so are two of the legs and two of the arms, but the extra ones are malformations. The third arm projects from between the shoulder-blades, and is tolerably well-formed, even to the hand, the nails of which are longer and more clawish-looking than usual. The third leg is much more deformed than the urm, being only about one-half the regular length, and ending in a foot that looks more like a great toe, with an immense claw attached to it, than anything else we can think of. It also protrudes from the back, between the os sacrum and the os coccyx, but nearer to the former. The child is of the usual size and weight, having attained nature's appointed time, and was alive a short time previous to its still-birth. It is now in the possession of Drs. Lyman & Smith, who have it preserved in alcohol, and suspended in a large glass jar, in which position many have witnessed this wonderful freak of nature. [Franklin (La.) Banner.

A KNOTTY POINT SETTLED.—A cavalier in our vicinity the other day tried to put down his opponent with the question:

"If Noah did send out a dove that never returned, where did it go to?"

"Why, retorted his antagonist, I suppose somebody shot it."

A RIDDLER CASTIGATED.—Mr Darnes, a member of the Missouri Legislature, having left in his place the editor of the St. Louis Intelligencer was "not a responsible man," and that whenever called upon to "give satisfaction, it was his practice, to unmanly apologize by saying that he was a small man, and a family to support, etc. the latter comes out with an article two columns in length, accusing Darnes of murder, and scoring him most bitterly and severely. We copy the concluding portion:

Darnes dreads to look down the road that leads thither, and so he changes the subject. He wonders that somebody else has not more courage, and don't love to fight, and don't try to kill somebody. Misery loves company, and he thinks it would be pleasanter to have the company of other men with blood on their hands, and a hell of horror gnawing at their hearts. It would help to keep his courage up to have partners in guilt, and the prospect of partners in punishment. So, he encourages fighting and murder, and uses his own tongue to help the cause of ill-blood along. He abuses men that have never wronged him, but he takes care to inquire first whether they will fight. If they are "small men," have "families" that love them, and that are tied up in their hearts; or if it is understood that they will not shoot him like a dog for his slanders, then Darnes is brave; he rises up before Missourians and denounces the "small men," the men with "wives and children" to support, and makes a mock of their desire to live with and provide for these dear ones! Oh Darnes, what lofty courage is this! What chivalry, what ingenuousness, what true gentlemanly soul it does display!

Did the assembled legislators of Missouri rush forward and grasp your bloody hand after that affair, and did they say, "Noble Darnes, you alone here! you are a leader worthy of a Christian people!" Or, did they regard you as a cringing instigator of blood, who, with cowardly instinct, aimed his shafts where they would not be returned—at the "small men," and the men who had "children," and loved them better than they loved shedding your blood! Who preferred hailing the cry of sick and weeping babes to the startling of Hell's chambers, by sending thither your unshrived and shrieking ghost to its soul-account. Tell us, Darnes, how did the brave and the generally pure and right-thinking members of the Missouri Legislature like your late bold attack mainly attack on the editor of the Intelligencer.

We tell you, in conclusion, Darnes, we are not your enemy. We would not willingly harm you, for you have a load on you that is fast sinking you down—down. But yet we do not fear you. We are beyond the reach of your harm, in character and person. We trust that our words, however, though they hurtle like chain-shot in your very soul, and tear open the heart of grief that throbs there deep from the gaze of men, may do you good in reclaiming you from the sin of encouraging wrath, and in leading you to purge yourself from that blood that already clots your conscience, and seek safety and peace in the merits of the blood that "speaketh better things than that of Abel."

But, in order to do this decently, you should withdraw in shame from the place you now occupy. You are not fit to be in the Legislature. You have not the talent to justify it, and having taken a man's life, and thus trampled on the laws of the land, you are no proper example for the innocent youth of the land. Therefore, get out of sight quickly for your country's good. It is absolutely ridiculous to think of men-slayers becoming the law-makers of a civilized and Christian people."

A NOBLE DEED.—During the night of November 25th last, in a thick storm, wind blowing a heavy gale down the lake, the water chilled and, making ice fast, the Canadian schooner Conductor, Capt. Huckett, struck on the bar, outside of Long Point ait, on the island side, keel over and filled immediately, some distance from shore, the sea making it complete breach over her, driving the crew to the rigging for safety. In the morning at day light they were discovered clinging to the wreck by Mrs. Margaret Becker, a trapper's wife, the sole inhabitant on that end of the island, her husband being over on the main land. She immediately went down abreast of the vessel on the beach, and built a large fire of logs, made some hot tea, and prepared some food for them, in case they reached the shore, and to refresh and encourage their drooping spirits by showing them succor was at hand.

All that long day, with the tempest raving around her, did that heroic woman watch the poor, suffering seamen, clinging to the rigging of the wreck. Just at nightfall, the captain called to the mate, who was on the other side of the rigging, that they would all perish if they had to remain in the rigging another night, and that he was going to attempt to swim ashore; if he succeeded, the rest could follow him; if he drowned, they could cling on to the rigging and run the chances. He leaped overboard and struck out. As he reached the undertow and backwater, his strength failing, and chilled, benumbed with cold, he would certainly have been drowned, had not the woman gone to the rescue. She waded in through the surf up to the neck, grasping him and dragging him out safely. Then the balance of the crew followed him, one by one, with the same result—this noble woman brousting the sea and meeting and dragging out each one of them as they came ashore—being, in, the main, instrumental in saving the whole crew. Such noble conduct deserves more then a passing notice. [Buffalo Democrat.

THE OCEAN MAIL STEAMSHIP SERVICE.—Com. Vanderbilt publishes a letter indignantly denouncing an intimation of one of the New York papers that he had bribed the President to veto the Collins this bill. He also warmly defends the veto of the measure, and declares his belief that every disinterested man in the nation will yet honor the President for the stern and conscientious discharge of his oath of office on the occasion. He also says that the Collins line is doing a poor business, as it represents.

By the device, he says, of paying interest upon stock in lieu of dividends, and by the conversion of accumulated income into the capital, they have been able to represent to sympathizing and patriotic people that their business has been disastrous, and that they have received no dividends. Contracting in 1847 to build five steamships and to make twenty round voyages per annum, for which they were to receive $19,250 per voyage, they have succeeded in ratifying their contract by the construction of but two, and since 1852 have been receiving from the national treasury the sum of $33,000 per voyage, in lieu of the sum for which the service was originally contracted to be rendered, and this for twenty-six voyages, in lieu of twenty.

I stand ready, he adds, at any moment to contract with Government (and to give the requisite security for the performance of my contract) to transport the mails from New York to Liverpool twice a month for the term of five years, in ships of equal or superior description to those of the Collins line, and at an average time of no more than the average time in which the ships of that line have hitherto performed their voyages; and to render the service for the sum of $19,250 per round voyage. (The sum for which the Collins line originally contracted;) and in default of strict performance, I will render the service without compensation, and I will further stipulate not to ask or accept of a dime from the Government to aid in the construction of the steamers, and not to besiege Congress annually for an increased allowance. I should have made to this Postmaster General a proposition of the same kind as I was inclined to operate the Collins line, and for that cause alone I refrained from making it.

It is my strong impression that the Atlantic Mail service can be performed without further compensation than that derivable from the established rates of ocean postage, and did it not appear like assuming to be a private individual about to attempt to compete against a monopoly odious to the people, I would proceed to prove the public treasury. I would not be unwilling to undertake to render the service without compensation from the treasury—it a proper arrangement could be effected in respect to the postage receipts.

THE PATENT OFFICE.—The numerous class of inventors throughout the country will be gratified to learn that Congress has made provision for an increased force of examining clerks in the Patent Office, by which patent cases can be disposed of with reasonable dispatch. In the financial Appropriation bill is provided that there shall be in addition to the present force, four principal examiners and four assistant examiners and actuaries, and it is there should be a still further necessity, the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to employ two of the principal examiners and two assistants until the close of the next session of Congress.

FIRE NEAR BARNWELL, S. C.—The Barnwell Sentinel of Saturday says:

A fire broke out in the woods on the plantation of Mr. Samuel Mixon, on the Edisto river, about ten miles from this village, on Wednesday last, which, extending with rapidity in every direction, soon assumed the appearance of a conflagration. The alarm was given in time to save the dwelling house and other buildings on the plantation of Hon. J. Patrick, Jr., which were in close proximity to the burning woods, but the fire swept with resistless fury through the fields of corn and cotton, destroying the entire crop of the latter, and a large portion of the former, together with the fencing and outhouses. The loss is very heavy, as we have not yet heard of a single plantation that has escaped. The planters in the neighborhood have our sympathy in their misfortune.

PAINFUL APPREHENSION.—A Government Steamer Supposed to be Missing.—We learn from the Tampa Peninsular of the 13th inst., that the Government steamer Texas Ranger has been expected at that port for more than two weeks past, transporting provisions to Fort Myers, in Florida. Her non arrival has created much uneasiness and considerable apprehension that she has met with some accident somewhere between Tampa and New Orleans. The painful apprehension intrudes itself upon the mind that she may have struck on the coral reefs, which abound in the vicinity of the Florida Keys, and become a total wreck. Should this be the case, many lives must have been lost, as the Texas Ranger has a large number of passengers on board, and is also heavily freighted with provisions for the troops in Florida. Should she have struck on the reefs, and the passengers and crew have succeeded in reaching the shore in safety, they must be in a destitute condition, as the provisions have all been destroyed by the waves. We hope that the Texas Ranger has not met with any disaster, but that she has merely been detained by head winds, or some other cause, and will soon arrive at her destination.

Outrage at Whampoa.

The China Mail, January 14, contains the particulars of an outrage committed at Whampoa by the Imperialists. Their leaders had notified the Consular agents of the United States and England to have all vessels of their respective countries moved out of the way of the Imperial junks, which would be attacked in forty hours. In about one hour the attack began, and the war junks, sixty in number, upon honest traders and peaceful boat people. The armed boats of the bandits mounted to more than a hundred guns, all of them directed by foreigners, among whom was both a European and a Spanish seaman. During the fight many of the pirates were engaged in plundering the boats which sought protection in foreign vessels; others employed themselves in killing to the most cruel manner, the people floating in the water.

All this was done under the very noses of three or four British and American ships of war. Upwards of 150 Chinese were killed during the affair. It is said that during the ransomade, which was kept up night and half the following day for several hours, the U S frigate Macedonian was hit twice, the British ship of war Alligator once, which had shot took off the leg of a boy on board. The American ship Potomac received three or four shots, and the Bittel was riddled. The sloop of Mr Bucklein's shot which carried away a chair on which Mrs. Buckton was sitting.

Foreign Fleets at Canton and Whampoa.

A large fleet of American and British war vessels had assembled at the two places named in order to protect the foreign residents at those places. The men-of-war at Whampoa were the U S steam frigate Roanoke, frigate Macedonian, British war steamers Sybille, Barracouta, frigate Winchester Admiral Sterling's flag ship; sloop Cantun, the U. S. steamer Queen, and sloop-of-war John Adams, and British sloop-of-war Comus. Besides these, there was at Hong Kong, that might be available at a few hours notice, the British war steamer Barracouta, the sloop of war Sparta, the battery ship Hercules, and Spanish war steamer Isla de Cuba. The rest of the fleets were disposed as follows: At Shanghai, U S sloop-of-war Vandalia, schooner Fenimore Cooper, and steamer John Hancock; British war steamer Encounter, and sloop-of-war Hornet, and French steamer Colbert, and frigate La Jeanne d'Arc; at Corea, U S sloop of war Princeton, and brig Porpoise; at Amoy, British brig Rifleman, and in the river Min, the British sloop-of-war Sarcen.

Intervention of the Foreign Powers at Canton.

The overland China Mail, of December 19th, says:

There is now so large a naval force, British and American, near Canton, that the city is safe from attack on the river side, at any rate; but if nothing more is to be decided, it was not necessary to assemble so great a force, or for the British Plenipotentiary and Admiral to proceed to the spot. The foreign residents never felt themselves in imminent danger; but they are every day made to feel more and more that trade is at a stand, without a prospect of being resumed until its avenues are cleared of the banditti who infest them.

On Saturday forenoon, a conclave consisting of Sir John Bowring, the British Envoy; Sir James Stirling, the British Admiral; Capt Abbot, commanding the United States naval forces in China; Dr. Parker, the acting Minister of the United States in the absence of Mr. McLane, and Consul Robertson, was held in the Admiral's residence; hence it is known of the results of their deliberations is, that their faces looked longer, and the Admiral, with some others inspected Hog Lane bridge. It is thus inferred that as little as possible is to be done, and that on less ground where it is least wanted.

Meantime, fighting by the Triad bands against the Associated Villagers continues, and against the war junks on the river, which continues, to the utter destruction of commerce, which might be effectually arrested by the men-of-war and their boats clearing the river and its branches above as well as below Canton, of all unauthorized armed Chinese craft.

The Styx was aground in the river, but has managed to get off again.

Mr. Parkes is said, and is very likely that Sir John Bowring has told the diverse authorities—in reply to a proposal for a conference—that it must be held within the city. That Yeh will agree to this is doubtful, and if he do it will be under the impression that he is to receive foreign assistance which Sir John has it not in his power to afford—if the Admiral is not willing—and it is believed he is not.

Another report in which there is some truth, is that the Russian French friends having made a communication to Sir John Bowring, Mr Morrison, the Interpreter, has been charged with the delivery of a reply. What it contained is not known, but the policy of holding such communications is very questionable.

The China Mail is strenuously urging the foreign Ministers to undertake in the matter between the Taitals and the Chinese authorities at Canton; but it would seem the Ministers have as yet only concluded to keep the peace within a limited space of the river, to the extent of protecting the lives and property of foreigners, and the removal of obstructions in the fairway of the river between Canton and Whampoa. The Comus was already at the factories, but the object of her being there was not then apprehended by the Triads that some of the boats had required to go that length to collect the wages of the men, and a proposal to attack them immediately.

There are rumors, also, of a steamer plying between Hongkong, Macao and Canton, with an English on her way from New York, and other vessels to the number of which were sent out from England, are now being put up in Hong Kong. There is plenty of room for all of them, however, for every day seems to raise steam dues higher in the estimation of the natives, and a very short time will probably elapse before Chinese merchants become steamboat proprietors.

Defeat of the Imperialists in the Island of Formosa.

The Mail says: The rumors of some time ago have out at Amoy by the Imperialists having effected a lodgment in a fortified village or town in the Formosan, have latterly been adding piratical depredations in various other parts of the island. In the last attempt, however, they were encountered by the Mandarin forces, a great portion of them killed, and one hundred and seventy made prisoners and afterwards beheaded.

ALABAMA RIVER ITEMS.—The Mobile Advertiser of Sunday last has the following:

The steamer Madison, arrived yesterday from Demopolis reports a rise of six feet in the Bigbee, at that point and the water on the increase.

The Octavia, from Montgomery, reported a rise in the Alabama of one foot at Montgomery, and two and a half feet at Selma.

The Mailer arrived yesterday, bringing the passengers of the Hershia, which, as we have previously reported, burst her boilers near Beckley's landing, on the morning of The day last. The intelligence of the death of three negroes and the severe injury suffered by Mr. Roberts the pilot, is confirmed. Capt. Le Vergy was also scalded, but not seriously. The boat is not much shattered, and her hull is entirely uninjured. The cargo, the property of the captain, Paul Powers and J. M. Brandt.

KANSAS EMIGRANTS.—We saw at the wharf yesterday morning a number of families which came down on the mail boat and are bound for Kansas. We see from the Cincinnati Columbian that negotiations are now being made to procure a steamboat to convey a large number of emigrants to as high a point as can be reached on the Kansas river. The emigrants wish to start between the 15th and 20th of the present month. Among them will be one hundred emigrants from Darke and Preble counties Ohio, fifty from Bourbon county, Kentucky, fifty Germans from Hamilton county, Ohio, and a party from Dayton [Louisville Journal, 10th.

THE METHODIST DENOMINATION has long felt the need of a suitable Music Book, for Church, Conference, Social and Camp Meetings—one of suitable size, to be conveniently handled, and one which should comprise the best hymns, familiar to the denomination, set to appropriate music. We have the pleasure of announcing that such a book has been prepared, with much labor and care, by S. Dunbar, Esq., author of "Songs of Canaan," Musical Gem, Temperance Melodist, etc., etc.; assisted by Rev W. McDonald, of the Maine Conference, author of the Wesleyan Minstrel. The book bears the title of

THE WESLEYAN SACRED HARP.

The authors say in their preface: "Our object in compiling this book, is to supply a denominational want which has long been felt, and to furnish a book by our preachers and people that will be used by our Church as their own, and by our children, saying that all who sing from these pages on earth, may sing the new song in Heaven forever."

We are pleased to know that so far as it has been examined, the Harp meets the strong approbation of the denomination, and we trust that it will soon be in general use.

Zion's Herald, Boston, speaks thus of the work: "The book is, without doubt, one of the very best of its class. We like it because its pages are not disfigured by the light dogrel which sometimes finds its way into similar works. The hymns in this volume are mostly from our own hymn book. We cheerfully recommend it to all who feel the need of such a work."

The Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, Ohio:—"We commend the Wesleyan Harp most cordially to the singing members of the church, especially all such as believe in praising God."

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas and have the preference to all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has the only factory having gin gear and seed-cotton where the improvement can be made, which enables him to prove the merits of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty, and although he is ever striving to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith and to which such planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

We have used for one season Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and are well built. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability, in short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be. A. H. McLEAN, Rutherford county, Tenn.

The Soldier's Widow.

A late English journal says: "This beautiful and touching poem, which will now thrill many a heart, is by F. Willis?"

Wo! for my vine-clad home!
That it ever should be so dark to me,
With its bright threshold and its whispering tree!
That I should ever come,
Hearing the lonely echo of a tread,
Beneath the roof-tree of my glorious dead!

Lead on! my orphan boy!
Thy home is not so desolate to thee,
And the low shiver in the linden tree
May bring to thee a joy;
But, oh! how dark is the bright home before thee!
To her who with a joyous spirit bore thee!

Lead on! for thou art now
My sole remaining helper. God hath spoken,
And the strong heart I leaned upon is broken;
And I have seen his brow,
The forehead of my upright one, and just,
Trod by the hoof of battle to the dust!

He will not meet thee there
Who blessed thee at the eventide, my son!
And when the shadows of the night steal on,
He will not call to prayer;
The lips that recited, giving thee to God,
Are in the icy keeping of the sod!

Aye, my own boy! thy sire
Is with the sleepers of the valley cast,
And the proud glory of my life hath passed
With his high glance of fire.
Wo! that the linden and the vine should bloom,
And a just man be gathered to the tomb!

Why, bear them proudly, boy!
It is the sword he girded to his thigh;
It is the helm he wore in victory!
And shall we have no joy?
For thy green vales, O, switzerland he died!
I will forget my sorrow—in my pride!

Anecdote of Wordsworth.

The editor of the London Illustrated News has the following story about Wordsworth "from the lips of a true poet," whose name, however, he is not at liberty to mention:

In the summer of 1840, when on a visit to the Lake District, I called upon Mr. Wordsworth to convey a message from his daughter, then in London. He received me with a kindly shake of the hand. "I am told," said he, "that you write poetry; but I never read a line of your own compositions, and don't intend to." I suppose I must have looked surprised, for he added hastily: "I could find time to reply, 'You must not look to me for judgment in this, for I never read anybody's poetry but my own, and haven't done so for five and twenty years.'" Doubtless I smiled.

"You may think this is vanity, but it is not; I only read my own poetry to correct its faults, and make it as good as I can." I endeavored to change the subject by some general remarks on the beauty of the scenery, visible from his garden in which our interview had taken place. "What is the name of that mountain?" I inquired. "God bless me!" he said, "have you not read my poems? Why, that's Helvellyn! Helvellyn! Scar. There are frequent allusions to it in my writings. Don't you remember the lines?" and he repeated in a clear, distinct voice a well known passage from "The Excursion."

The name of Southey having been accidentally mentioned, I inquired, as a matter of literary curiosity, whether, as was commonly believed, his mind had impaired his health and his intellect by too much mental exertion, and thus brought on that temporary darkness of mind which clouded the last months of his life. "By no means," said Wordsworth; "Southey was a most methodical worker. He systematized his time. He was never confused or in a hurry, and got through a deal of labor with an amount of ease and composure which your hurry-scurry kind of people can neither accomplish nor understand. The truth is, at least I think so, that his mind was thrown off its balance by the death of his first wife, and never afterward recovered itself."

He reminded him at this point that the late Mr. Laman Blanchard, whose sad story was then fresh in the recollection of the public, had been reduced to a state of insanity by a similar bereavement. From that moment my name seemed to fade away from Mr. Wordsworth's recollection, and he always addressed me during the remainder of our interview as Mr. Laman Blanchard. His sister, Miss Wordsworth, was then seated in the garden-in a little garden-carriage or chair, impelled by Mr. Wordsworth. I wore on my head a Glengarry traveling cap, with a sprig of heather, and Miss Wordsworth no sooner caught sight of me than she exclaimed in a shrill voice: "Who's that man, brother?" "Oh! nobody, my dear," he replied. "It's only Mr. Laman Blanchard." I gently hinted at my right name. "It's all the same to her, poor thing!" he rejoined. He would possibly have said more, but the unfortunate lady interrupted him by commencing to sing the well-known song:

"A Highland lad my love was born,
The Lowland laws he held in scorn."

She sang one verse with much correctness, and then commenced singing another, when Mr. Wordsworth led me away, "This is a painful scene, Mr. Blanchard," he said; "let us into my room, and I will read you some more passages from my poems about Nah-Scar."

Mr. Wordsworth's impression of the primary cause of Mr Southey's insanity is now, we believe, admitted by all who knew him intimately.

EXTRAORDINARY OCCURRENCE.—Considerable excitement has been caused in the towns of Topsham, Lympstone, Exmouth, Teignmouth and Dawlish, in the south of Devon, in consequence of the discovery of a vast number of foot-tracks of almost strange and mysterious description, and superstitious go so far as to believe that they are the marks of Satan himself; and that great excitement has been produced among all classes may be judged of from the fact that the subject has been descanted on from the pulpit. It appears that, on Thursday night last, there was a very heavy fall of snow in the neighborhood of Exeter and the south of Devon. On the following morning the inhabitants of the above towns were surprised at discovering the footmarks of some strange and mysterious animal endowed with the powers of uhiquity, as the foot-prints were to be seen in all kinds of unaccountable places—on the tops of houses and high walls, in gardens and court-yards, inclosed by high walls and pallings, as well as open fields. There was hardly a garden in Lympstone where these foot-prints were not observable. The track appeared more like that of a biped than of a quadruped, and the steps were generally eight inches in advance of each other. The impression of the foot closely resembled that of a donkey's shoe, and measured from the inch and a-half to (in some instances) two and a-half inches across. Here and there it appeared as if cloven; but, in the generality of the steps, the shoe was continuous, and from the snow in the centre remaining entire, merely showing the outer crest of the foot, it must have been convex. The creature seems to have approached the doors of several houses, and then must have retreated, but no one has been able to discover the standing or resting point of this mysterious visitor. At present it remains a mystery, and many superstitious people in the above towns are actually afraid to go outside their doors at night. [English paper.

THE CALIFORNIA CONDOR.—The high mountains of California are frequented by a species of condor which, although somewhat inferior in size to the condor of the Andes, is probably the largest bird to be found within the confines of the United States. A full grown California condor measures upward of thirteen feet from tip to tip of its wings, and when in its favorite element, the air, is as graceful and majestic as any bird in the world. They make their homes upon the crest of lofty rocks, or in the old deserted nests of eagles and eagles, upon the upper branches of lofty trees. Their eggs are each about twelve ounces in weight, and are said to be excellent eating. The barrels of the wing-feathers of the condor are about four inches long and three-quarters of an inch in diameter, and are used by the inhabitants of Northern Mexico to keep off dust in CLASS MEETINGS.

NO. I.

From the same standpoints, Mr. Editor, at which I made some observations on another subject, I have been viewing another phase of Methodism, and its operations upon the great body that compose its membership in this part of our work, more especially those sections that come immediately within the range of my own observation.

The feature of our economy of which I wish to speak in these articles, is that of class meetings. I am aware that this subject has occupied the attention and called into service the pen of many of our ablest men. Our quarterlies, monthlies and weeklies, each in their turn, from time to time, have spoken upon the subject. The pulpit and the press, ministers and laymen, have all been heard, but with what success is hard to determine. I do not flatter myself that I shall be able to say anything more upon this subject than has been already said, and that, too, with much more ability. I wish, however, to bring the matter once more before the readers of the Advocate, and give them the result of a few observations, made from more than twenty years' acquaintance with the Methodist Church, and an intimate connection with the practical workings of the system.

From the most reliable data, comparing the number in church membership with the number that regularly attend class meetings, we may safely conclude that not more than one-third of the whole white membership are found to be in regular attendance on this means of grace! And why is this? Why, after a solemn and formal obligation on their part, made in the sight of God and in the presence of the assembled church, to conform to the rules and regulations of Methodism, do they thus wilfully neglect this duty, and thereby violate a solemn command made on their acceptation into full communion with the Church! A duty which is regarded as vital to the religious prosperity of the members, and essential to the existence of the compact between them. Is it because they have doubts of the Scriptural warrant for such an institution? This cannot be. Any mind, not warped by prejudice, or perverted by coldness and neglect, could never arrive at such a conclusion. For, although they may not see a formal recognition of the institution, as we have it among us, yet they cannot fail to see that the design and tendency of the institution is in harmony with the Gospel, and provided for under the regulation for communion of saints—that it serves to promote the personal piety of believers, and to bring them together in closer communion with each other and with God. Certainly they cannot fail to see that any plan of operation or church appliance that tends to this end is in unison with the Gospel, and must meet the approbation of our Heavenly Father.

Is it not obvious to every intelligent Christian that there are many usages vital to Christianity, that are not formally prescribed or the modus operandi defined in the Gospel? It is a well established fact that the New Testament is a revolution of sacred principles, with inspired precepts, inculcating purity of heart, and leading to happiness in this life and that which is to come. The Church, the sacraments, and certain ordinances have been instituted and provided for; but the programme or order of the service has been left to the Church to be arranged for, in view of the exigencies of the age and the variety of circumstances under which man may be situated in the present state of existence; so that any institution or usage that harmonizes with the Gospel, and has for its object the promotion of the great designs of Christianity as revealed in the Word of God, is both scriptural and evangelical. And when recognized and adopted by us, (which is done whenever we take upon ourselves the obligations of membership in that branch of the Church holding them,) are as binding upon us as any other law referring to the same end.

When we began this article, it did not enter into our plan to argue the point, or to attempt to prove what we thought every well informed Methodist was prepared to admit. But having gone thus far, we will add, before leaving this branch of the subject, that although we may not be able to produce a formal recognition of the institution from the Sacred Scriptures, yet we can produce testimony sufficient in favor of the spirit and design of it to support its claims and warrant its observance as scriptural in the highest sense of that term. How, then, can any one professing godliness and holding membership in the Methodist Church, in view of their solemn obligations and the gracious designs of this institution, make their attendance upon it a matter of so little concern, that in many instances months pass away and they see not the inside of a class-room? and in some cases, it makes no part of their religious devotions! Is not such a course of conduct a spot upon the Church, a libel upon their profession, and a stigma upon their name as Methodists?

It is mortifying to be compelled to make the admission we have made in this article, that not more than one-third of our members are regular attendants upon class meetings. It is even more mortifying to hear the pleas and the pitiful excuses that many make in the way of apologies for their neglect of this important means of grace. Yet we are compelled to listen to them, and sometimes admit them, when our private convictions are that much of what has been said in the way of apology would not stand the scrutiny of common candor, to say nothing of conscience and the light of the last great day, when the secrets of all hearts will be made known. But when we hear them assume the ground that there is no warrant for such an institution in the Word of God, we feel like asking them to read their Bibles more closely, with more prayer for the Spirit to enlighten them, or, if they will not consent to that, to leave the Church and join some other, whose institutions are more in keeping with the Holy Scriptures and the practice of primitive Christians.

There are, however, causes for this widespread delinquency apart from any defection towards the Church, which we will endeavor to point out in our next article. Meanwhile, we ask the candid among them to weigh well the claims of this institution, compare their obligations with their apologies, and they will be better prepared to do justice to the subject as we proceed, albeit it may be an unwelcome one to many of your readers.

Paul Rebuking Peter.

"I said unto Peter, before them all, If you, being a Jew, live after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?—Gal. 2:14. From Paul's expression, "before all," it is evident the rebuke of Peter took place on some public occasion.

The scene, though slightly mentioned, is one of the most remarkable in sacred history, and the mind naturally labors to picture to itself the appearance of the two men. It is, therefore, at least allowable to mention here that general notion of the forms and features of the two apostles which has been handed down in tradition, and was represented by the early artists. St. Paul is set before us as having the strongly marked and prominent features of a Jew, yet not without some of the finer lines indicative of Greek thought. His stature was diminutive, and his body was disfigured by some lameness or distortion, which may have provoked the contemptuous expressions of his enemies. His beard was long and thin. His head was bald. The characteristics of his face were, a transparent complexion, which visibly betrayed the quick changes of his feelings; a bright gray eye, under thickly overhanging united eyebrows; a cheerful and winning expression of countenance, which invited the approach and inspired the confidence of strangers. It would be natural to infer, from his continual journeyings and manual labor, that he was possessed of great strength of constitution. But men of delicate health have often gone through the greatest exertions; and his own words, on more than one occasion, showed that he suffered much from bodily infirmity.

St. Peter is represented to us as a man of larger and stronger form, as his character was harsher and more abrupt. The quick impulses of his soul revealed themselves in the flashes of a dark eye. The complexion of his face was full and sallow; and the short hair, which is described as entirely gray at the time of his death, curled black and thick round his temples and his chin when the two apostles stood together at Antioch, twenty years before their martyrdom. Believing, as we do, that these traditionary pictures have probably some foundation in truth, we gladly take them as helps to the imagination. And they certainly must assist us in realizing a remarkable scene, where Judaism and Christianity, in the persons of two apostles, are for a moment brought before us in strong antagonism.

[Life and Epistles of St. Paul.

A Thought for Backsliders.

That was a very solemn warning given in the parable of the Son of Man, wherein he likens the entrance of a moral agent upon religious life to a man returning to his house, finding it swept and garnished, and then taking in it to dwell a company of unclean spirits, more polluted than those which had been thrust out. The last state of that man was truly worse than the first. It is a fearful thing to trifle with Divine grace. Better never to employ it as a moral force, than to empiricise with it for a time, and then to abandon it for natural reliances. The man who struggles for a time with the corruptions of his nature, and then gives over his effort, falls back with an accelerated force into the sinks of vice and iniquity. It is in ethics as it is in physics, the father up an inclined plane you roll a weight, the greater the momentum with which it will descend. An individual, therefore, who commits himself to the great enterprise of moral culture, has no alternative between continued effort and a relapse to a deeper state of moral degradation than that from which he was at first rescued by Divine grace.

It is easy to account for this solemn fact. Before conversion, the natural man has a source of moral strength, although spurious, in a pride of character which restrains him from outbreaking wickedness. But the backslider from Divine grace, in turning traitor to his religion, loses even this poor stay of the natural man, and gives himself over in despair to the complete dominion of lust and passion. He becomes dead alike to worldly honor and religious faith, and lost to all that restrains man from moral pusillanimity.

Early Mississippi Methodists.

WILLIAM WINANS, D. D.

NO. II.

Mr. Winans closed his labors on the Vicennes Circuit October 23, 1810, and attended Conference at Shelbyville, Ky. He was assigned to Claiborne Circuit, in the (then) Mississippi Territory. He traveled on horseback through a country then comparatively a wilderness, a large portion of it being occupied by the Indians, and arrived at Fort Gibson December 5, 1810. How constantly he devoted himself to the great work may be seen, at a glance, from an enumeration of his fields of labor; Claiborne Circuit, Wilkinson, Natchez and Claiborne, two years; New Orleans, 1813-14; Natchez and Claiborne, Wilkinson; Local five years, on account of ill-health; Natchez Circuit, 1821; Mississippi District, four years; Washington Station; Washington District, three years; missionary agent three years; superannuated, 1833; New Orleans District; Wilkinson, supernumerary; Woodville station; agent for New Orleans Church, 1837; New Orleans District; Natchez, four years; New Orleans District, three years; agent for Centenary College, 1846; Natchez District, two years; Woodville Station; agent for Centenary College; superannuated four years; a delegate to General Conference nine times, and a delegate to the convention which organized the Methodist Episcopal Church, South—embracing a period of forty-five years. And during this long term he never sought inglorious ease; he never grew weary of well-doing; he never became selfish and worldly, and hungered after the flesh pots of Egypt. He had his share of trial and temptation, of discouragement and relief; but he had given himself to the work, nor sickness, nor sorrow, nor pestilence, nor the death of friends, nor the coldness that overspread the land, affected his constancy. With persevering and undaunted spirit he labored on. The generation that witnessed his coming, and most of his cotemporary colleagues, have gone down to the grave; and still his enthusiasm, and energy, and masculine intellect survive, and his spirit glows like some eternal flame upon the altar of a ruined temple—

"The mind's frail cabin, battered and decayed;
Lets in new light thro' chinks that time hath made."

Often have I seen him, on his tours of circuit duty, scarcely able to sit in the saddle; dragging himself into the pulpit, preach for two hours with surpassing power and unction, and then fall down, faint and exhausted, his handkerchief stained with blood, and, for days thereafter, motionless, hovering, as it were, between life and death. Thirty years ago, and at intervals since, he was thought to be in a rapid decline; he has been afflicted with hemorrhages, bronchitis, derangement of the vital organs and general debility, and physicians have prohibited the exertion of the pulpit. But he would preach, he felt called of God to preach; he acted in the spirit of Newton, who, when remonstrated with, at the age of eighty, on the impropriety of risking his health by preaching, answered, "I see in this world two heaps of human happiness and misery; now, if I can take the smallest bit from one heap and add to the other, I carry a point." And verily God has blessed the preaching of William Winans. There are thousands now in Heaven, who, doubtless, bless God that he sent that young man into the wilderness to teach them the way to Zion. There are thousands now living who bless the Christian courage, the zeal, the faith, the strong sense of obligation that lifted him up from his sick bed, and sustained him there, while he exposed the enormity of their sins, and taught them the necessity of repentance.

And what changes he has witnessed! In 1810 the work of the Mississippi preachers extended over what is now the territory of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama Conferences. There were but ten itinerants in this great field of labor, and the whole number of church members five hundred and nine. Now, in these Conference bounds there are more than three hundred itinerants, and between eighty and ninety thousand church members! The number of preachers has increased thirty-fold, the church members upwards of one hundred and sixty-fold! Nor is this all. The Mississippi Conference has contributed largely to the Memphis, Arkansas, Florida and the Texan Conferences, and somewhat to the California Conference. It has likewise sent forth missionaries to heathen lands; contributed nobly to the dissemination of the Scriptures. It has endowed schools and public journals, seminaries and colleges, and it is now exerting itself, with a generous philanthropy, in the true spirit of the Gospel, and with a wise and enlightened statesmanship to lift higher—the best friends of the whites—our poor blacks in the social scale; to teach them their Christian obligations, and make them "look through nature up to nature's God."

In this great work William Winans has been and is, under Providence, mainly instrumental. He is, as we have seen, a self-taught man, having in early life been compelled to reduce the study of divinity to the study of the Bible; and his foundation of faith is in the New Testament, and not in the decrees of councils and the opinions of men. Providence endowed him with one of those minds which sees an object exactly where it is, as it is—a rare endowment, for most men live in a strongly refracting medium, and never look at an object in a single straight line, or behold it otherwise than distorted; and taking the prismatic colors of an inflected vision for the tints of nature, are always the more convinced by the lengthened spectrum of the imagination, the more it differs from the object of which they conceive it to be the exact representation. Strong, vigorous common sense is his distinguishing attribute. It is the substratum of his intellectuality. His sermons are not more appeals to the natural principles of morality, to the eternal fitness of things, and to the various criterions of virtue suggested by natural science. He dwells rather upon the sanctions of the Gospel, and the authoritative obligation of revealed religion. The constitution of nature and the condition of man harmonize admirably, indeed, with the Word of God, and with the system of Christian redemption. But if that system be taken for granted, as it must be in a Christian community, the authority which it displays, and the morality which it enforces will receive no very important aid from our superficial views of nature or science. The mass of mankind require a principle of stronger obligation than any which mere natural science can furnish. The Gospel has supplied this principle. The sublimest truths and the profoundest mysteries of religion are as level to the capacities of the meanest as of the highest intellect. By neither are they to be fully fathomed; by both they may be easily believed on the simple testimony of divine revelation. The preacher who makes his sermons mere moral essays to the neglect of the peculiarities of the Gospel, neglects the most profound and the most copious—the most important and the most interesting—the most impressive part of his duty. One great feature of Dr. Winans' discourses is the distinction they uniformly make between the authoritative sanctions of the Gospel and the indefinite obligations of natural morality; and hence his power and influence. There is in them nothing lame or languid; no puny pedantry, no supercilious feebleness, no revolting asperity. His thoughts are like sparks from a working engine, not fireworks for mere display. His sermons are pervaded by a solemn, exalted, devotional spirit. The plan is usually comprehensive; every point is examined elaborately, and submitted, in all its bearings, to the understanding. He not only confutes error, but traces it to its origin, and exposes its secret operation on the mind. With remarkable precision of distinction and definition, great vigor and copiousness of language and illustration, he unites the warmth and energy, the singleness of purpose, the faith and fervor of an evangelist. He has never seemed to think that, to convince the intellect and extort the homage of the educated was the chief province of the preacher; but to awaken the conscience, to move the deadened hearts of the worldly, to appeal to the wicked, to comfort the afflicted and search into the hidden vices and sorrows of the soul.

Though self-taught, he has acquired much learning, but never obtrudes it uselessly upon his hearers. He never uses it to dazzle and astonish, knowing that, like gilded armor, it adds little to his strength.

His manner is plain and grave, earnest, solemn; his utterance slow, emphatic, distinct; attention is engaged by the importance of the matter, and the skill and simplicity with which it is communicated in strong, idiomatic Saxon English. He is not of that class of preachers who convert their thoughts into riddles, to exercise the ingenuity of the hearer, who is thus obliged to fight his way from one sentence to another, having for his sole reward the equivocal pleasure of penetrating mystery and conquering obscurity.

It will be inferred, of course, that I rank Dr. Winans, very high as a public speaker. I have seen wonderful effects produced by his arguments and his exhortations. I have seen the philosopher strong in his moral proprieties, the avowed sceptic, the pulled and sensual man of the world, as well as the pure and untainted, hang their heads with shame under his searching analysis, and terrible rebuke, and cry out for mercy and pardon. In recounting flagitious actions, he is not the man

"——— to mince the sin,
And mollify damnation with a phrase."

I have known him to single out individuals that visited the camp ground with determined feelings of hostility, and subdue them with the grasp and voice of a giant; and "many who came to scoff remained to pray." He has never shrank from duty to gain favor, or shun responsibility. It was the opinion of John Wesley that there could be no fitter subject for a Christian's prayers than that he might be delivered from what the world calls "prudence." With William Winans prudence is a virtue, not an infirmity. He has never concealed his opinion on religion, or on any matter of public concern. There are times when every man, whose opinions are worth the knowing, must embrace a party, or expect to lead the life of a flying fish, which, attached exclusively to neither element, the albatross pursues if it ventures into the air, and the dolphin devours when it falls into the sea. Dr. Winans seems in all things to have kept in view the advice of the prophet: "Stand upon the old ways, and see which is the right and good way, and walk therein"—which Lord Bacon thus renders: "Antiquity deserveth that reverence that men should make a stand thereupon, and discover what is the best way. But when the discovery is well taken then to take progression."

Aristotle in his estimate of the qualifications of the orator, classes as primary high personal character. By this test this eminent Methodist may be tried. His preaching and his life have been in beautiful harmony.

"A people," wrote the poet Cowper to Newton, "will love a minister, if a minister seems to love his people." No man, by this rule, can be more beloved. William Winans has lived, not for himself, but for others; not for this world's pomp, but for its sorrows; not for fame, not for the "deceitfulness of riches," but in his Master's service, and for suffering man.

"Blessings, O Father, shower!
Father of mercies, round his precious head,
On his lone walks, and on his thoughtful hour,
And the pure visions of his midnight bed.
Blessings be shed!

Let such a sense of Thee,
Thy watching presence, thy sustaining love,
His bosom guest, hallowably be,
So let him walk with Thee,
Made by thy spirit free.
And when thou call'st him from his mortal place,
To his last hour be still that sweetness given,
That joyful trust, and brightly let him part,
With lamp clear burning and unlingering heart,
Mature to meet in heaven
His Saviour's face!"

ANTIQUITIES.—We have now in our possession, for safe-keeping, and as a nucleus of a collection of curiosities, some very curious and singular articles made of copper. They were found near the west shore of the river, about a mile above the mouth, at a place where now is a brick-yard, and these were disinterred by those digging in search of good brick clay. After taking off from the surface of the ground about two feet of sand, the clay was exposed, and the stump of a tree was discovered. Digging still lower about six or eight inches into the clay and overturning the stump, these articles were brought to light.

First, a copper spear, about fourteen inches in length, and at its base a groove or dovetail is made in which to insert a wooden shaft or handle; two other spears, each about twelve inches in length, and similar to the first. Third, two pieces of copper, that had evidently been very nicely forged, but for what purposes they could never have been applied is by no means plain, and it is quite difficult to give in writing a clear description of them. As good an idea of their shape, however, can be got by supposing them to be the matrix in which was cast one of the spears. This is not, however, the purpose to which they were applied. It is far more likely they were used as cutting tools; but then there is no means apparent by which the implement can be held, no place to fasten it to a handle. These are about fourteen inches long and two inches wide; upon one end there is the appearance of an attempt to make a cutting edge. They weigh about three pounds each, and are specimens of good workmanship.

The question naturally arises, who made these things? Did the earliest French discoverers make them; or are they work of a race long ago extinct, the same who first opened these mines?

It seems to us—for we can only indulge in speculation on the subject—that these tools could not have been the work of the Europeans who came here; for they would not have made a tool like the last two, about the use of which we should be ignorant. They are made of copper, a material not nearly so good as iron or steel for cutting purposes, the manufacture of which they were familiar with, and would most likely bring with them.

Our Indians do not, nor have they the skill or implements to work so well any metal, and they all are ignorant of the use of such tools. They have among them traditions of the existence of a race of men to whom they ascribe all the skill necessary to accomplish these workings we find at the mines, and make the tools we now find.

That these tools are the work of those who lived here years ago seems the more likely from the place and position in which they were found, being in the strata of clay lying under the roots of a stump, and about forty feet above the present level of the river and lake. The tree had grown up since these articles had been put there, and the deposit of sand made above the clay to the depth of two feet. To do that the river and lake must have been forty feet higher than its present level. This, of course, was years ago, before the memory of the present races now inhabiting this country. Ascent of Mount Ometape.

In the island of Ometape, in Lake Nicaragua, there is a volcanic mountain rising to a great height, and forming a conspicuous landmark to the voyagers over the lake. The mountain has recently been ascended by three Americans, of whose adventures we have the following account:

On the morning of February 2nd, Capt. A. S. Gardiner, accompanied by Messrs. Brooks and McPherson, left the steamer "Virgin," at the Island of Ometape, with the object of ascending the mountain bearing the same name. The party were amply provided with arms, ammunition and blankets. They arrived at the foot of the mountain at 10 o'clock, and after procuring horses commenced the ascent. For at least a mile their way was easy and not at all toilsome, the road or savana being very straight and beautifully clothed with rich verdure. At 12 o'clock they were obliged to dispense with their animals and continue the ascent on foot.

The road now grew steeper at every step, and was Macadamized with lava. When nearly two-thirds of the way up, they found it extremely difficult to ascend on account of the intricacy of the shrubbery, which grew some five feet high on an average. In some places they were obliged to stop and cut it away, it was so impenetrable. Proceeding two hundred yards or more they found the shrubbery of a much larger growth, the trees being twenty feet high and about four inches in diameter at the base. Capt. Gardiner, on taking hold of any one of these trees to pull himself up, found they would not assist him in the least, but uprooted immediately.

At twenty minutes past 3 P. M., our party had finished the ascent, and had arrived at the top of the crater. They found its mouth to be three hundred feet in diameter, and on descending, they found it came to a point, the distance being one hundred feet. It bore no marks of a recent eruption, but on the contrary, its appearance was very inviting, it containing a miniature forest, each tree having dark green moss hanging down from its various branches, presenting a luxuriant appearance.

While searching for curiosities, Capt. Gardiner picked up two very singular ones. They were very antique in appearance, and we are led to believe that they were idols. On a microscopic examination we found them to be manufactured of a peculiar kind of clay, the nature of which, as well as the period of their use, being wholly unknown to the natives on this island.

Our party found the atmosphere very clear and cold. As they were unprovided with the necessary instruments, they could not make any meteorological observations.

The view of the surrounding country was delightful, they being enabled to see without the aid of the glass the Pacific ocean on the west, the Atlantic on the east, the mountains of Costa Rica on the south, and the gold mountains of Chanlitta on the north. They also saw with the naked eye the cities of Grenada, San Juan del Sur, and San Carlos, nestling, as it were, at the base of the mountain.

At ten minutes past 6 o'clock they commenced the descent, and at 8 o'clock they reached the spot where they had left their animals. They were much fatigued, but notwithstanding this, they proceeded on their way until they arrived at the settlement. Capt. Gardiner on his arrival, instituted his account of the ascent to one of the natives, who was 120 years of age, was informed that he was the first white man who had ever ascended the mountain. The natives generally evinced much astonishment at Capt. Gardiner's recital.

Ometape is 3,500 feet high. It is situated in Lake Nicaragua, 14 miles distant from Virgin Bay.

"Chucked Him Out."

Among the first class restaurants in Albany is the "Marble Pillar," located under the Museum, and kept by "Billy Winne," a gentleman whose good nature is only equaled by his tonnage. Among the visitors who entered the "Pillar" on Tuesday last, was a semi-clerical looking gentleman, who ordered up a trolled quail and a dozen fried oysters. While discussing these delicacies, he touched the bell, and requested the waiter to send the proprietor to him. The waiter complied, and in a few moments afterward the semi-clerical looking gentleman was in cosy colloquy with Mr. Winne about matters and things in general.

"By the way, W., what was the trouble with that young man I saw you in altercation with on Friday evening last?"

"He contracted a bill to the amount of eighteen shillings, and then refused to pay up."

"And what did you do with him?"

"Chucked him out of doors."

"Nothing else?"

"No; going to law don't pay. To have obtained eighteen shillings' worth of money by means of litigation, would have consumed ten dollars worth of time."

"Then, all you do is to chuck them out, as you say?"

"That's all."

"Well, that may be a wise plan, but I doubt it. By the way, what kind of wines have you got?"

"As good an article of Heidsick as you can find in this city. Will you have a bottle?"

"On one condition, and that is, that you will join me in its imbibition."

"With pleasure, sir."

The bell was again tinkled—a white jacket appeared in the doorway—the white jacket vanished. In a moment the white jacket reappeared, bringing a silver top on a juvenile pulvar. The wine was poured out, duly iced and dispersed off. In a few moments after this, Winne begged to be excused, and left his friend to finish up the quail. The friend did so, and then reappeared in the bar-room.

"Where can I find a little water to dip my fingers in?"

"In this wash-bowl by the looking glass."

The stranger crossed the room, took a wash, brushed up his whiskers, adjusted his white cravat, and once more sought the proprietor.

"Mr. Winne, I have really enjoyed myself. I can not recollect when I ever relished wine and quail with greater zest."

"Happy to hear you say so sir."

"As a memento of the little repast, I have one little favor to ask."

"What is it?"

"Chuck me out."

"What?"

"Chuck me out."

"You don't mean to say that you have been doing me?"

"I don't mean any thing else. I have not the first red cent; and if you want pay for these quail, you must go, as I said before, 'chuck me out!'"

Winne could hear no more. He made a rush to the kitchen to get the "cheese knife;" but he was absent, our semi-clerical friend was out of the side-door, and, when last seen, was rushing North at the rate of fourteen miles an hour. Should he stop this side of Canada, we shall issue an extra. [Dutchman.

INDIAN MUMMIES.—George C. Bates writes to the Detroit Advertiser that the great mystery among the savans of the world, to wit: by what process of art or skill in science the mummies found in the Pyramids of Egypt have been preserved, and which modern skill has exhausted all its resources in fruitless efforts to analyze—is known on the shores of the Pacific, among the wandering tribes of the Chinooks and the Flat-heads. These rude savages understand and practice this art with as much success as attended the efforts of the ancient Egyptians. Mr. Bates says:

ORIGIN OF THE KNOCKINGS.—The editors of the Buffalo Republic are full believers in spirit manifestations, and they publish the following explanation of the rapping origin as a sober verity. It is the most sensible and reasonable history of the rapping mystery out, and accounts for the giant strength it is claimed spirits sometimes exhibit in moving tables, lifting pianos, etc. King might be usefully employed as motive power—in driving Tiffany's spirit-revealed "Shingle Machine," for instance. Thus says the Republic:

A Presiding Spirit.—The spirit which presides at Coon's room, in Ohio, has given a practical history of himself to several of his visitors. He states that he is of a generation that lived 14,000 years ago, and that he belonged to a nation of people whose organization would in these days be called giants, and, in consequence of their superior physical endowment, they were called a nation of kings. Hence his cognomen is "King." He adds to this a further avowal; that a convention of spirits in the several spirit spheres, which represent various planets, was called together; the result of its deliberations was the proposition to communicate with the intelligent beings of this world by means of raps. This was adopted, and King, among other kindred spirits of superior endowments, was deputed to carry out the objects which are now so rapidly progressing in all parts of the country. We derive this item from a reliable source, and publish it as an evidence of the strange developments of the day.

MUNIFICENT.—We learn by the Salisbury (N. C.) Banner, of the 16th inst., that Mr. Maxwell Chambers, of that place, lately deceased, has willed to Davidson College the munificent sum of $300,000. Mr. C. has always been a warm friend of the above institution, and has heretofore done much for it, having endowed a professorship, to be designated by his name. He also left $30,000 to the Presbyterian Church at Salisbury.

A German colporteur has already been employed. An American one will be soon; and ... funds added to the field and the means increase.

The services Dr. H. is rendering the Church in this department are judicious and very valuable. We hope he may be able to pass the summer in the city.

Low Water Usage.

How the hard times reach even a newspaper office, through the sum involved individually in each subscription is small, may be seen from the following plain spoken note. It is an honest low water guage.

March 17, 1855.

It is his observation of emigrant life that the black man stands the climate better than a mulatto. Even the pure white endures better than the hybrid. The adjoining nations of heathen are being gradually worked into civilization and Christianity. London Evans, a real honest, humble, sensible and thorough African, called on many of our citizens the past week for aid to go. He is free, but not all his family, who are in Georgia. The press of Mobile, and Savannah, and Montgomery, commend this case of charity from their knowledge. Judge Rice, of Alabama, gives a plain and favorable testimonial. We have never seen a character or case of the kind better equipped for, and hope he may get the aid sought. He is a preacher, too. That is the land where he ought to go. Such colonists Liberia needs—Georgia does not.

Cheerful Views.—Try to take cheerful views of divine things. Dwell on your mercies. Look at the bright as well as the dark side. Do not cherish Gloomy thoughts. Melancholy is no friend to devotion. It greatly hinders the usefulness of many. It falls upon a contented life like a drop of ink on white paper, which is not the less a stain because it carries no meaning with it. Let your soul rove through the fields of Scripture as happy herds through the green pasture.

Methodist Press.

A misconstruction of the exhibit of the former Book Agent induced the Book Committee to make an exposition of the state of the publishing interests of the Church, which has called for a reply from Bishop Early, which we copy from the New Orleans Christian Advocate. We make no comment on this document, because there is really no disparity between the accounts of the respective parties, when properly explained, and it cause, if there were, it is not our province to attend to this business; besides, the former agent promises to give a public and full explanation, which we feel sure the Book Committee will be pleased to examine, and in the light of which they will be prepared to modify, if necessary, their published statements."

These remarks we clip from the Nashville Advocate, in its preface to an article which lately appeared in this paper. The note we published from the former Book Agent was not strictly a reply. It differs as much from it as a motion does from a notice of a motion. A reply would have been much more elaborate. It is due to the distinguished and venerable author to say, lest such a misapprehension should further prevail, that though his note bore no private or confidential mark on it, there was no request or even suggestion on his part, of its publication. His numerous and ardent friends in this section, to whom we gave the satisfaction of its perusal, thought its publication due to him as far as his clearness and accuracy as a business accountant might seem implicated in the expose. Some older brethren from an adjoining Conference, who happened to be in our office, concurred in the same view. Whether the former Agent considers it worth while, upon reflection, to enter into any further explanation or not, it is evident one could be made, and that there are two sides to the matter. We think, with others, it was nothing less than due him, on account of his former connection with the business and its position, that the expose should have been submitted to him before being published. Any subsequent modification of "published statements" would then have been unnecessary.

We rejoice with our confrere of the Memphis Advocate in his good financial prospects. The agents of that excellent paper are doing their duty. When Cobb goes by the board, there'll be lots of the best corn lost—corn worth $2 a bushel, even in hard times:

"West Tennessee can nurse "this child," and we can say to all that its financial constitution, thanks to West Tennessee nursing, is getting very sound. Meantime Arkansas, North and South, North Mississippi and Kentucky, are lending their aid to keep "the child" in such good humor, that the only fear is that it may grow so fast as to excite the envy of the neighbors. However, we can't suppose that we have any neighbors who will not rejoice with us in its prosperity."

A responsible correspondent puts this query to the editor of the Southern Christian Advocate:

"Is it right for Methodists and Methodist preachers to distribute the publications of the American Tract Society? Brother Pearce, our Bible Agent, employed a Methodist preacher to distribute the Holy Scriptures. At the same time he is employed to act as a colporteur for the above named society, and he sells those publications by hundreds, and, I think mostly to Methodists. Some of them tell me that they purchased them because he said they were good books, and they thought they were from our press, our publications. Is it right for Methodists to sell Calvinism to Methodists?"

In his reply, the editor holds a language that is reasonable, and is becoming popular with our people:

"This society disclaims all sectarian bias, and is, perhaps, as free of it as we could expect it to be. All doctrines offensive to Methodism cannot, of course, be excluded from their publications, for having no representation from our Church in the Publishing Committee, there is no one to decide that point. We do not believe, however, that it teaches Calvinism dogmatically, however much that belief may mould the religious ideas and permeate the entire style of its literature. We believe it never published a book or tract emanating from a Methodist. Consequently, Methodism, at least, is not taught by it, whatever else may be. If the books are good, and the people can get no other, let them have them. Whether a Methodist should engage in this work, now that we have a tract society of our own, is a question we cannot decide in any specific case. The general rule, however, is, we think, this—let Methodists circulate Methodist books!"

The following, from the editorial columns of the Advocate and Journal, will, we are sure, be read with great pleasure by every lover of Christ and his cause. In view of such instances of extraordinary benevolence, the Church may well "thank God and take courage." A better day is rapidly dawning. With increased and increasing wealth, Christians are manifesting an enlarged spirit of liberality. Who can doubt that this spirit is one of the precursors of the millenial period? But here is the extract:

"Our readers will remember that in the Advocate of February 15th we gave, in the tract department, a brief letter from Brother Jacoby, in which, in his characteristic way, he appealed to us for that aid he had reason to expect. He wanted $250 a quarter to sustain an excellent press in the tract department of the mission. Our Tract Society was not in funds, and the Secretary invited a special contribution for the first quarter. Of the result of that appeal, the statement below, furnished us by Dr. Peck, will inform the reader:

"Dr. Peck—I have just read Brother Jacoby's letter of January 12. Write him to draw on you for the four quarters of the present year, of $250 each. When his drafts are received send them to me, and I will pay them. Pray for ——."

It will be observed that $250 was all that the Secretary ventured to ask for; but the appeal is answered by the offer of $1000, the entire amount required to sustain the mission press in Germany a year. May this instance of liberality provoke many others to love good works.

Our California exchanges speak favorably of religious progress, and yet murders seem to abound. The San Francisco Chronicle says:

"Upon striking a balance on our homicide calendar for 1854, we come to the conclusion that one person of six hundred will be killed by his neighbor in 1855. In one-half the cases the weapons will be revolvers; in one-fourth, knives; and in the other fourth, guns or other weapons. The prospect is a comfortable one."

The Advocate gives some common sense advice away out there:

"Never build a house of worship upon a back street or upon the top of a hill. Let the most eligible sight always be selected, and you will be much more likely to have a good attendance at Church. Never build what is improperly called a 'union church;' they are often the cause of much unkind feeling among professing Christians. If each denomination cannot have a house of their own, the proper way to do is for some one of them to lead in the enterprise, with the definite understanding that the house is to be owned and conducted by them."

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

PEARCE'S SPRINGS, CLARK CO., MISS. March 14, 1855.

Mr. Editor—We have just closed one of the most interesting meetings I have ever witnessed. I have witnessed revivals that resulted in more conversions and accessions to the Church, yet, when we reflect that the season is uncommon for protracted meetings, especially in the country, and upon the low ebb at which religion was standing when we commenced, and then upon the general revival and building up of the Church, truly we can say the Lord has done great things for us. The meeting was commenced by our Presiding Elder, Brother Garrett, at his first quarterly meeting for the circuit held at this place, and continued by myself and the local brethren of the vicinity for twelve days. It has resulted in many conversions, and thirteen have been added to the Church, of whom several are young men of great promise who are being educated at this place.

A few remarks in reference to this place may not be unacceptable just here. Pearce's Springs, the name of the place, is a rural village, situated in the eastern part of Clark county, Miss., some twelve or fifteen miles from the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. From its beautiful picturesque scenery, its fine chalybeate waters, gushing up in abundance in the centre of the village, and its superior educational advantages, one is carried back in memory to the far-famed groves of Parnassus. It is like an oasis in the desert, affording to the weary traveler rest and refreshment. The schools of the place, consisting of the Pearce Female Seminary, numbering fifty odd young ladies, with as accomplished a faculty as any institution affords, and the male department, under the superintendence of Brother S. S. Mellen, a Christian gentleman, compare favorably with any in the land. Considering, too, the peculiar local advantages of the place, surrounded with a farming country, just coming into notice, convenient now to market, healthful locality, mineral water, good society, and an exclusion from any allurements to vice, ardent spirits being excluded by legislative enactment, we can but be impressed that it affords superior advantages both as a place of settlement and of schools.

In visiting the schools of the place, we were struck with the fresh and healthy looks of the young ladies and gentlemen, some of whom came here in bad health, looking, as we were informed, quite pale and sickly. This is the effect of the mineral water they use. Brethren and friends living in the East who contemplate going West, would do well to give this place a call. Unimproved land, and some of that of good quality, can be purchased from fifty cents to two dollars and a half per acre. Improved land, of course, is much higher. Good society and good schools are great desiderata in any country.

But I have already wearied your patience. So I will bring this sketch to a close.

Yours, W. C. TURNER.

CLINTON, LA., March 22, 1855.

The Lord is reviving his work in East Feliciana Colored Mission. Upwards of fifty have already joined on probation. Many others, I trust, are on the point of turning over to the Lord's side. I have seven different appointments; most of them are very well attended. I look for the melting influence of the Spirit of God at every meeting. It does my soul good to see sinners bowing around the altar of prayer, weeping on account of their sins and yielding to the overtures of mercy. This mission appears to be a very important one, where much good can be done. I have commenced the work of catechising, which will not only improve the children, but will benefit the adults. When I am better prepared, I will give you a more detailed account of this very interesting work.

Yours, W. S. TOWNSEND.

SHARON, Miss., March 15, 1855.

Dear Brother—As you would like to have some items from Mississippi, I drop you a few lines. Clinton Circuit is in the bounds of Hinds county, and a noble one it is. I have four regular appointments, and three others, one at a private house, on Wednesday nights, and two others on plantations, on Friday nights. I preach once a month at each appointment. Sunday, I preach at 11 to the whites, have a short intermission, and then preach to the blacks, except at Clinton. I am going from house to house, talking to and praying with the families. During the first three months I visited ninety-six families, made 141 visits, preached forty-one sermons.

Our first quarterly meeting came off the first Sabbath in March. It began on Friday night, and closed on Wednesday. Rev. B. M. Drake, my Presiding Elder, was with us all the time, and preached to the great satisfaction of the people and edification of the Church. All his leisure time he was visiting from house to house, praying with the families. The quarterly meeting was an interesting time. Five were added to the Church. I trust much good was effected, and I hope we shall have a prosperous year. The people are kind, and seem to have great respect for the Gospel. My daily prayer is, Lord, bless thy people and revive thy work.

Your brother in Christ,

DAVID M. WHEELER.

OUR ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Lord Palmerston.

Lord Palmerston's elevation to the position of Premier is another of those apparent freaks of circumstance, which not unfrequently reveal the impotence of mere political party, and the hollowness of mere party predictions. Lord Palmerston is understood to be Premier, not by Court choice, but by Court concession—that it was not until events seemed to leave no alternative that he was sent for by Her Majesty. We doubt not, however, that now his lordship is fairly inducted he will be sustained by the Sovereign on the one hand, as he will be by Senators on the other. He will at least have as fair an opportunity of "holding his own" as did the peer who preceded him—the poor who was driven from office by the press and the people, and who was lucky enough to make his parting bow adorned with "a blue ribbon."

We are not insensible to the inconvenience which Mr. Roebuck's motion, "if pressed," may occasion. It will be next to impossible to shelve that. Yet, if any man has the dexterity to extricate himself from awkward positions, we believe that man is Lord Palmerston. Inquiry in some other ferm may be guaranteed; some incapables may be sacrificed to the public indignation. Sebastopol may be taken. It is not impossible to appease the public—to divert attention to the pressing dangers of the immediate future, and the preparation which must be made to meet them.

Lord Palmerston has long possessed very great power. This has not arisen from being an acknowledged leader of a party. He has had no party. Properly speaking, he belongs to no party. Notwithstanding that Lord Derby sought his aid recently, that proposal partook more of the nature of a political necessity than a party preference. He has been confederated with both Tories and Whigs, being a sort of, indispensable, yet never giving the idea that he really belongs to either. Nobody thinks of Palmerston as being a minister of the people or for the people. He has occasionally uttered sentiments so little akin to those of the advanced people's party, and uttered those sentiments in a spirit so alien to the idea of popular conciliation, that it were not an unnatural inference that he wished rather to check than encourage popular confidence.

We have already referred to Court antipathies to his lordship. It is asserted that personal dislikes mingle with political considerations in these distrusts. Palmerston's protocols have blistered not a few of the living statesmen of Europe. Dead sovereigns have transmitted their fears, doubts and hatred of Palmerston to their posterity. If Poland and Hungary have hitherto not had much apparent reason to bless him, it is quite as evident that he has enshrined the known esteem of scarcely two reigning despots in the world.

Apprehension has been the prevailing feeling with which he has been looked at. The timid and suspicious do all in their power to keep as far away as possible from a person feared and suspected. It is understood that many a hint and plain statement have been made to royal ears that crowned heads elsewhere did not wish to have much, or indeed anything to do with Palmerston.

He who can receive as gospel all that is in the newspapers, must have a wonderful faculty of believing. But, putting aside four-fifths of the gossip circulated and believed on this special subject, admitting that rival statesmen—Malmesbury, Lord John Russell and Clarendon—were justly ambitious of, and were justly appointed to fill the office of Foreign Secretary, when it was well known that no man had such competent powers for the post as Palmerston, it really looks as if some truth were in the statements. He relinquished the Foreign Office, and turned to treating on Thames mud, and meeting all sorts of odd deputations with as much ease, gusto and success as he had protocolled congresses of crowned heads, as he had communed with monarchs, and received ambassadors bedizened with the emblems of the highest orders which kings could confer or ambassadors could wear.

It would be utter folly to attribute Lord Palmerston's elevation to the Premiership solely or chiefly to what is adventitious. It is not an unknown thing to have a "dummy" in a very high station. Arms have been sheathed or grounded ere now whilst the mighty have done homage to some official who has served as a symbol rather than the vital incarnation of a principle. It is not so here. Lord Palmerston has worked and waited. He has not allowed royal indisposition or partizan slights to soar his temper or stultify his strength. He has no idea of practicing, any more than of respecting in others, whine and drivel. A wretched theologian, he is a profoundly clever worldly politician. He has worked and waited, we say, and at seventy-two, spite of all obstacles and rivalries, he is Premier. The nation called for him, and the Queen sent for him. Necessity and the Houses of Parliament concur with both.

Lord Palmerston's isolation, to use a solecism, still remains. Surrounded, he can scarcely be hampered, by confederates. He is Premier in an exigency, for an exigency. For a time, by the common consent of active and patriotic minds, and by the lazy, responsive grunts of the apathetic, purposed, pitched political party battles are to be avoided, if possible.

That Lord Palmerston has selected Lord Panmure for the difficult post of Secretary of War, is a high compliment to that nobleman. That Lord Panmure has accepted it frankly is an evidence at least of his courage and good intentions. The nation gladly accepts the fact, and hopefully awaits the result. We shall say nothing here of other offices and departments, save that, with Lord John Russel at Vienna, on a mission which no man is better able to perform, Lord Palmerston's way is tolerably clear. The House and the people would resent any petty party conspiracy either needlessly to annoy or weaken the new administration.

If spared, Lord Palmerston's "last days" may be the most beneficial and beneficent days of his career. He has at his command resources, and connected with their use are responsibilities and issues, which might make an angel tremble. One false step might prove fatal to the liberties of the world. They are jeopardized now. His position places even the throne in shadow. To him the suffering hosts of the Crimea look; to him the "voices of the dead" of Alma, Balaklava, Inkermann and Scutari cry; on him the eyes of Britain, Europe and the world rest. May he be equal to the crisis. He may not dissipate every mist which served to dim the brilliancy of his name; he may not save Mahometan Turkey, but he may save geographical Turkey from the talons of the bear. He may bid Poland more than hope. Can he help Hungary? A host of conjectures pass across or occupy the mental discernment this crisis, in connection with his name, which time only can solve. He has dared much. He has endured much. As if to rest his fame and claims as little as possible on any kind of alliances, he has stuck to Tiverton. Little Tiverton re-elected him on Monday, the 12th; its M. P. holds in his hands the balances of empires, and, humanly speaking, the destinies of the world.

Let him trust the people; let him keep them well read in all the principles, facts and objects of the war, up to the nearest point which is compatible with official confidence and public safety, and an intelligent and confiding people will stand by the new Prime Minister. Such a course will crown the close of his career with honor; an opposite one might load his last hours and his memory with infamy.

Leek, Eng., February 20, 1855.

Thos. Paine, the Theologian.

The able articles of Dr. Summers, now appearing in the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review, on the theological works of Thomas Paine, will give some interest to this sketch of him, by Grant Thorburn, in the New York Observer.

WINSTEAD, Ct., Feb. 18, 1855.

Mr. Printer—This day I enter on my eighty-third year. Except that my hearing and seeing are not so acute, I am not sensible of any material decay for the last fifty years. During that period I have been only one day confined to the house by sickness. Goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life; I owe the Giver of all good a large debt of gratitude.

And as there is but a step between me and death, I owe it to generations yet to come to tell what I saw and heard of Thomas Paine. Perhaps not a man lives on earth who trained him from his cradle to his grave, except myself. Carver and I were fellow-laborers in the same shop. Paine and Carver were born in the same town in England. Paine and I boarded with Carver. I often heard Carver, his wife and Paine, as we four sat by the fire on a winter night, rehearse the items of his life. I think he was the worst member of the body politic I ever met in all my journey through life. He married a respectable lady, who died in eleven months thereafter, in consequence of brutal treatment. He then married a daughter of the Collector of the port of Lewis; after three years she obtained a divorce for like treatment.

In 1773, while he held an office in the Custom-House, given him by his father-in-law, he was detected in taking bribes from the smugglers, and fled to America. He was made secretary to the private committee of Congress, and took an oath of office to keep their secrets. He broke this oath by divulging the project of a secret mission to the Court of France by Silas Dean. He was dismissed with disgrace. (See the Journal of Congress in 1774 or 1775.) This treachery was the cause of much trouble in Congress and in the Court of Louis XVI.

We next find him in Paris, helping Robespierre in his labors of love to establish the freedom of the press and the right of speech, by means of the guillotine. He quarrelled with Robbie, and was chalked for the guillotine. God, willing to make the wrath of Paine to praise Him, sent an angel who delivered him out of prison. (For particulars of this miracle, see the life of Thorburn, p. 101.)

In 1801, when King Thomas the First ascended the throne of his kingdom, he instantly dispatched a national frigate to convey to our shores the venerated Thomas Paine. He arrived early in the year 1802. I spoke with him at the City Hotel, Bowery, a few hours after his arrival. He found letters urging him on to Washington, (then four days journey.) He started next morning. At Georgetown a messenger was sent forward to announce his approach; a feast was got ready, and all those of like thinking were invited. Paine entered late, his shirt unwashed; his beard unshorn, and reeling like a drunken man. A look of consternation shone forth from every face; mirth ceased; one by one they went out, leaving Paine alone on his chair fast asleep. Next day he received letters and instructions to return to New York.

When Aaron Burr returned from Europe, whither he had fled after his duel with Hamilton, he kept his office in Nassau street, near my seed store. From him I received the account as above stated.

Paine, on his return, was unable to find lodgings. Carver took him in for old acquaintance sake. He died at Greenwich, of delirium tremens, in 1809.

Secular Preaching.

There are many who are great sticklers for doctrinal instruction, but it must keep a great way off from the Lord's teaching relative to their particular conduct; and they will admit of a great deal of practical preaching, also, but it must not at all investigate their daily transactions. When it touches their business morality, they call it "secular" preaching. Such seem to forget that God's doctrines (teachings) prescribe and fix what is right in human conduct, and that for every deed of man he is to render an account; and that hence there is an aspect in the which the whole of man's activities come duly under the instruction of the pulpit, and within the legitimate supervision of Christ's ministers.

A New York preacher, who sometimes says things in a very strong way, thus reproves men of this class:

"We have no doubt that a rigorous landlord, having sharked it all the week, screwing and griping among his tenants, would be better pleased on Sabbath to dose through an able Gospel sermon on Divine mysteries than he kept awake by a practical sermon that, amongst other things, set forth the duties of a Christian landlord. A broker, who has gambled on a magnificent scale all the week, does not go to church to have his practical swindling analyzed and measured by the New Testament's spirit. A merchant, whose last bale of smuggled goods was safely stored on Saturday night, and his brother merchant, who on the same day swore a false invoice through the custom-house, go to church to hear a sermon on faith, on angels, on the resurrection. They have nothing invested on these subjects, and they expect the minister to be bold and orthodox. But if he wants respectable merchants to pay ample pew rents, let him not vulgarize the pulpit by introducing commercial matters. A rich Christian brother owns largely in a distillery, and is clamorous against letting down the pulpit to the vulgarity of temperance sermons. Another man buys tax titles, and noses about all the week to see who can be slipped out of a neglected lot. A mechanic, that plies his craft with the unscrupulous appliance of every means that will win, he, too, wants "doctrine" on the Sabbath, not these secular questions. Men wish two departments in life, the secular and the religious. Between them a high and opaque wall is to be built. They wish just to do as they please for six long days; then, stepping to the other side of the wall, they wish the minister to assuage their fears, to comfort their consciences, and to furnish them a clear ticket and insurance for heaven. By such shrewd management our modern financiers are determined to show that Christians can serve two masters, both God and Mammon, at the same time."

Churches in California.

A correspondent of the Presbyterian writes from San Francisco:

"I am amazed and mortified that, as a denomination that claims to be the banner bearing branch of the Church in the cause of education, we should have so long and so signally neglected this vast country. The New School and Congregationalists have a college in operation, well located, fine grounds and a spacious edifice. They also have a newspaper, the "Pacific." The Baptists have a college, a paper, and several schools, both male and female. The Methodists have a paper, a college, and numerous schools. Their college is a large building. The Episcopalians are building a college, and have several good female schools. Now it is painful to be compelled to say that we have not a single school, male or female, that I know of, of any consequence, in the State. * * * The American Home Missionary Society have sent several men recently, and four more are on their way. This society, I am told, has spent about $1,000 per month for the State since its reception into the Union. Their operations are on this wise: They send out the men to their committee. In a few months, sometimes in a few days, the Board is relieved altogether from their support. It is at once assumed by the people where they labor."

DEATHBED SCENE.

The Death of the Impenitent.

The rich Cardinal Beaufort said: "I must I die! Will not all my riches save me? I could purchase the kingdom, if that could prolong my life. Alas! there is no hope—death."

An English nobleman said: "I have a splendid passage to the grave. I die in state and languish under a gilded canopy; I am expiring on soft and downy pillows, and am respectably attended by my servants and physicians; my dependants sigh; my sister weep; my father bends beneath a load of grief and years; my lovely wife, pale and silent, conceals her inmost anguish; my friend, who was as my own soul, suppresses his sighs and leaves me, to hide his inward grief. But, oh! which of them will bail me from the arrest of death? Who can descend into the dark prison of the grave with me? Here they all leave me, after having paid a few idle ceremonies to the breathless clay which may be reposed in state, while my soul, my only conscious part, may also be trembling before my Judge."

The celebrated Talleyrand, on his death bed, was visited by Louis Philippe, King of the French. "How do you feel?" said the king. The answer was: "Sire, I am suffering the pangs of the damned."

Sir Thomas Scott said: "Until this moment, I believed there was neither a God nor a hell. Now I know and feel that there is both, and I am doomed to perdition by the just judgment of the Almighty."

A rich man, when dying, was informed by his physician that he should prepare for the worst. "Cannot I live for a week?" said the doctor, "you will probably continue but a little while." "Say not so," said the dying man, "I will give you a hundred thousand dollars if you will prolong my life three days;" but in less than hour he was dead.—Lutheran Observer.

Church, the Same.

Not to encourage supineness or bring backsliding by foretelling and then waiting for it, but to meet another end, we write. The Church, at best, is made up of reformed sinners. We often speak of the days of Wesley and Whitefield. Yet, in the palmy times Lady Huntington writes to Eldridge complaining of coldness and delinquency. His answer is excellent. What we want is not severe tests and unscriptural delays, and inquisitorial expedients to keep people from joining our churches. It is more love, and vigilance, and attention, extended to our young converts by the members. Let them be brought into the Sunday school and classes. Let the members visit and watch over them. This is the great defect:

"You complain that every new work, after a season, becomes a lifeless work. And why is it not in the beginning as it is now? In their infancy we find them of one heart and soul, having all things common; but presently read of partial distribution in the church stock, then of eager and lasting contentions about circumcision, coupling Moses with Jesus, and setting a servant on a level with his master. And Gentile churches as much on a level with the Jewish. The Corinthians soon fell into parties about their leaders, into errors about the resurrection, and into many gross immoralities. The Galatians seemed at first ready to present Paul with their own eyes, but grew desirous, at last, of plucking out his. The Ephesians had been much tossed by winds of doctrine. The Colossians had fallen into will worship, and the Thessalonians had some of our gossips among them who would not work, but sauntered about picking up news and telling tales. St. Paul's labors were much employed in Asia, and many churches were gathered there; yet I hear him complainining in a certain place, that 'all they in Asia were turned aside from him.'"

Losing the Reproach.

Happy are we to read, in the Southern Episcopalian, the remarks on the Sixty-... Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, lately held in Charleston, S. C.:

"It is particularly cheering to mark the progress that our Church is making in preaching to the slave population of our State. The greater number of confirmations, it will be noticed, are among this class. Our Zion is no longer be sneered at as the church of the rich; she is gathering in largely of the poor of Christ's flock, and our noble scriptural liturgy is proving itself as well adapted to the chapel of the plantation and the hut of the negro, as it is to the stately church and the venerable cathedral."

A HINT TO THE MARRIED.—"I have heard," says Matt. Henry, "of a married couple who, though they were both of hasty temper, yet lived comfortably together by simply observing a rule on which they had mutually agreed, never to be both angry with each other." And he adds that an ingenuous and pious father was in the habit of giving this advice to his children when they married—

"Both one speak fire, t'other with water come,
Is one provoked, be t'other soft and dumb."

NAMES OF CHRISTIANS.—The Scripture gives four names to Christians, taken from the cardinal graces so essential to man's salvation: Saints, for their holiness; Believers, for their faith; Brethren, for their love; Disciples, for their knowledge.

WHAT WE WANT.—The following were found at the bottom of a vote for ... men at a late election in Boston:

Experience, that's stood the test;
Conscience, to say what's right;
Intelligence, to know what's best;
Backbone, to stand the fight.

Female Education.

LIKE MOTHER, LIKE CHILDREN.

The Rev. S. Dyer says:—"When residing among the Choctaw Indians, I held a conversation with one of their principal chiefs respecting the successive stages of their progress in the arts and virtues of civilized life, and, among other things, he informed me that at first they fell into a great mistake, they sent only their boys to school. They became intelligent men, but they married uneducated and uncivilized wives; and no uniform result was, that the children were all like the mother; and soon the father lost his interest in bath wife and children. And now,' said he, 'if we could educate only one class of our children, we would choose the girls, for whon they become mothers they would educate their sons.' This is to the point, and it is true. No nation can become fully and permanently civilized and enlightened where the mothers are not, in a good degree, qualified to discharge the duties of the home work of education."

"I Have Not Got the Money."

"This is the repulse I moot with often," says an agent of the Banner of Peace, "when I ask a man to subscribe for a paper." "How much does it comc at?" "Two dollars in advance." Then ask them, "Do you use tobacco?" "Certainly." "How much does that come to a year?" "Five dollars only, sir, and I pay my own money, at that." "That is but a trifle," says another, "I use twenty-five dollars worth; but these hands earn every cent of the money." "Do you take any papsr?" "No. I took one once, but the subscription price was two dollars cash up, and then I had to pay the postage." "Have you any children?" "Yes, half-a-dozen."

He eats, spits and burns the tobacco all to himself. The children could read the religious paper. This looks like solfishness.

Later from Mexico.

The steamship Orizaba, Forbes, commanding, arrived in this city Monday afternoon, bringing dates from Vera Cruz to the 23d inst., and $1,800 in specie. Her news from the city of Mexico is to the 17th, and from Vera Cruz to the 22d. It is exceedingly unimportant, however.

During the latter part of February numerous earthquakes were felt in Mexico, Puebla, Jalisco and Vera Cruz.

Gen. Woll, the friend of Santa Anna, had returned from his excursion to the South, having effected nothing.

Gen. Ampudia is said to have been completely successful in his attack on the Indians in Yucatan, and to have weakened them so far that they will be unable to make any further head against the Government forces.

In Jalisco, Degollado, who occupied several important offices in the times of the Federation, has put himself at the head of a party of revolutionists and issued a pronunciamento.

The officinl orgaus lament that the revolutionists cannot be kept down, and very touchingly deplore the existing troubles erented by their conduct and the stats of anrrohy inaugurated by them.

A Frenchman, named Matthieu Thomas, a conspicuous actor in the troubles of Count Raouet de Boulbon, was arrested on his return from California to Guyamas, by order of the Governor of Sonora. He escaped on board the American schooner Alert, claiming to be an American citizen. The Alert landed several passengers on Cape St. Lucas, contrary to the custom-house laws, and has been reported to the home government.

General Vega is said to be scouting the Northern part of Tamaulipas in order to keep down the revolutionary tendencies of that province.

The Diario says that Gen. Alvarez was beaten by the government forces at a place called Petaquilla. He is reported to have headed a party of insurgents in an attack from the mountains upon a government convoy going to Chilpacingo, in the department of Jalisco. He was beaten off and compelled to fly, while several of his officers, including Moreno, were captured.

NICHOLAS, THE CZAR.

The news that we received previously is now confirmed, and there can be no further doubt that Nicholas, the Czar of all the Russias, is dead—that a great and noble man, as well as an able, intelligent, and politic potentate, has ceased to be. Just at the moment when his wisdom was most needed, when his counsels were most wanted for the good of his country, a power that rules kings as well as peasants, saw fit to take him away and leave the earth only its record of his career.

Nicholas Pawlowitsch, Emperor and Autocrat of the Russias, was no common man. He came into possession of the supreme power of the Empire by the consent and at the urgent request of an elder brother who was entitled to it, but who saw in Nicholas the germs of that great intelligence and ability that led him to be the most royal of the world's rulers. He was a King and Monarch by nature—a superior, physically as well as intellectually, to the common herd. He stood up in the crowd of European rulers a head above the highest, and marched with a brave, kingly stride among crowns as well as commoners. His very port was majestic and his conduct never belied it. He had the appearance, the heart and the high honor of the greatest ruler of the world. He was idolized by his own people and respected by others. He had no small objects nor no small means. Taking the national polley marked out by Peter, and the nntional faith that was transmitted him by his fathers, he followed both with an earnest desire for their success and supremacy. His life was given to his country, and every effort that he could make for its advancement was made readily and willingly. Nicholas was a patriot as well as a King, and looked no less to the good of his people than the prosperity of his empire. He ameliorated the condition of the crown serfs, weakened the power of the nobles, founded schools, colleges and academies, built railroads and telegraphs, and generally developed the resources of the great country he ruled. He strove by all possible means to make the Russian Empire the first and most powerful in existence. It was his duty to do so and we honor him for doing it.

Nicholas was born in 1796—married to the sister of the King of Prussia in 1817, and crowned Emperor in 1825. Since the moment of his coronation he has used every effort to extend the power of his nation and develop its resources. He found a general state of corruption among officials and checked it. He found a weak navy, an insufficient army and a bad revenue—and remedied them all. He was a hard worker, like Napoleon, and more patriotic than Cromwell. He was Russia—its government and its being. No useful project was too slight for his notice and patronage, nor no public fault too small for his reprehension. He was a real King in person and in action—a royal ruler, who, dying, leaves no equal behind. For the little, inefficient, unimportant crowns of the world, we profess no regard. A thousand of them might rise, rule and die, without a word of approval or any sentiment of regard from us. But when a great royal heart steps into the chair of state, and gives more honor to the crown than the crown could to him, our hero-worship becomes strong, and we wish to give him honor as we would to honor our own heroes and patriots.

Our opinions with regard to the course of Nicholas in the present war have been expressed, and do not need to be reiterated. There can be no doubt that in his death, at this peculiar juncture, the nation suffers an immeasurable lose, and that the prospects of Europe are materially changed. It is more likely than congresses and conferences will be able to effect something, and that Austria and Prussia will be successful in saving themselves from commitalism to either side. The new Czar is reported, however, to uphold the policy of his father, to carry out his last orders and approve his regulations. If such is the case, we may yet have a continuance of the war as decided as it would have been under Nicholas. Quien sabe?

The Council Proceedings.

The proceedings of the Common Council on Tuesday evening were of an unusually interesting character. They were important, also, for a compromise between the city and the Pontchartrain Railroad Com; any was consummated, which will result in a saving to the former of $300,000. It is true there is a dead loss of $200 000, which is bad enough in all conscience, but not so bad as the loss of $500 000 would have been. The policy pursued, which was to save the corporation as much as possible, was probably the best under the circumstances. To use a common phrase, the city was "in for it," and the cheapest and surest mode of extrication was the wisest that could be resorted to. Had we been rich, out of debt, and in the enjoyment of an overflowing municipal treasury we could have afforded to run the risk of law-suits, the jeopardling of the sum total, as well as such other expensive contingencies the future might have in store for us. But, as we are poor, heavily in debt, and as our treasury is empty, the best plan was to get back as many bonds as possible—secure as much as possible—and sever the disastrous connection forever.

Our readers are so well posted in regard to the lessenge of the $500,000 of bonds (a million was to follow) to aid in the construction of a railroad to Mobile, that extended explanation is unnecessary. The project has wholly fallen through, just as many persons predicted it would from the outset. Some weeks ago it was understood that the Railroad Directory desired a conference with a committee of the Connoil. A joint committee was accordingly appointed, and after due investigation and deliberation, reported the affairs of the Railroad Company to be in a most unsatisfactory condition, and voocmmended the acceptance of the three hundred bonds of $1000 each tendered by the aforesaid Directors on condition that litigation should cease and the Company be released. A resolution, giving effect to tha report, passed the Board of Assistants by a vote of 15 yeas to 2 nays. The Board of Aldermen concurred in the report and resolution, adding an amendment reserving in the city the privilege of bringing suits against the managers of the Company for a misapplication of the funds. The Lower Board approved of this amendment, and it has probably received the signature of the Mayor ere this. The old saying has it, "a burnt child dreads the fire." We imagine the fingers of the tax-payers have been sufficiently burned to make them watchful in future. If not, they may be set down as perfect salamanders.

YELLOW FEVER IN THE WEST INDIES.—We learn by late advices that the yellow fever has been prevailing with much violence at many ports of the West Indies. The bark George D. Emmins, at Port au Prince on the 12th inst., had lost three men by harbor fever; the brig Star, of Boston, had lost two men by yellow fever and black vomit; and the schooner Empire Spring lost one man and another sick. The brig Erie, from the same port, reports that the sailing-master of the sloop-of-war Falmouth had died of yellow fever. Capt. Johnson and two of the crew of the schooner D. C. Brooks, for New York, had also died of the same disease. An arrival at Boston from Porto Cabello reports the fever very bad there. The frigate Columbia, of the home squadron, recently arrived at Norfolk from the West Indies, it is said, had fifty cases of yellow fever on board, seven of which have proved fatal.

EFFECTS OF RAILROADS.—Under this bend the Fayettoville (N. C.) Observer notes that a tract of land at Dunbam's Depot, on the line of the North Carolina Rail road, has been bought at $4000, for which a few years ago the purchaser paid $225.

A writer in the Wilmington Herald thus notices the improvement in the condition of Columbus county, N. C., since the completion of the Wilmington and Manchester Railroad:

The benefits of the W. and M. R. R. can not be over estimated. Land that would only sell for 25 cents an acre, now is worth $3 to $5 per acre. An intelligent resident of Whitesville, told me that the railroad had certainly quadrupled the entire value of the county, and increased the amount of its exports more than ten-fold.

The friends of the Administration at Washington assert that the President has ordered that extreme measures be taken, if necessary, to exact instant reparation at Havana for the late outrage upon the steamer El Dorado.

By Magnetic Telegraph.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

New York, March 27.—The Collins steamship Atlantic, Capt. West, arrived at this port to-day, with one week's later intelligence from Europe. Her dates from Liverpool are to the 10th inst., and from all parts of the continent correspondingly late.

The intelligence by the Atlantic is very important, confirming as it does the reported death of the Czar Nicholas, and stating the peaceful accession of the Emperor Alexander to the Imperial throne.

The Emperor Alexander.

The Emperor Alexander II. had succeeded peaceably to the Russian throne, and had signalized his accession by issuing a manifesto stating that he will adhere to the policy of his father, the late Emperor Nicholas.

Constantine, the second son of Nicholas, the other brothers of the new Czar, and the superior officers of the army and navy, had taken the oath of allegiance to the new Emperor.

The new Czar had confirmed the appointment of Prince Gortschakoff, as the Russian diplomatic agent to the Vienna Peace Conference, and had reiterated the instructions of his father in regard to negotiations leading to peace.

The first preliminary conference had been held at Vienna.

Recall of Menschikoff.

Nicholas had, previous to his death, recalled Prince Menschikoff, the Russian commander in the Crimea, and appointed General Gortschakuff chief commander in his place; General Osten Sacken secoed in command, and Gen. Ludors commander of the forces in Bessarabia. Gen. Rudiger had been appointed Minister of War of Russia by the new Emperor.

The Crimea.

The Allies have ordered their Generals to press forward the war with vigor. There had been more fighting in the Crimea. The French had stormed some redoubts which had been skillfully erected by the Russians during the night. Several hundred of the latter were killed, and there was a strong rumor current that the Grand Duke Michael was wounded and afterwards died at Sebastopol.

A large force of Russians threatened Balaklava.

The blockade of the Danube had been raised.

Brousse Destroyed by an Earthquake.

Bosse—probably Broussa, though the telegraph says Bosn—hnil been destroyed by an earthquake, with most of its inhabitants.

France and England.

A speck of disagreement had grown up between the Emperor Napoleon and England, and it was said the armies should not not together if the Rochuck Committee proceeded with their investigation. The Earl of Chircedon went express to Boulogne, and made matters straight. Meantime, the committee proceeds with its investigation; but it is thought Parliament will be dissolved.

Switzerland.

Serious difficultiee have arisen in Tioino, in Switzerland.

Belgium.

The crisis in the Belgian Ministry still continues.

Denmark.

The King of Denmark was sick.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

Messrs. Milligan, Evans & Lempriere report that the Liverpool Cotton market opened with a good demand, and that prices advanced ¼ penny per pound. The demnnd, however, fell off at the close, when holders were pressing their stocks on the market. The sales of the week are reported at 87,000 bales, of which 17 000 were on speculation and 12,000 for export.

Messrs. Browe, Shipley & Co. quote the Cotton market very active early in the week. The demand, however, fell off, and the market closed tamely at an advance of ¼d per lb.

The closing quotatione were for Fair Orlsans, 5½; Middling Orleans, 5½; Fair Uplands, 5½; and Middling Uplands, 4¾d per lb.

State of Trade.

The Manchester market evinced a better feeling, and prices had somewhat advaneed.

Breadstuffs.

All kinds of Breadstuffs were dull at lower prices. Wbsat had declined 2d per 70 pounds. Flour was 1s per bbl lower, and Corn bad declined 1s per 480 pounds.

Milligan & Co. quote Western Canal Flonr 36, and Ohio 42s per bbl; and both yellow and white Corn at 42s per 480 pounde.

Consols.

Were quoted at the close at 93.

London Markets.

Baring Brothers & Co. report a fair business geuerally in the London markets. Iron wae quiet.

Amsrican stocks were quite unchangsd—Money wae easier.

FURTHER BY THE ATLANTIC.

From the Crimea.

New York, Marah 27.—The special correspondent of the Loedon News, writing from Balaklava, 23d of February, says it is rumored that General Canrobert had ordered the court martial of an officer high ie command of the French army. He was accused of holding treasonable correspondence with the enemy.

The Earthquake at Broussa.

Two thousand lives were lost by the earthquake at Broussa, in Turkey in Asia.

Austria.

A daughter had been born to the Emperor and Empress of Austria.

Switzerland.

A disturbance had broken out between the Federal Commission and the citizens of the Canton of Tioino.

Belgium.

This country remains without a Ministry.

The Difficulty Between France and England.

The London Herald says, on most excellent authority, that the French Emperor had remonstrated against the committee of inquiry in the British Parliament, into the conduct of the war, and had stated that if the committee continued its investigations, the armies of the two countries could not not together. A dissolution of the armies, it was said, would take place, though both would act sepnrately for the same cause.

Lord Lucan

Had been dsnied a court martial.

Another Kaffir War.

Apprehensione were felt in England that another war with the Kaffirs, in Southern Africa, was about to take plnce. Measures had been taken by the Government to avoid it.

New York Markets.

New York, March 27.—There is no change to note in our markets.

Suicide of a Bank Officer.

Boston, March 27.—T. W. Hooper, a teller in the Merchants' Bank, in this city, committed suicide to-day by hanging. The cause is not assigned.

Sailing of the Africa.

The Cunard steamship Africa sails at 10 o'clock, A. M., to-morrow, for Halifax and Liverpool.

THE EL DORADO AGAIN OVERHAULED BY A SPANISH WAR VESSEL.

The U. S. steamer Crescent City, John Metlowan, commander, left New Orleans on the morning of the 22nd inst., arrived at Havana on the evening of the 23d, and sailed for this port at noon of the 24th. She brings eighty-five passengers, and a full cargo for New Orleans.

U. S. mail steamer El Dorado arrived at Havana on the 20th inst. from Aspinwall, having been again compelled to heave to off Cape Antonio, and submit to an examination of her papers by an officer from a Spanish man-of-war. The El Dorado sailed for Aspinwall on the afternoon of the 23d.

U. S. M. steamer Philadelphia arrived at Havana on the 23d, and sailed for New York the same day. H. B. steamer Calpgeton was in the harbor of Havana.

The execution of Pinto, the bandit, took place at Havana, on the 22d, before an immense concourse of people.

The trial of Crampes and Foltz, by court martial, was fixed to take place on the 24th.

The American Consul-General Sagua la Grand was under arrest in Havana, for refusing, it is said, to remove the American coat of arms from over the entry of his office, at the request of the Spanish authorities.

The events since the sailing of the previous steamer possess but little of interest from California.

Throughout the mining sections, says the Herald wherever it could be reached by telegraph, the suspension of Adams & Co. was announced early on Friday morning, and simultaneously a run was commenced upon all the other banking houses. Adams & Co. stopped payment at all their offices, and Wells, Fargo & Co. at Sacramento, Marysville, Nevada, and perhaps a few other places.

George W. Plume, of Marysville, suspended, as did also Randel Davis, at Nevada.

In Jamestown, John H. Richardson, who was doing a banking business at that place, closed his doors and departed for parts unknown. His depositors lose about $30,000, and Page, Bacon & Co. about $2000. Upon Richardson's departure his safe was broken upon by the people, but only $20 was found therein.

Messrs. Wells, Fargo & Co. resumed payment on Tuesday, and so far all demands have been promptly paid.

Adams & Co. have filed a petition for insolvency, and their schedule of assets and liabilities show a balance on the right side of about $100,000; assets, $1,814,285; liabilities, $1,639,737. Mr. Woods has given all his private property, estimated at $2,000,000, and this goes to make up the total of the assets.

We understand that the express business of Adams & Co., will be carried on without any interruption.

The failure of Robinson & Co. is a bad one, but it is hoped, and by some believed, that Dr. Wright will resume in a few days.

The long looked for rain has come at last, and the miner and agriculturist will gain thousands where they have lost but hundreds by the bank failures. It has rained steadily for nearly forty-eight hours, and judging from the accounts already received, we are led to believe it has extended all through the State.

On the 16th February, the schooner Victoria was capsized off Petaluma Creek, and three of her crew were drowned.

The Mint at San Francisco is unswering the demand for coin as fully as possible. About $60,000 a day are thrived out, and the coinage for the month amounts to $1,250 000.

OUR AFFAIRS WITH SPAIN.—The Black Warrior Case Settled.—The Washington Union announces the settlement of the Black Warrior case with Spain. It appears that the Spanish Minister of Foreign Relations intimated his intention to preside from the position of his predecessor, and asked for the views of our Government in writing, that he might take them into serious consideration. Mr. Marcy thereupon instructed Mr. Soulo to communicate to the Spanish Government his dispatch of June 22, 1854, in reply to Mr Calderon's dispatch refusing to comply with our demand for satisfaction in the case. On the 5th of December, 1854, Mr. Soule communicated to the Spanish Government the dispatch of Mr. Marcy; but no reply was made to it by the Spanish Government prior to Mr Soule's resignation and withdrawal from Madrid. The Union, after speaking of this dispatch of Mr. Marcy as one of the most unanswerable arguments ever made on controverted questions of fact and law, says:

We are gratified to learn that it has been properly appreciated, and that the considerations of its position has been fully admitted, by the Spanish Government. Late irreprehible information as to the change in the Government of the Catholic Majesty in regard to the Black Warrior affair, and have reason to know that the following extract of a letter on the subject, from Madrid, which appears in Galignani's Messenger of Feb. 26, 1855, is correct: "It appears (says the letter) that the Spanish Government has decided on proclaiming that the authorities of Cuba exceeded their powers in the affair of the Black Warrior, as regards the two principal points of it—the description of the cargo and the time allowed for the production of the ship's manifest. In consequence, it is disposed to award a just indemnity." Assuming this information to be true, it is gratifying to know that Mr. Marcy's argument has had the effect of securing an adjustment of this affair, which will be consummated upon taking the necessary proof as to the amount of the damages."

The Union, however, strongly intimates that both the President and Secretary Marcy will not be satisfied with this single concession. There must not only be atonement for other past wrongs to the United States, but security for the future, against all aggressions and insults; in fact, the present concession seems to be merely looked upon as a pecuniary one to private individuals, the wrong and insult to the nation still retaining its original features. This was distinctly set forth in Mr. Marcy's dispatch, as the New our Government would take of it.

It appears from the Ostend documents, laid before the late Congress, that the Spanish Government voluntarily proposed to Mr. Perry, the American Charge d'Affairs, (while Mr. Soule was absent to France,) the settlement of all claims involving private interests now pending between the United States and Spain reciprocally, taking for a model the convention of 1853, between the United States and Great Britain, for a similar purpose. It also appears that Mr. Soule, in a letter to Mr. Perry, from Aix-la-Chapelle, discouraged this proposition.

Terrible Coal Pit Explosion.

Loss Of Life.—A terrific explosion occurred at the Middlothian Coal Pits, in Chesterfield county, about thirteen miles south of this city, on Monday evening last, at five o'clock, by which thirty-four persons were instantly killed, and a number of others so badly burned that little or no hopes are entertained of their recovery. Up to the very moment of the accident, the superintendents and employees in the pit felt perfectly satisfied that there was not a particle of foul air about them, and Mr. John Atkins, the agent, looked upon the pits as being so entirely free from danger, that he declared to us that he would not have hesitated to take his family into them to remain. Even now, the cause of the explosion is entirely hid in mystery, and must ever continue so, though Mr. Atkins inclines to the opinion that in making a bleat, an old shaft sunk was accidentally breached, from which poured forth a volume of gas, that became ignited, and swept as a besom of destruction through the various avenues, dealing death with an unsparing hand, on all that came within its course.

The explosion, when it took place, caused the earth, for miles around the pits, to wave and rock as a lock in the wind. One gentleman, who was crossing the railroad, about a mile from the pits, at the time, said he felt the rails reel under him; and another, who was passing the road on horseback, declared that his beast staggered and trembled, as if suddenly shocked by a tremendous galvanic battery. The outer boards around the shafts were blown off, as if they had been paper, and at the western shaft, two large cabin chimies were broken in two as easily as if they had been pipe stems. At the time of the explosion there were three carpenters at work on the top of the eastern shaft, about thirty-five feet above the ground. One of them was so badly frightened that he leaped to the ground, without incurring any injury, but "old Squire" and the other one held on to the beams until the shock was over, and then came down.

The Middlothian Pits have always been looked upon as free from danger, consequently the company found no difficulty in employing as many steady white miners as they desired; and if the explosion had taken place between the hours of 6 and 12 o'clock, we have no hesitation in saying that the loss of life would have been trebled, and the number of widows and orphans thereby created five times as great as that caused by the accident at the English Pits in May last; but fortunately, the men were not allowed to make overwork, the supply of coal raised being greater than the demand, consequently, most of the white men had left the pits at 12 o'clock, and thereby saved their lives.

As soon as the explosion was heard, all the workmen above ground, from the Middlothian and English pits, hastened to the scene, and, prepared to descend the western shaft, to rescue those who might still be alive. Mr. Job Atkins, the agent for the English pits, in company with a number of noble-hearted volunteers, descended the eastern shaft as soon as they could do so, and the two parties immediately set about in search of such of the miners as they might find alive. They succeeded in rescuing sixteen persons more or less injured, four whites and twelve blacks, and took them to their houses and the hospitals, where they were immediately placed under medical treatment. They then discovered about thirty dead men, some of whom they removed, and others they were preparing to remove when we left the pits at half-past 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon. Mr. Atkins describes the scene as heart-rending in the extreme. Some of the dead men, the flesh charred on their bones, held their shovels in their hands, others were holding to their picks and drills; and Samuel Hunt, a small boy, who had been deprived of reason for the time, by the concussion, was calling loudly to the mule he had been driving to go along. Those who were not dead, as soon as they heard the voices of their friends, begged earnestly not to be left, and then prayed loudly for a few drops of cold water to quench their burning thirst.

In one of the avenues several tons of stone and dirt had been thrown down, beneath which were discovered the bodies of two of Mr Woodridge's servants.

We visited the hospital, and of all the horrid spectacles our eyes ever beheld, the one there presented in our view was the worst. Some seven or eight negro men lay there, the skin burned from their faces, eyes, hands, arms and bodies as if they had been roasted, and the groans that escaped from those who were conscious of their suffering could not fail to pierce the hardest heart.

Out of fifty persons in the pits at the time of the accident, but three escaped serious injury and these were colored persons, though there can be very little doubt that many of these were smothered by the "after damps," rather than killed by the explosion.

Fifty-six of the males employed in the pits, which are 770 feet deep, were killed by the explosion. [Richmond Dispatch.

BURNING OF THE STEAMBOAT BULLETIN.

Great Loss of Life and Property.

Vicksburg, March 25, 1855.—The Memphis and New Orleans packet steamer Bulletin, Capt. Church, whilst on her downward trip and near Lake Providence, took fire on Saturday afternoon about 4 o'clock and was totally consumed. In addition to the destruction of the boat we regret to have to record a great loss of life. The flames first discovered in the third or fourth tier of cotton from above, and in less than five minutes, so rapidly did it extend, that the boat was almost entirely enveloped in flames.

It is to all be found the proceedings of a meeting of the passengers, which contain a full account of this sad casualty. The books and a greater part of the papers belonging to the boat were destroyed, together with the baggage of the passengers.

MEETING OF THE PASSENGERS.

At a meeting of the surviving passengers of the ill-fated Bulletin, Gen. William Nick, of Bolivar county, Miss., was called to the chair, and J. M. Craig, of Uhlock county Ark., was chosen secretary, whereupon the following preamble and statements were had:

The boat was found to be on fire when near the islands of 16 and 37, about 4½ o'clock, P. M., the wind at the time blowing fresh. Capt. C. B. Church gave the order to make the shore as soon as possible. Mr. W. J. Miller, the pilot at the wheel, stood manfully at his post until the boat struck the shore, and then made his escape from the flames by jumping off the Bird'seye roof at the stern of the boat into the river. He received as well fine judgment in the selection of a point at which to reach the land, at or before reaching which the boat was unconsumed by flames, having on board about 3,500 bales cotton.

Some of the passengers succeeded in jumping on shore from the Bluff-castle, but the large majority were cut off from their escape forward by the flames, being in the after part of the boat. Captain C. B. Church, together with Messrs Fridegh, Porter and Robinson, clerks, Mr Brown the mate, as well as all the other officers of the boat, worked with faithful fidelity in saving the passengers from a watery grave. Captain Church (with Mr. James Howard, the steward) were the last to leave the wreck, and after rendering every assistance possible in his power to others jumped into the river at a distance of some two hundred yards from the shore, and but for the timely aid rendered him by a skiff going to his rescue, was in great danger of losing his own life.

This ill-fated accident occurred near the landing of Dr. Keene (some 12 miles below Lake Providence) at whose house, as well as that of Judge Morgan, every comfort was rendered to the passengers under their hospitable roofs. During the scene of danger, very great assistance was rendered by the timely aid of the officers of the steamer Falcon, by picking up by means of her small boats, many persons who were struggling in the river, but for which the number of lives lost would have been much larger. Great assistance was also rendered to the sufferers by the officers and crew of a coal-boat, which was floating in the river near by, whose names we have not the pleasure to know.

The number of missing, as near as can be ascertained, is from twenty to twenty-five persons. The lady passengers, by means of life-boats and cotton bales, were all saved, for which we ascribe great credit to Capt. Church, the boat, cargo and baggage are a total loss. The wreck floated down some five or six miles, grounded and sunk. We are pleased to learn that Captain Church has insurance on the boat to the amount of $20,000.

Upon motion, it was resolved that the Vicksburg, New Orleans and Memphis papers be requested to publish these proceedings, together with the following list of saved and missing.

Upon motion, the meeting adjourned.

CHARITY HOSPITAL.—Report for the week ending Saturday evening:

FATAL ACCIDENT.—The watchman of the steamer Fanny Spurlmark, lying in the Second District, fell a man staggor and fell into the river, near the boat, at about half-past 12 o'clock on Saturday night. He instantly got a yawl and a number of several persons, and proceeded in regaining the man, but not till he was about half drowned. He was taken to the police office, full of water, and thence to the hospital, where he soon after died. He proved to be Joseph Foster, an Irishman, about forty-five years of age. The Coroner held an inquest on the body last evening, and returned a verdict that he came to his death from cold and exposure from the effects of the fall aforesaid, while in a state of intoxication. In all probability, had he been rolled when rescued from the river, his life would have been saved.

RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.—Francois Samuel, an aged free negro, had one of his legs crushed on Saturday on stepping from the Opelousas cars, a short distance above Algiers, while they were in motion, by which he fell and the train passed over him. He was brought over to Charity Hospital, where he lies in a critical situation. Francois is a veteran of the great Chalmette victory.

Peter Fay, an Irish laborer on the same railroad, is also in the hospital with both legs crushed by a similar accident. He is not considered dangerously hurt.

ASSAULTING A WHITE MAN.—George Stevens, alias Robinson, a free negro, was sent before the Criminal Court by Recorder Ramos for having assaulted John Cushing, a white man, called him hard names, and shook his fist in his face—all in violation of the black code.

THE COSMOPOLITAN CLOCK.—The clock of many faces for many longitudes in Hyde & Beardsley's window, at the corner of Canal and Royal streets, is still an object of interest and admiration to the passing crowds as it has been for two months past. Though it discloses nothing new or wonderful, it is still a pleasure to look at it and feel that the time is several hours sooner or later in other parts of the world than it is here. Just while we are penning the Sun Francisconns are breakfasting and the Londoners and Parisians dining. The most wonderful of all the dials, to our notion, is the New Orleans dial, which, without extra hands or figures, also indicates the precise time at the antipodes—thrice as far off as California on Friend! It is a fine piece of machinery, withal, and induces an astronomical state of mind in the beholder, quite pleasant by way of a change.

THE WEATHER.—Though bright and clear, the weather continues obnoxiously cool. We are informed that spring plants, such as beans, peas, etc., have been much damaged, and in some places destroyed by the almost freezing temperature of the last few nights. It is about time for another change of some kind.

THE ARTESIAN WELL.—The work has been resumed in sinking the pipes—a work of great labor. They are down now about 315 feet. On Thursday, under the pressure of the screwing apparatus—about 70 tons—the cast iron screw units gave way and crumbled into dust. They were replaced with brass nuts; and as the present force is not sufficient, Mr. Reed is having constructed a hydraulic engine of 150 tons pressure. A piece of iron, broken off from the bottom section, is still sadly in the way of the auger.

A BAD CROSSING.—Accident.—About 2 o'clock on Saturday morning, a horse and cab, with the driver and a passenger, were precipitated from the bridge on Nayades street, into the Melpomene Canel. The passenger escaped with a bruised shoulder, and the driver escaped without injury; but the cab was smashed to pieces and the horse drowned. The accident happened from the absence of any railing or other protection on the side of the bridge, and the city should and doubtless will be held accountable for the damage. The cab was No. 261, driven by Edward McCormick.

A STRANGER TAKEN IN.—John Halcun, an old man from Opelousas, yesterday made affidavit before Recorder Ramos, charging one Hays, the keeper of a boarding-house at No. 21 Conti street, with having stolen about $80 from him. It appears that Halcun once boarded with Hays, and on returning to the city recently, fell in with him. On Monday Hays proposed a walk; Halcun accepted; they started out, and got jolly together; very jolly, that finally when Halcun pulled out his purse to pay for drinks in some suburban doggery, Hays snatched it and put it in his own pocket, all in a friendly way, saying that as Halcun was too drunk to take care of it he would return it soon. He failed to do so, however, and, ungraciously cutting Hays' society, continued the spree on his own individual account until yesterday afternoon, when officer Pecora overhauled him. He was brought in royally drunk, and locked up—and will be examined soon.

AN INCIDENT IN THE CARS.—During a trip from Wilmington, Del., on Saturday evening last, to Baltimore, an incident occurred of not a common nature. Shortly after leaving the Susquehanna there was apparently a something from the movement to and fro of carries allowable in the ladies' car, which gave reason to suppose that there was on hand that which was unusual in that department. We do not know that names are necessary to be used, and will stop with the use of as many names as we please. Dr. W. B. Hicks, of this city, happened to be a passenger, and he, at the instance of the Rev. Dr Balch, also of this city, who was a passenger, was called on professionally to attend a lady who was ill, and at the time in the ladies' department. She was, so far as personal friends were concerned, a stranger, but was en route for to reach a residence in Baltimore. The doctor gave the attendance, and few hours resulted in the birth (her first) of a fine boy before the cars reached the city. It is needless to say that every facility obtainable was given to the lady, and that she reached her home in safety. [Baltimore Sun.

CAPTAIN SALAZAR.—"El Regareno," the paper published in Spanish at San Antonio, says that this notorious individual—who is well remembered by old settlers who were in Texas during the absence of the Santa Fe expedition, as the inhuman wretch who wounded with his sword, several of the Santa Fe prisoners, who were were down with fatigue, and prevented by their lacerated feet from traveling as far as the main body—is living as a citizen of the United States near Santa Fe."

From Acapulco.

The statements in the following letter, which we find in the Panama Herald, do not agree very well, it will be seen, with the accounts published in the Mexican papers of the progress of the revolution:

ACAPULCO, MEXICO, March 6, 1855.

Messrs. Editors of the Star and Herald: Owing to the necessary delay in forwarding the dispatches relative to the whole affair to Gen. Alvarez, it has not arrived in time for this letter. I have a translated copy of it in my hand, but deem it prudent to defer its publication to my next.

The revolution is not only making rapid and decisive progress towards a speedy conclusion, but ally after allies in the State of Guerrero, have surrendered to Gen. The inside arrangement of all the houses was much alike, all having port-holes in the partition-wall, and very small and obscure passages from one room to another, and from one or two houses into the mountain. Some on the cliffs above were connected with those below.

WHO DWELT THERE?

We noticed there was no water about there, and inquired of the Indians how the former inhabitants could have managed? They told us that they had heard that a very long time ago there was water running there. We asked them who built those houses? They smilingly shook their heads, and said that they had never heard, but that surely somebody must have built them a very long time back.

We very readily came to a conclusion drawn from the Book of Mormon, in the second chapter of the book of Nephi, that the ancient possessors of those strongholds were robbers of the Gadianton Band, and we considered this locality as one of their very strongholds.

[As a matter of curiosity, we give the passage from the Book of Mormon, which the writer regards as conclusive of the identity of the wonders he saw:]

"And it came to pass in the latter end of the eighteenth year, those armies of robbers and murderers were prepared for battle, and began to come down out of the mountains, and the wilderness, and from their strongholds and their secret places, and began to take possession of the lands, both which was in the land south, and that which was in the land north, and began to take possession of all the lands which had been deserted by the Nephites, and the cities which had been left desolate."

LATER FROM TEXAS.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP LOUISIANA.

The steamship Louisiana, Capt. Talbot, arrived Monday morning from Galveston, bringing dates to the 22d inst. The Times of that date says:

We have experienced in Galveston, since spring commenced, and within the past week, such weather as might be called winter cold. We have not heard that any injury has been done to crops of corn already up, but fear, if not materially damaged, its growth has been retarded. Corn which had sprung up in the gardens here was wilted down as suddenly as though fire had passed over it instead of a cold, wind. Vegetables and fruit blossoms, however, have not been seriously affected.

Dispatches received at Galveston from Palestine, on the 17th, announce a most disastrous fire at Magnolia on the night of the 16th, by which several warehouses and about eighteen hundred bales of cotton were destroyed.

The Austin State Times of the 17th publishes the following letter from an officer stationed at Fort Chadbourne:

On the 16th of February, a party of seven Indians stole about twenty head of beef cattle from the vicinity of the Fort—within three miles. The cattle belonged to Messrs Mackay & Gooch, beef contractors. Mr. Mackay with a few men and a friendly Indian, followed the trail on the 22d. He came up with the Comanches, while encamped. They ran off leaving the cattle and their own animals behind. Mackay remained about an hour and a half in the camp, and then started back with the cattle and the Indian horses. After having been on the road some two hours he was attacked by more than twenty Indians. They re-captured all the property, killed the friendly Indian, and shot Mackay's horse in the shoulder. The whites barely escaped with their lives.

The force at Fort Chadbourne has been reduced by the detachment of Captain Calhoun, so that the commanding officer finds it imprudent to send out parties. He has to remain on the defensive; hence, we suppose, the reason the Indians were not pursued and chastised by the military.

The weather for the last twelve days had been very cold. The thermometer had been standing at 18 degrees Fahrenheit. Rain, snow and ice were plentiful—coming in a manner to add variety to the other pleasures of the season.

The same paper has the following in regard to matters in the region of Fort Belknap:

Many Neighbors arrived from Fort Belknap on Thursday evening. He represents the Indians in the vicinity as very quiet at present. The Caddos, Ionis and Anadahcos, Waco and Tahwaccaros are assembling on the reservation, and the Brazos Agency arrangements have been made to open agains for the first spring; and to furnish Indian rations they assemble. They appear well pleased, and are coming in promptly by invitation of the agent. Kotsoteka Comanches, consisting of about 150 lodges, have encamped a temporary location near the Indian agency. Nothing has been heard from Sanaco and the main band of southern Comanches since their stampede. No intelligence from Capt. Calhoun's command. A detachment of dragoons, from Fort Belknap, are in pursuit of the Indians who committed the depredation recently near Fort Chadbourne.

Settlers in the vicinity of Fort Belknap are making extensive preparations for farming this year. The settlements have penetrated through the Upper Cross Timbers to Belknap. A traveler can stay at a house every night from Austin to Belknap. It is estimated that 300 families settled in the Cross Timbers between the Trinity and the Brazos during the past winter.

A horrible murder was committed at Austin on the 3d inst. Mr. Wm. Pratt, accompanied by his three children, was riding into the city in a wagon when he was attacked by a man named Truman Beck, armed with a double-barreled gun. He jumped from the wagon and received two charges of buckshot in the thigh and ankle from Beck, who was arrested in the act of re-loading his gun. Pratt died the next day. He had been a day or two before, to Beck's premises with an officer in pursuit of a runaway negro, and Mrs. Beck had complained to her husband that the party insulted her.

The Dallas Herald learns from some of the leading persons connected with the scheme of Messrs. Brisbane and Considerant, for the establishment of French Socialists in Texas, that it is in contemplation to establish three provisional settlements; one, probably, in Dallas county, one in Tarrant, and one in the Brazos bottom of Brazos. A large number of the settlers for these colonies are now on route, having left Oktolonah some time since. They are probably detained by the low stage of the rivers.

It is stated that, industrial, mechanical, and learned professions will be fully represented. It is their design to make everything they use within themselves, and they engage largely in manufactures of different kinds as their attention to engage largely in the cultivation of the grape and manufacture of wines. The Herald looks hopefully and favorably upon the enterprise.

The reporter of the Boston Chronicle, describing the condition of the wreck of the ship Wm. A. Cooper, which went ashore and was lost on Salmate Beach, near Marshfield, says:

The place is, indeed, a fearful one in a storm and the night of the heavy, continuous waves rolling far up along the beach, however sublime in themselves, carry terror to the heart when conscious that a disabled ship is lying of their mercy, and that thin planks afford but a slight barrier to the powerful waves. The landing of the crew at the time the vessel struck has been described, but another fearful and perilous feat was accomplished in our presence. The night coming on, and the storm increasing, the workmen, of course, wished to leave the wreck and reach the shore, but this was by no means an easy thing to do. One boat was lowered and ten men took passage in it, and with great difficulty gained the shore; the boat was filled with water, and their escape from drowning was almost miraculous. Another boat was soon freighted with nine men under command of Capt. C. H. Hall, and was more successful. They availed themselves of the rolling in of a smooth wave, and were carried on its summit, and landed nearly a hundred feet from the water as the wave receded.

FROM SOUTH AMERICA.—Dates have been received at Panama from Valparaiso to February 14, from Callao to February 26, and from Guayaquil to March 2.

The news from Chile is unimportant. The port had been visited by a number of vessels of war; the United States steamer Susquehanna sailed for home on the 14th of January, and the Mississippi on the 8th of February, the frigate St. Lawrence with the broad pennant, Commodore [illegible], left for the United States on the 8th. The Independence, Commodore Mervin, had arrived to relieve her. The Decatur had sailed for the coast of Ecuador. The corvette John Adams arrived on the 29th of January from Rio.

The British ship-of-war President, the steamer Rattlesnake, and the French brig Obligado were in port.

The markets are reported as rather dull, but an increase of business is soon looked for. The late rise in the price of Chile flour has been fully sustained, and its effect has been to check speculation. A cargo has been purchased at $7.6, and some small lots for home consumption changed hands at $8. The prices current state that there appears no prospect of the price going up, or even of the present rates being maintained.

Freights are rather looking down, and little activity has been observed; shipments to Europe having subsided.

From Peru we learn that nothing of importance has transpired, either in the political or commercial world; but the non-receipt of our usual files of the Foreign News and Comercio, prevents our giving a summary of events since the arrival of the last mail.

Our dates from Guayaquil are to the 29th of February. The question of the guano deposite on the Galapagos islands is discussed. Very rich silver mines are said to have been discovered near Riobamba; by an analysis made by a German, eighteen ounces of silver was obtained from twenty-five pound weight of the ore.

A new journal called El Espectador has been started at Quito; it is devoted to the interest of the clerical party.

AN INCIDENT IN CHURCH.—The Rev. Dr. Mowrady delivered a discourse on St. Patrick's day in the Cathedral in New York. A letter from that city says:

In the midst of his discourse the Rev. speaker abruptly ceased making a long and apparently angry "point." The bubble was still as death for about a minute, when the words of the priest were again heard, and all eyes directed towards the gallery, the cause of the disturbance was soon seen. A young lady sitting in one of the pews. He said:

"Take down that eye-glass, ma'am, take down that eye-glass—you can see me well enough without it; I'm sufficiently big enough to be seen without an eye-glass. And don't be making signs at that other girl and making her laugh."

Quite a sensation ensued, the unlucky lady with the quizzing glass seemed overwhelmed in the presence of the startled congregation.

The Brothers.

In all the principal "banking institutions of every kind," in San Francisco, were the "Bella Union," "Verandah," "Mine de Oro," "El Dorado," and "Parker House," all situated about the Plaza, and each employed a band of music to lessen the tedious hours of that rainy winter, and to drown the noise of dingling gold and silver and the cursing ejaculations of the gainesters. Many a sad scene has taken place within those saloons, that chilled the soul of the beholders, and is remembered with horror. I was once carelessly sauntering through one of these places. My attention was attracted towards a person who had large piles of gold before him; the starting eyeballs, the swollen veins upon his forehead, the cold sweat upon his face and clenched hands, told of heavy losses; mingled exclamations of horror, and contempt would escape him; and he seemed unconscious of all else going on around him; his gaze bent upon the cards as if his life's blood was the stake at issue: and in this case his last dollar was put within the dealer's bank, when, with the frenzy of a maniac, he drew a long dirk-knife and plunged it up to the hilt into his own body and sank a corpse upon the table. A few rude jeers followed the act; the body was removed, and the game went on as though nothing had happened—as though another victim had not been added to the page of the gambler's damning record! or another soul had not gone to its final account!

I learned this much of his history. He started with a large stock of goods, given him by his father, to sell on commission, and the father's fortune depended upon a sure return of the money so invested; but, as usual with young men, he indulged in the full liberty of unbridled license, and while the ship stopped at one of the South American ports he engendered the first seeds of "play;" but for a while after his arrival the excitement of trade and the energy necessary to accomplish a successful issue, kept his mind busy. One day, by appointment, he was to meet a mercantile friend at this house, and, while waiting for his friend, he staked a few dollars upon the turning cards, when the latent disease sprang into life, and it carried him headlong over the precipice, and ended in the tragic manner related.

The "Mine de Oro" was a gambling saloon, situated on Washington street, and opposite the "El Dorado," and in '49 it was the principal resort of the disbanded soldiers of the California regiments, and also of the soldiers who had been engaged in the war with Mexico. Behind one of the largest monte banks in the room sat a man who had won for himself honorable mention, and an officer's commission was given him for his bravery at the storming of Monterey; but preferring the climate of California and its golden prospects to a more northern home, he embarked for that country at the close of the war with Mexico, and upon his arrival he opened a bank for gambling. The emigrants come in by thousands, and a few nights after his arrival, a young man entered this saloon and seated himself at the bank, and staked various sums upon the cards until he had lost nearly all the money he possessed. Excited with the play, and maddened by his losses, he accused the dealer of cheating; the dealer replied sharply to the accusation—the lie passed, when the young man struck the dealer a severe blow upon his face; as quick as thought the sharp report of a pistol followed, and the gambler's clothing was covered with the young man's blood—he had shot him through the right breast. The room was soon cleared of the spectators present, the doors closed, and medical attendance called in and of the wounded man. The gambler sat moodily over his bank, running the small monte cards through his fingers, and perhaps thinking of the deed just perpetrated, when the wounded man gave a moan of agony as the doctor's probe reached the bottom of his wound. The doctor inquired what State he was from, and the wounded man replied;

"From Vermont."

The gambler raised his head, for it had been a long time since he had seen a person from the home of his childhood, and Vermont being his native State, the mere mention of its name interested him. The doctor next inquired the name of the place where his parents resided, if he had any. The wounded man replied:

"Montpelier."

The gambler sprang to his feet, his limbs trembled, and his face was pale as death, for Montpelier was the home of his youth, and perhaps the wounded man might have been his playmate in childhood—perhaps a schoolmate—knew his parents, his brothers and sisters. He clung convulsively to the table, and with the contending emotions of rapid thought and the weight of injury he had inflicted, he could scarcely keep upon his feet. A stimulant was given the wounded man; and he was momentarily relieved from that weakness the body is so subject to after a severe wound—when the doctor inquired if there was any friend in the city he wished sent for.

"Yes," he replied, "my wife—she is at the City Hotel, on the corner of Clay and Kearney streets—tell Mary to hasten, for I am badly hurt."

A man was sent to bring his wife.

"Doctor," said the gambler, "save that man's life and there is my bank, and $10,000 in Burgoyne's—you shall have it all."

The doctor felt the pulse of the man and probed the wound anew. The gambler watched him with the greatest anxiety until his inspection was finished, when the doctor shook his head in token of impossibility; the gambler sat down by the side of the wounded man and bathed his head with water, and staunched the flow of blood from the wound until the arrival of the wife; she came, accompanied by a few friends, and as heroic women bear their misfortunes, she bore hers. Not a word of reproach escaped her—words of cheerfulness only came from her lips as the tears coursed down her cheeks. To her inquiry as to the chances of her husband's recovery, the doctor assured her that there was no hope; that the wound was mortal; and that in a few hours he would die. She sank down upon her knees and invoked the mercy of a forgiving God for her dying husband and his murderer. The gambler asked the forgiveness of the wounded man for the wrong he had committed, and also that of the wife, which was readily granted.

"This," said he, "is for not obeying the sacred injunction of my aged father and mother—not to gamble. I have faced death a thousand times, and still I have escaped: the balls of an enemy have whistled past my ears as thick as hail-stones, and the bursting bomb has exploded at my feet; still I have lived—oh, God! and for this! High above the red tide of battle I have carried my country's ensign—and that won for me a name among men—when not one comrade was left to tell of the deeds in the battle, I escaped unscathed. Why was I not killed like the rest? All that was proud and pleasing to man I have had; and if I could recall this lust not by living upon carrion, sleeping in a pauper's grave and renouncing every proud act of my life, I would do it. I was born in the same village with that man; we have been classmates together at the same school; received instructions of the same aged man; we were born beneath the same roof, and, oh, God! the same mother gave us birth! He must not die—he is my brother!"

And the gambler sank down in a swoon upon the floor. The wounded man raised himself upon his elbows; his glassy eyes wandered about the room as if in search of some particular person—

"Mary," said he, "is brother William here?"—and the words choked in his throat; the gurgling blood stopped his utterance, and he sank back a corpse upon his pillow. The wife knelt again, but it was beside a dead body, and invoked the mercy of God upon his soul, and forgiveness for the murderer.

The gambler awoke from his swoon, and staggered up to the wife and said:

"Mary, would it were otherwise, for I have nothing to live for now; the dead and dying do not want anything in this world; take this certificate of deposit to our aged father, and tell our parents we are both dead—but, oh! do not tell them how we died!"

Before the woman could reply or any one interfere, the report of that pistol sounded again, and the fratricide had ceased to live.

On the hill near Rincon Point were two graves, a few years ago enclosed with a white picket fence, and one tombstone stood at their head with the simple inscription—"Brothers."—[Golden Era.

The London and Liverpool papers contain long articles on the death of the Czar, and appear to entertain no doubt of the correctness of the news.

Visit of the Emperor Napoleon to the Crimea.

A Paris correspondent of the London Morning Post, writing on February 27th, says: All doubts and hesitations as to the Emperor's journey to Sebastopol are now at an end. His Majesty will decidedly leave. From the day is fixed for the departure—it will be Saturday, next the 3d, or the latest, Monday, the 5th of March. What is more is, that the Empress will accompany His Majesty. A consultation of physicians has taken place as to whether or not it would be prudent for her Majesty to make the journey. The result is, that it has been declared to her great delight, that, seeing that her health is exceedingly good at present, she may safely undertake to go with the Emperor.

The Emperor has nominated the personages who are to attend him. His chancellerie-prince is thus composed: M. Fleury, as chief-private secretary, in the room of M. Mocquard, detained by the government; M. Chantepie, secretary interpreter; M. Cuvillier, rédacteur of the chancellerie; and the employés. The whole of the famous band of the soldier, as well known, and so much admired at London, has also received orders to get out.

Another letter from Paris states that M. Gely, a steward of the Tuileries, specially attached to the service of the Empress, has left for Constantinople, in order to prepare suitable apartments for her Imperial Majesty in one of the summer residences of the Sultan upon the Bosphorus. The ladies of honor who accompany her have been ordered to be in readiness to start on the 1st of March. The wardrobe, the preparations being that the Turkish capital is not the only one which is to be visited.

A telegraphic dispatch had been received in London, dated in Paris on March 1st, to the following effect. No one now doubts longer as to the Emperor's journey. He will go at the end of this week, or at the beginning of next. He will be escorted by the Cent Gardes, the Guides and the Gendarmes of the Imperial Guard. Some of these corps have already received their orders. It is further affirmed that the Empress goes with him.

From the Crimea—Journal of the Siege.

CAMP BEFORE SEBASTOPOL, Feb. 7.—While I was examining the plans to-day, there was scarcely a shot fired for two hours. The small steamers and boats were particularly active running across the creek and to and from the harbor, and everything seemed to go on in the town much the same as usual. One portion of the place, containing some fine buildings and a large church with a cupola, as seen from the picquet-house, put one in mind of Greenwich from the Park Observatory, seen through a diminishing glass. The French mortars have already begun to tell on the stonework of the buildings opposite their batteries. In a few days our allies will be able to inflict tremendous damage on the town.

Feb. 8.—This morning a rumor having got abroad that the Russians were approaching, the allies prepared for them in the following manner. The alarm spread—the harbor was soon involved in smoke. Captain Christie sent riders round to all the large merchant steamers to be in readiness to render all the aid in their power; and Admiral Boxer ordered the men of the Vesuvius to be landed, and the sailors of the transports to be armed and in readiness for service. The Wasp and Diamond all cleared for action and moored stem to stern, so as to form a floating battery, commanding the approach of the harbor from the land side. The sea side is considered sufficiently fortified by nature "why, I never could understand. At four o'clock Sir Colin Campbell mounted the heights up to the little camp. It was bright moon-light. A deep blue sky sparkling with stars was streaked here and there by light fleecy clouds of snowy whiteness, which swept slowly across the mountain crags, or darkened the ravines and valleys with their shadows, like masses of infantry on the march. Scarce a sound was audible near us, except at long intervals the mountainous cry of the sentries. "Number one, and alle-well," or the bells striking the hours on board the ships, but terrible shouts of artillery and incessant volleys of musketry from the front before Sebastopol told that the French and Russians had availed themselves of the moon-light to continue their contest with fresh vigor. The endless roar of the heavy mortars, which came sounding upon the ear twice or thrice in every minute, despite the cloudy mist—which our allies were making against the city in the hours of the morning.

In the rear, around the deep valley used as the chief range towards the sea, all was silent. The men behind the trench which defends our position from Balaklava to the seaboard, scarcely spoke above a whisper, and were almost lost to sight, but the moonlight played on long lines of bright barrels and sparkling bayonets, which just crested as it were, the dark outlines of the breastwork, beneath which English, French and Turks were lying in readiness for the enemy. The guns in the redoubts and earthwork batteries were prepared for instant service. The 93d, 42d and 79th Highlanders, and the 1st Zouaves, attended the lower part of the trenches; then came a body of Turkish troops higher up the slope of the hillside; higher still were placed the Royal Marines and at the summit a portion of the second battalion of the Rifle Brigade, commanded by Major Macdonnel. The line was further strengthened for this night by the 44th and 71st regiments, which were marched out from the town. All the batteries were fully manned, and had the enemy come on at the time he would have met with an astonishingly warm reception. I had been roused out before 4 o'clock in the morning, but being rather incredulous in the matter of *alerte*s, I had contented myself with getting on my clothes and having the horses saddled till the firing from Sebastopol became so very heavy that the echoes from the heights sounded as if there was really a conflict taking place there. However, I was soon undeceived, for the sound decreased, and at last all was silent around us.

An hour and a half of anxious vigil brought the dawn. All eyes peered through the strange compound of light, formed by the rays of the rising sun and by the beams of his last declining satellite, to discover the columns of the enemy, but there was none in sight. Just as the sun rose the eternal Cossack videttes came in view on the hill top to the east, each figure standing out sharp and black against the glowing background. A few Russians were seen about Kamara, but it was evident there was no preparation for an attack this day, and Sir Colin Campbell gave orders for the men to return to their tents.

The stirring events of this day, however, have shown that the spy brought trustworthy intelligence to us. The Russians have actually returned to the height over the valley of Balaklava, towards the left of the Tchernaya, and have re-occupied the hills and the ravines about Kamara and Tchorgoum in some force. They appear to be erecting up entrenchments along their front, and it was quite evident at 4 o'clock this afternoon, that they were getting up two heavy guns or a piece of land close to Canrobert's Hill, which could command them in safety, our gunboats across the plain to the camp very considerably. Probably they buried those guns when they dismantled the valley some time ago, as it seems very improbable that they could have dragged them up to their position over the country in its present state.

Russian Version of the Battle of Eupatoria.

A letter from Berlin, dated on February 27th, says: Advices from St. Petersburg of this day's date state that the following dispatch had been received from Prince Menschikoff, dated the 10th of Feb: "On the 17th a portion of the troops encamped in the neighborhood of Eupatoria, made a reconnoissance against the town to within a distance of 250 toises. They opened a cross-fire of artillery, and in a short time succeeded in dismounting a portion of the enemy's guns, and in blowing up five caissons of ammunition. Having assured himself that Eupatoria was defended by 40,000 men and 100 guns, General Chruli, who commanded the detachment, gave orders to retire out of range, which was done in perfect order."—[London Times "Own Correspondent."

Lord Lucan and Lord Raglan.

The following is a copy of the letter addressed by Lord Lucan to Lord Raglan, complaining of the expression used in Raglan's dispatch describing the charge at Balaklava:

BALAKLAVA, Nov. 29, 1854.—My Lord: In your lordship's report of the cavalry action of Balaklava of the 25th ult. given in the papers which have just arrived from England, you observe: "That from some misconception of the instruction to advance, the Lieutenant-General considered that he was bound to attack at all hazards, and his accordingly ordered Lord Cardigan to move forward with the Light Brigade." Surely, my Lord, this is a very grave charge, and an imputation reflecting seriously on my professional character. I can not remain silent. It is, I feel, incumbent on me to state those facts which I can not doubt must clear me from what I respectfully submit is altogether unmerited. The cavalry was formed to support an intended movement of the infantry, when Capt Nolan, aide-de-camp of the Quartermaster-General, came up to me at speed, and handed to my hands the written instruction:

"Lord Raglan wishes the cavalry to advance rapidly to the front, follow the enemy, and try to prevent the enemy carrying away the guns. Troop of horse artillery may accompany. French cavalry is on our left.

"Immediate. R. AIREY."

After carefully reading this order I hesitated, and urged the uselessness of such an attack and the dangers attending it. The aid-de-camp, in a most authoritative tone, stated that they were Lord Raglan's orders that the cavalry should attack immediately. I asked him, "Where and what to do?" as neither enemy nor guns were in sight. He replied in a most disrespectful but significant manner, pointing to the further end of the valley: "There, my Lord, is your enemy; there your guns." So distinct in my opinion was your written instructions, and so positive and urgent were the orders delivered by the aid-de-camp, that I felt it was imperative on me to obey, and I informed Lord Cardigan that he was to advance and to the objective point. To this he made no reply, and in which I entirely agreed. I replied that the order was from your lordship. Having decided, against my conviction, to make the movement, I did all in my power to render it as little perilous as possible. I formed the brigade in two lines and led to its support two squadrons of heavy cavalry (the Scots Greys and Royals), and finally halted them when they had reached the spot from which they could protect the retreat of the Light Cavalry in the event of their being pursued by the enemy, and when having lost many officers and men by the fire from the batteries had left any further advance would have exposed them to destruction.

My Lord, I considered at the time—I am still of the same opinion—that I followed the only course open to me. As a Lieutenant-General doubtless I have discretionary power; but to take upon myself to disobey an order written by my Commander-in-Chief within a few minutes of its delivery and given from no elevated position, (unmounding an entire view of all the heights, and the position of the enemy, would have been nothing less than direct disobedience of orders, without any other reason than that I preferred my own opinion to that of my General, and, in this instance, must have exposed me and the cavalry to aspersions against which it might have been difficult to defend ourselves.

I should also be reminded that the aid-de-camp, well informed of the intentions of the General, and the objects in bad in view, after first insisting on my immediate charge, then placed himself in front of one of the leading squadrons, where he fell the first victim.

I did not dare so to disobey your lordship, and it is the opinion of every officer of rank in this army to whom I have shown your instructions that it was not possible for me to do so.

I hope, my lord, that I have stated the facts temperately, and in a becoming and respectful manner, as it has been my wish to do. I have confident that it will be your desire to do me justice. I will only ask that your lordship should kindly give the same publicity to this letter that has been given to your report, as I am sensitively anxious to satisfy my Sovereign, my military superiors, and the public that I have not on this unhappy occasion shown myself undeserving of their confidence or unworthy the command which I hold. I have the honor to be, etc. LUCAN.

Lieut.-Gen. commanding cavalry division.

His Excellency the Commander of the Forces.

The Ouachita (La.) Register of the 15th says:

Low water and out of provisions is again made the order of the day for the second or third time this season. The Ouachita was never known to be as low before at this season of the year—it is still falling, though very little—and we can see no prospects for a rise just now.

THE SARDINIAN IMMIGRANTS.—It seems, notwithstanding the representations of the Sardinian Consul, that the Dee Ganey's passengers, if not convicts are all paupers. Very shortly after landing, they began to apply to the Emigrant Commission for relief, two or three at a time, increasing in numbers daily, and yesterday fifty-eight out of the sixty-six who arrived in the frigate were depending for support on the Commissioners of Emigration.

Of the whole number, one has lost an arm in battle, two are crippled by wounds in the legs, and one by rheumatism, and one is an old man of seventy years. Six of the eighteen who have not applied for relief are of a better class and appear to have money. Most of them have been soldiers, some of them deserters, and some two or three of them were committed, in Sardinia, for begging.

They are all very destitute of clothing, having been hurried from the prison to the frigate without notice. They say they were scantily fed during their long passage of ninety-two days, and were used with much cruelty by the officers of the frigate, who frequently knocked them down.

Forty-eight of the number express a willingness to go to the Far West, provided a sufficient sum of money is given them to keep them from want until they can so far fall into the habits of labor as to be able to earn their own living.

The Sardinian Consul has been notified that special funds will be required for each and all of them. [N. Y. Express, 19th.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

THE undersigned having been appointed by the citizens of Mansfield a Committee to devise arrangements for the establishment of a Female Collegiate Institute of high character, take great pleasure in communicating to the public throughout our own and the adjoining States, the adoption of a plan, which we trust will satisfy the desires of the most sanguine friends of education.

Dr. H. C. Thweatt, (well-known throughout the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, as a prominent Minister connected with the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South) has been engaged as President of the Institution. The College will be placed entirely under the control and jurisdiction of the Conference of which Dr. Thweatt is a member, a sufficient guarantee (we think) that it will be conducted upon correct principles.

The citizens of Mansfield having subscribed between ten and fifteen thousand dollars, a very spacious building adapted to all the wants of the Institution, will very soon be put in process of erection, at a cost of from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. In the mean time, the Female Academy, already completed, will be used for the purposes of the school. Parents wishing to afford their daughters the advantages essential to the acquirement of a polished education, may rest assured, that no school can be found to the South-West better adapted to this object.

It will be within the province of Dr. Thweatt to employ the services of such assistants in the various departments of learning, as may be found necessary. To those living at a distance we would say, that no village in any section of Western Louisiana offers more advantages as far as health, society, etc, are concerned.

The rates of tuition will be the same as those charged in the higher Schools of the country—the particulars of which will be published hereafter. The first session of the School to commence on the 8th day of January, 1855.

Parents will please send on their daughters, as there are always advantages to be derived from an early commencement.

Board can be obtained for the present in respectable private families at moderate rates.

FROST PICTURES.

When, like a outlaw exile driven forth,
Southward December drags his icy chain,
He graves fair pictures of his native North
On the crisp window-pane.

So some pale captive bird with ties unshorn
The latticed glass, and shapes rude outlines there
With listless finger and with look forlorn,
Cheating his dull despair.

The fairy fragments of some Arctic scene
I see to-night—blank wastes of Polar snow,
Ice-laden boughs, and feathery pluse that lean
Over ravines below.

Black frozen lakes and icy peaks blown bare
Break the white surfaces of the crusted pane;
And spear-like leaves, long ferns and blossoms fair,
Full linked in silvery chain.

Draw on, I pray then, by this slender thread,
Fancy, thou sorceress, blending visions wrought
Over that dim well perpetually fed
By the clear springs of thought!

Northward I turn, and tread those dreary strands,
Lakes where the wild fowl breed, the swan abides,
Shores where the white fox burrowing in the sands
Harks to the dashing tides,

And seas where, drifting on a raft of ice
The sho-bear rears her young, and cliffs so high,
The dark-winged birds that emulate their rise
Melt through the pale blue sky.

There all night long, with far-diverging rays,
And striking shades, the red Aurora glow,
From the keen Heaven, meek suns with pallid blaze
Light up the Arctic snow.

Bible me, I pray, along those waves remote,
That deep unstarried from its primal rest;
Some errant sail, the fisher's lone light boat,
Borne, waif-like on its breast!

Lead me, I pray, where never shallop's keel
Breaks the dull ripples throbbing to their caves,
Where the mailed glacier with his armed heel
Spurs the resisting waves!

Pilot me, I pray, the phantom-hosts that hold
Celestial journeys when the midnight calls,
Or sky stands, with lances bright and bold,
Storming her ancient halls!

Yet, while I look the magic picturee fade;
Melts the bright tracery from the frosted pane;
Trees, vales and cliffs, in sparkling snows arrayed,
Dissolve in silvery rain.

Without, the day's pale glories sink and swell;
Over the summit of yon wooded height
Gleams the moon's crescent, like a stranded shell
Left on the shores of night.

Hark! how the North wind with a hasty hand
Rattling my casement, frames his mystic rhyme,
Rouse thee, rude minstrel, chanting through the land
Tunes of the olden time.

A MARYLAND CATTLE SHOW ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.—It is supposed by many persons that our cattle shows are of modern origin. This, however, is a mistake. We find in the Marlborough Gazette the following, taken from the Maryland Gazette of September 8, 1747:

"Whereas, there is a Fair appointed by act of Assembly, to be held in Baltimore Town, on the first Thursday, Friday and Saturday in October, yearly, the commissioners of the said town hereby give notice, that whoever brings to the said Fair, on the first day thereof, the best steer shall receive eight pounds current money for the same; also, a bounty of forty shillings over and above said eight pounds. The said steer afterward, on the same day, to be run for by any horse, mare or gelding, not exceeding five years old, three heats, a quarter of a mile each heat, not confined to carry any certain weight, the winning horse to be entitled to the said steer, or to eight pounds in money, at the option of the owner.

"On Friday, the second day of said Fair, will be run for the sum of five pounds current money, by any horse, mare or gelding, the same distance, not confined to carry any certain weight. Also, a bounty of forty shillings will be given to any person that produces the best piece of yard-wide country made linen, the piece to contain twenty yards.

"On Saturday, the third day, a hat and ribbon will be oudgled for; a pair of pumps to be wrestled for; and a white shift to be run for by two girls.

"All persons are exempted from any arrest during the said Fair, and the day before and the day after, except in cases of felony and breaches of the peace, according to the tenure of the above-mentioned act."

AN ILLUSTRATION.—In one of his recent sermons, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher hit upon believers in spirit-rapping in something like the following style:

Admitting (for argument) that they have truth on their side (though I don't believe they have) what pitiful, contemptible, time-serving creatures they are; I mean those who make "spiritual manifestations" their God, and devote their time, energies and capabilities to them; those who talk of nothing, think of nothing and study nothing but interviews with the spirits of mortals once upon this earth.

When a foreigner, accustomed to gewgaws and trappings as emblems of office and official station, enters one of our court-rooms, and seeing there the lacqueys and waiters—the menials of the court—dressed in uniform or with stars upon the breast, supposes them to be the judges or chief officials, and makes a very low bow to them, you perhaps laugh at him for his ignorance; and so these spirit-dealers should be laughed at. Supposing their whole doctrine to be true, they are bowing down reverently and worshipping the lacqueys and menials of God's court, disregarding and setting at naught the great God himself, in whom they live and move and have their being.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.—The following incident was related to us the other day, as having occurred at one of the numerous Gentlemen's Furnishing Establishments on Loug Wharf. The parties concerned were the proprietor of the store and a John Chinaman. Examining a pair of boots, the price of which was $5, John inquired: "How muchee you axee for um bootee?"

In a spirit of waggery, it is presumable, the owner replied: "Two dollar and a halfee, John; very cheap bootee, nintee?"

"Cheap bootee," said John, who thereupon examined a pair, and, concluding to buy, offered a quarter, anglo.

"But," said the dealer in leather, "this is only enough for one boot; they are two dollars and a half apiece, two bootee cost $5.

John was somewhat astonished; said he would not buy, and demanded the return of his money; but the dealer was inexorable. "No, John," said the latter, "you have got one boot, and have paid for it; now give me another piece like this, and take the other."

John saw the drift of the game, and was at once resolved. "Well," said he, "this bootee be mine maybe? I paid for um?"

"Yes," said the dealer.

"And you no give me the other bootee?" asked John.
